In our day we have made notable advances in appliances for studying the stars. With what crude instruments the ancients wrought out their calculations, history does not inform us. From the times of Copernicus and Galileo to those of Kepler, Herschel, Newton and Laplace, progress was slow not only in astronomy, but in all the sciences. The Landgrave of Hesse, who built the first modern observatory at Cassel in 1561, and that of Tycho Brahe at Haen in 1576, did much to interest the scientific world. Other observatories followed, but it was not until the last half of the nineteenth century that any really marvelous progress was made in unlocking the heavens. We have partly uncovered the secret of the pyramids, and by the aid of such magnificent instruments as the Rosse telescope, that in the great Lick Observatory on Mount Hamilton, the costly appliances in the Observatory of Saint Jacques, Paris, the Mont Blanc Observatory, which was the outcome of the life-long ambition of the famous Jules Pierre Janssen, the fine Rochester Observatory, and the powerful Yerkes Telescope, which was exhibited at the recent World's Fair in Chicago, our scientists are now enabled to determine the character and movements of stellar bodies at almost incalculable distances in the surrounding heavens. Janssen has disclosed the wonders of the sun's atmosphere. Procter has delighted us with the marvels of "other worlds than ours." Flammarion and Schiaparelli have unrolled before us a new world panorama in Mars, with verdurous soil, mountains, lakes, canals and seas, so like much of the surface of our own earth, although with a lighter atmosphere, that science hardly hesitates to pronounce it populated.

In most families of young people, the possession of a telescope is a source of infinite enjoyment. With a moderately good instrument, not necessarily expensive, a chart of the heavens and a clear night, such as we are frequently sure to have in this beautiful October weather, many pleasant and profitable hours may be spent in studying the wondrous multitudes of spheres above and around us.

"Slamming the Door."

A boy and girl overheard a quarrel between their parents. "Which one of them

ference was hardly worth mentioning. On the other hand, there are men so happily constituted that they can distill sweetness from gall and wormwood. All their lives they contrive to retain something of that confiding temper of infancy which opens its mouth and shuts the eyes, confident that something sweet, some untold good, will reward the effort. In every misfortune they detect blessings in disguise. Enjoying the sweet of life as it comes up, they can find also a heart to laugh at the bitter, and descry a silver lining in the darkest cloud.

Praise Sometimes Helpful.

A cheerful husband makes a pleasant home. If a man is breezy, cheery, considerate and sympathetic, his wife sings in her heart over her puddings, and her mending basket, counts the hours until he returns at night, and renews her youth in the security she feels of his approbation and admiration. You may think it weak or childish, if you please, but it is the admired wife, who hears words of praise and receives smiles of commendation, who is capable, discreet and executive. I have seen a timid, meek, self-distrusting, little body fairly bloom into strong, self-reliant womanhood, under the tonic and the cordial of companionship with a husband who really went out of his way to find occasion for showing her how fully he trusted her judgment, and how tenderly he deferred to her opinion. In home life there should be no jar, no striving for place, no insisting on prerogatives, or division of interest. The husband and the wife are each the complement of the other. And it is just as much his duty to be cheerful as it is hers to be patient; his right to bring joy into the door

AS A LITTLE CHILD.

As a little child, a little child?
Then how can I enter in?
I am scarred and hardened, and soul-defiled,
With traces of sorrow and sin.
Can I turn backward the tide of years
And wake my dead youth at my will?
"Nay, but thou canst, with thy grief and thy fears, Creep into my arms and be still."
I know that the lambs in the heavenly fold
Are sheltered and kept in thy heart;
But I—I am old, and the gray from the gold
Has bidden all brightness depart.
The gladness of youth, the faith and the truth,
Lie withered or shrouded in dust.
"Thou'rt emptied at length of thy treacherous strength;
Creep into my arms now—and trust."
Is it true? can I share with the little ones there
A child's happy rest on thy breast?
"Aye, the tenderest care will answer thy prayer,
My love is for thee as the rest.
It will quiet thy fears, will wipe away tears—
Thy murmurs shall sicken to Psalms,
Thy sorrows shall seem but a feverish dream,
In the rest—in the rest in my arms."
—M. L. DICKINSON.

KOREAN HOMES.

KOREAN women of the upper classes live a life of seclusion: they do nothing at all; they are totally uneducated, and they are allowed to see no one but their husbands, parents, and a very few female friends. A woman belonging to the upper classes never appears before strangers, and she never goes in the street exposed to view. The daughters of the soil are more to be envied, for they at least enjoy more liberty, although they are nothing better than human machines. When you live among the Koreans, and know the terrible bondage under which the women labor, one breathes a sigh on their wretched behalf. Beside her household duties, and the bearing of children, the Korean wife combines the duties of gardener and field-laborer, and she must always be mindful that she has to wait personally upon her husband. Her whole condition, socially, morally and intellectually, is deplorable and in a very large part of her native country she is without the Gospel, so that she may be literally said to live and die as a "beast of burden," in helpless and hopeless ignorance of anything beyond her present wretched existence.

In an interesting letter from Seoul to the "Heaven Children's Friend," Rev. M. F. Scranton has this story to say of the young folks of Korea:

"The boys do not have any hats until they become men. When do you suppose that is? The day comes just as soon as the father and mother please to have it so. I have often seen little men of ten, twelve and fourteen years of age, and boys of twenty-five and even forty. Early in the morning of the day when the boy is to become a man, the top of the head is shaven, then all the remaining hair is combed up over the bald spot and closely tied and twisted into a knot which stands up about four inches. After this is done a band called a mankeun is put about the forehead and hair to keep it in place. Then the new hat (for which the boy has been waiting all his life) is brought forward with great ceremony; also a coat with loose sleeves which hang down below the knees, after which the new man goes out to call on his friends and relatives. He makes profound bows to them all, then goes home to a feast. From this day forward he has a different name as well as a new hat and top-knot; he is also spoken to in different terms from those used to him in the old days, when he was a boy.

"When a Korean little girl reaches the age of nine or ten, her parents tell her she is now too old to be seen on the streets any more. She can't even stand at the front door and look out, but is banished to the apartments of the women, which are in the back part of the house. There is no pretty flower garden to look out upon, no dolls to play with, and not much of anything which is bright or beautiful ever enters the rooms where our Korean girl must spend her life."

is getting the worst of it?" asked the latter. "I don't know yet," answered the boy thoughtfully, "I am just waiting to hear which one of them will slam the door going out." The little lad had found a better and more universal test of human frailty than he knew. The man who gets the worst of it usually slams the door. To "get mad" is not only a sign of weakness, it is a sign of defeat as well. The successful person can afford to keep his temper and wait for time to vindicate his cause. Some people slam the door although it helps their cause not one whit, but indicates that they have had recourse to a defeated man's last resort.

A Happy Temper.

All experience shows that if the soul is happily disposed, all things wear a roseate hue, and misery almost wants a name. But if the soul is not so disposed, all pleasures are to it like delicate wines in a mouth tinged with gall. Some of the most eminent and successful men, both of ancient and modern times, who have been loaded with honors, have professed to enjoy but a few days in all their lives of unalloyed happiness. An Arabian caliph, who wrote his own life, could reckon up but fourteen days of felicity. Gibbon, the prince of modern historians, who tells the story after him, boasts that he had surpassed, in this respect, the commander of the faithful; but the difference was hardly worth mentioning. On the other hand, there are men so happily constituted that they can distill sweetness from gall and wormwood. All their lives they contrive to retain something of that confiding temper of infancy which opens its mouth and shuts the eyes, confident that something sweet, some untold good, will reward the effort. In every misfortune they detect blessings in disguise. Enjoying the sweet of life as it comes up, they can find also a heart to laugh at the bitter, and descry a silver lining in the darkest cloud.

A Home Amusement and its Results.

In many households there are members who for months, and even years, have been collecting postage stamps. What to do with the stamps has been a frequent subject of inquiry, and many letters have been sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the subject. In the Chicago "Advance," Phoebe Bird throws some light on the matter. She writes: "Mr. B. S. Ross, 509 Wieland street, Chicago, has four million stamps, most of them in large boxes all nailed up ready for shipment abroad. They are all tied up in bunches of a hundred. He says they are exported very largely to Germany, China, South Africa, and in smaller quantities to almost every country upon the face of the globe. In Germany and China especially, there is a great 'fad' just now for papering the walls of rooms and decorating furniture with stamps. In Germany, after pasting them on, the surface is varnished over; in China it is covered with lacquer. It takes about 100,000 to paper a room of moderate size. The 'million of postage stamps' is not a myth, for I have seen four millions of them with my own eyes."

CHAPTER III.

A Momentous Question.

THE first evening over and the night's refreshing repose, Val and Annie walked out in the grounds on a tour of inspection. Everything was even more beautiful than Val had conceived. Gold and taste were the presiding genii of these grounds. In the morning dew everything shone with redoubled splendor, and ever and anon, from behind some fine-leaved cypress, there would gleam out a marble Hamadryad, or an Oread from some wild mountain gorge, to surprise one with its intense whiteness. Between the steps in front of the camellia trees there stood the marble figure of a little boy, bearing upon his head a marble basket, and over its sides drooped ferns and peperomia. What a flashing out of marble amid the green! The fountain was the centre of attraction in these grounds. There were grouped Oceanids holding spacious urns, and towering above them was Lethys bearing an immense conch shell, through which the water poured upwards, and then fell back over her children beneath. What a splashing there was of arching water, what a brimming over of countless goblets, what a tinkling, what a ceaseless dripping in the marble basin, where gold and silver fish glinted in the sunlight, as it came shimmering through the trees above! Then on the basin's rim, how shyly the water-lilies threw open their petals, ever pure and sweet in their continuous bath!

"Oh, Annie!" exclaimed Val, sinking on an iron rustic seat, "this is all so dream-like. I can scarcely convince myself that I am really awake."

"You will delight papa if you admire his grounds. I don't know whether it is his wife, his two promising children, or his grounds which occupy the largest space in his heart. If you want to ensconce yourself in mamma's good graces, just ask her the name of her pet flowers. It is wonderful to me how she keeps all the long, hard names in her already-filled head. Some sound Spanish, some German, and some Portuguese. Now, a rose is a rose to me, beautiful in its blushing repose, but it's a rose and nothing more; what do I care whether it is Deronensis or La France? A Fish Geranium is that to me and nothing more, gaudy, very pretty and showy in a bouquet, but odorless, only a clean kind of smell, fishy, but not altogether disagreeable—this is it to me, but mamma revels in Etoile Polain, La Fanche Gaiete, Marechal McMahon, and a thousand more. I know what that is," pointing with the stick she had been twirling in her hand, to a tree close by, "it is a Deoda Cypress, and I think it a beauty. But I forget, I did not bring you out here to admire alone; I brought you to hold a consultation, as I believe physicians would call it. Now, you know, this is never done unless the case is very serious, when life and death balance equally, and when the diagnosis of one man is not satisfactory—but don't look so startled, nobody is sick about here. Ha! ha! ha! We are not to consult about who is to live and who is to die, and when, but here is our subject for discussion—

"Grand Ball, or Lawn Party!"

"Now these are the facts. I wanted to give you, my cousin Val, a public welcome; in other words, a grand justification of a party, the very grandest of the season, and wanted, through it, for you to make your debut into the world (I've made mine long ago), and also to introduce you into the society of our city. I want a ball, but Roy differs. He says, 'Give cousin Val a lawn party.' He thinks out here in our beautiful yard, under the beautiful light of a beautiful moon, it will be the most beautiful thing in the world. Papa says, 'Anything, just so you all have a good time,' and mamma says, 'that since you are not yet out of mourning, that perhaps we had better leave the matter entirely to you.' Now, you've heard the arguments of all sides, what say you? What is the decision of the jury? Speak, and let the judge pronounce sentence."

"Annie, my dear cousin, you are all too good."

"Stop, Val, that is begging the question, or rather it is what logicians would call 'reductio ad absurdum.' It is one thing or the other, now the question is simply, which?"

"Well, then, if it is pinned down to that, I say lawn party, every time."

"Remember, Val, trouble and expense are not in the scales at all. Our parties are turned over to that adept, Depuis, and trouble we have none, except to look our best. As to expense, that is nothing at all. Let your decision be unbiased. Remember that all juries are sworn to act impartially."

"You will have to vote me out then, for in this case I decide most partially, decide on a lawn party, and think it will be perfectly delightful. Why, I never was at a lawn party in my life. A party, and in these grounds, out under the bright little stars! It will be grand."

"Then let it be a lawn party, but I think you have made a mistake, still, 'neversomeness' (as our driver says), you shall have it. Next come invitations; we must go in directly and arrange them—but what are you smiling about?"

"Nothing much, only some thoughts that came flashing through my brain."

"Give me the benefit, please. They must have been bright thoughts, to have caused so bright a smile."

"I was not conscious of smiling, but since I did, I will give you the pleasure of laughing a little at my expense. Before I came here, I could not help thinking of the role I should play, the role of 'Country Cousin,' you know. Ha! Ha! Ha!"

Annie joined in the laugh and said: "Let's have it, Val.—Now, curtain rises. Scene first."

Val said slowly: "A young girl gets a letter from a rich uncle, asking her to visit his family—girl in ecstasy, dances for joy, tells the birds, the flowers and babbling brooks, who never baffle this though—talks to the stars, begs them to give her their light to guide her safely to this fairy land—slumbers softly and smiles in golden dreams. Curtain falls."

Annie calls out—"Curtain rises—Scene second."

Val proceeds—"Reaches her uncle, is received most kindly—is in a state of most unmitigated bliss—is introduced into society, blunders, reposes simplicity on all occasions—never travelled, never saw the Alps, either near or remote, except in pictures, and poor ones at that—makes awkward mistakes and absurd speeches—servants laugh—relatives are mortified—cousin hangs her head in very shame.—Curtain falls."

Again Annie: "Curtain rises.—Scene third."

Val goes on: "Tableau. Travelled, city young lady, who has seen the Alps, and poor country cousin who has seen nothing, side by side.—The one beautiful, educated, accomplished, fashionable; the other, plain in features, unsophisticated in manners, a stranger to society and its laws, knows her A B C's and little else, dresses without taste, judgment or money.—Goes home a sadder but a wiser girl. Curtain falls.—Moral to this tragedy—Aspire to no sphere higher than your own."

"Nonsense, Val, did such silly thoughts as those ever, in truth, flit through your brain?"

"Indeed, they did, and many more of like character. Why this is a common plot in books."

"Oh, you novel reader, caught, hey?"

"I've read a few, enough to recognize the above photographs. In the one, I see your prettiness, in the other, poor little me."

"Yes, but Val, your finale is all wrong. It generally winds up with sweet simplicity far out-rivaling fashionable, æsthetic beauty, giving pleasant surprises and startling one with brilliant speeches and repartees of rare wit. She is wonderfully proficient in every department of knowledge, having learned from the great book of nature and infallible intuition, and possesses native loveliness which far surpasses beauty's studied art, and more grace in motion, than was ever learned in the ball room or under French dancing master; so that Augustus Fitzgerald, the darling of beauty's heart, is captivated, entranced, and lies a willing captive at simplicity's feet, while poor beauty weeps, pines, dies and fills an early grave!—Moral to this tragedy—Stand out of the way of all country cousins for they are dangerous creatures."

"Ha! Ha! Ha! Well, Annie, between us we have fixed up a comedy. Let's wipe both out and begin over again. I promise to sheathe my dagger, and you, my city cousin, will find that this country cousin at least, is a most inoffensive somebody."

"There's mamma calling; so let's go in, announce our decision, and consult about the invitations."

CHAPTER IV.

One Picture She Cannot Copy.

From earliest childhood, Annie St. Clair had kept a journal. It was in truth her autobiography. What better history can one have, than that which records thoughts and feelings the innermost, and impressions unfettered by fear of public criticism? Such was hers, full of the sparkle of the dew of youth, full of fresh thoughts, bright fancy and imaginings and ambitious aspirations. Its pages were the mile-stones marking the journey of her life, onward in mental progress, upward. Ah, who could tell! Throughout her eastern travels her journal had been her confidential companion, a mute friend, to whom one could pour out heart troubles, but one who never betrayed.

"Let me read your journal, Annie," asked her mother one day in Florence, after Annie had bent over it for more than an hour.

"Mamma, please don't ask it. I unfold on these pages the innermost leaf of my heart, and I cannot let mortal eye read what is written here, not even yours, dear mamma."

So it was looked upon as a sacred treasure which belonged to her alone. Two weeks after Val's arrival Annie took out her journal and thus wrote:

"It seems that papa's only sister, Julia, married rather against the wishes of her parents and of papa, her only brother. Another sister, Kate, had married, gone West, and died, being buried with her little babe. The man of Aunt Julia's heart was a worthy, though poor man. He was an ordinary teacher, receiving a small and very fluctuating income. These two points, his poverty and his profession, were considered sufficient grounds for opposition, for Grandpa St. Clair's family were very aristocratic. In addition to these objections, he was a Christian plain and puritanical, indeed papa says fanatical. Aunt Julia had always been sweet and yielding, but to everyone's surprise she said, 'if there is no principle involved, my intention is to marry the poor Christian teacher.' All of the spirit, fire and firmness of the St. Clairs were aroused in her veins and, while she expressed herself calmly, without apparent emotion, yet they knew that she was as firm as the rock of Gibraltar. Papa said, if she had shown anger, chagrin or despair, they might have moved her, as it was, she smiled, spoke gently and her very coolness was the bulwark of her strength. They were married, Henry Vernon and Julia St. Clair—married at home, and had a simple wedding. There was no attempt at display, for Aunt Julia said:

"I do not wish a farce enacted. There is no joy in your hearts in seeing me marry Henry Vernon, therefore, I do not wish any demonstrations of joy or congratulations. Do not let your actions belie your hearts, let all accord."

"And they did. The wedding was uncomfortably plain, and no bridal presents were given."

"Uncle Henry was too happy to get his wife, he cared for nothing else; he was marrying her for herself. Grandpa could not hold out long, and soon sent Uncle Henry a check for $5,000, but it was promptly returned with the laconic note:

"SIR:—While I thank you for your generous gift, I must beg leave to decline accepting it, since I feel that in giving me your daughter, you have already made me a millionaire."

"Uncle Henry was sincere in this refusal, spirited and honorable as it was, and nothing that he could have done would have so raised him in the estimation of the St. Clair family."

"Spunky!" exclaimed Grandpa as he read the few lines over and over again. Then he went on:

"I like the ring; it's true metal sure! Independent, too! But I'll outgeneral him. Can't set a St. Clair back so easy! Refuses to let me help my little girl! No, sir, you shall not insult the old father in any such a way."

"So Grandpa threw that check in the fire, sat down and wrote another for $10,000, and sent it this time to Aunt Julia, saying in a little accompanying note:

"DEAR JULIA:—Henry refuses a small gift from my hand, for I suppose he will never forgive me. Will you, too, spurn my offer? Accept the enclosed, my dear child, as a little peace-offering, and with it the fondest love of your devoted

FATHER."

"Aunt Julia could not do otherwise than accept the gift. At Grandpa's death, a few years after, ten thousand more were added to this sum. Papa, by a speculation, made a large fortune from his inheritance, but Uncle Henry lost a part of his by a bad investment, for papa says he was not a good business-man. The remainder of Aunt Julia's portion was put away. It lay, like the talent, hid away in a napkin, folded up very carefully no doubt, the napkin spotlessly white, and it lay in a cosy, quiet spot, and there it lay and lay, and only lay. Ours was busy, his was doing nothing. That is the worst that anyone could ever whisper against Uncle Henry. He died a year ago and left five children. Upon our return from our last European trip papa wrote to Aunt Julia for Valeria, her eldest child, to come and visit us. So much for preface. I was afraid, dear Journal that I might lose this link from my memory, and also the notes of Uncle Henry and Grandpa which papa put into my hands, as well as the above facts, so I wrote all down here, and feel now that they are safe for time, and safe from human ken.—So much for history, now for loose reins."

"Val is here. I love her intensely. She occupies the warmest corner of my heart, and there I believe she will stay throughout life. Somehow this child took right hold of me. Her brown eyes peeped very inquiringly at me as she looked through the carriage door. I read their language. As plain as day they asked, 'Ah, will you love me?' so I took her in my arms, pressed two kisses on her lips and then replied, 'Indeed I will.' Poor fatherless child! I call her child, yet she is seventeen, just one year younger than I, but I am far older than she is. There may be but one year's difference in our ages, by the way we reckon time, but I am years and years older than she is in experience and knowledge of the world."

"Val is a beauty, and the most unconscious beauty I ever saw. The more unconscious she is, the more beautiful she appears, and so on ad infinitum. I can't define her beauty, or classify it. It strikes you at the first glance, and you never lose the impression."

"Val is new and fresh and different from the masses. She has never seen anything so lovely as even these grounds and house, and only to think, how plain they looked to me, after I had visited the palaces of Europe! I enjoy her wonder, and the many surprises which her eyelids cannot curtain. Her education is necessarily plain, I suppose, that is, she knows nothing of French, Italian or German, and she does not paint. Uncle Henry has taught her himself, so she is thorough as far as she has been. She speaks fully as well in ordinary conversation as I do, indeed, she has rather uncommon colloquial powers. She plays and sings mostly old-fashioned music, and Roy enjoys it, says she has remarkable talent and taste in execution. She is perfectly unselfish and has no particle of vanity. I think these two negative quantities make one very positively good. I do admire these traits in her. Now I can copy a picture, can take a palette and brush and produce the fac-simile of a masterpiece, and when placed side by side, the inexperienced could scarcely tell, which was the original and which was my copy. Now I have drawn a mental photograph, why cannot I copy it? Why cannot I measure myself by Val and make my heart and life like hers? Why can't I? Ah! I fear it would be the hardest task I ever undertook, the very hardest picture I ever tried to copy. 'Au revoir.'"

STRIKES OR ARBITRATION.*

THESE differences cannot be regarded as irreconcilable, if the parties in interest are disposed to be governed by the dictates of reason and correct business principles. In some cases the interests of workmen are directed by arbitrary and exacting trades unions. Of late we have seen that anarchists in some parts of the country have been inciting striking laborers to acts of violence. Under such circumstances it cannot be expected that the employers will be coerced into compliance with the demands of the strikers; and the latter lose much of the general sympathy they would have had if they had taken a more judicious course. There ought to be no war between labor and capital, and each should respect the rights and interests of the other. It may be said that the latter commonly has the advantage of the former, for the futility of labor trying to dictate terms to capital has often been demonstrated.

It is beginning to be recognized, even by some of the trades unions, that strikes do not afford a satisfactory method of settling disputes between laborers and their employers. The Knights of Labor in Pennsylvania have recently taken this ground. The necessity of some better remedy for industrial antagonisms than is afforded by the policy of continuing the struggle until one side or the other is compelled to yield to terms, must be manifest to every impartial observer. All serious differences between the employers and the employed should be settled by arbitration. This has proved quite an effectual remedy for the prevention of strikes in the manufacturing districts of England and France. A judicious system of arbitration is being given a trial in Pennsylvania, and if it is successful in its results it will probably be adopted in other States. Arbitration is, without doubt, the true

ELI BROWN.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aural Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

The New Laudes Domini

THE BEST HYMN AND TUNE BOOK

EDITED BY REV. C. S. ROBINSON, D. D.

EDITOR OF "SONGS FOR THE SANCTUARY," "SPIRITUAL SONGS," ETC.

The Most Successful Book ever Issued in America.

A proof of this statement is afforded those interested in the selection of a new hymn and tune book for their church who will send for the new containing a list of the hundreds of churches already using the book, and warmest words of commendation from the pastors.

"The New Laudes Domini" has only to be examined and compared with others to be adopted. It has been pronounced the best by so many who are competent to judge, and is so generally chosen, that it has taken an unequivocal position as the leading hymnal of the Presbyterian and Congregational churches.

A returnable sample copy sent, on request, to ministers or committees, without cost. An examination of The New Laudes Domini is earnestly requested. No specimen pages can do justice to the beauty of this book. It is adapted to every need.

OUR MISSIONARIES SAFE IN KOREA.

REV. DR. S. SPENCER writing from Nagoya, Japan, gives the following interesting extract from a letter by Rev. H. G. Appenzeller, a missionary in Korea:

"The Japanese during the past two weeks have been making history for themselves and for Korea, to say nothing of the big hole they have knocked out of the Chinese navy, and the gash cut into her army. We had quite an anxious time here the other day—the King a prisoner, the army surrendered and disbanded, China humbled, and once mighty Koreans crawling into very small holes. The exodus was pitiable and pathetic—one steady stream going out of the gates of the city. A bundle on the head, a child on the back and one or two trotting along at the side of the mother, the father with a heavy load a few steps in the rear. Markets and stores all closed. Chinese gone and going. Japan terminated. Japan thus far has done her work well. Her troops have won praises—golden opinions—from all sides for their valor in battle and excellent behavior in camp."

The Christian missionaries have been safe all through the hostilities, up to the present time. Trusting implicitly in the Divine care, they have been protected and while war and death have raged everywhere around them.

EXCAVATIONS IN GREECE.

A body of workmen, under the direction of Dr. Charles Waldstein of the American School of Archaeology at Athens, have lately been excavating the Argive Heraeum, or temple of Hera (Juno), midway between Argos and Mycenae. The old sanctuary on this site was burned B. C. 423, but a new and more splendid structure was erected in its immediate vicinity. This second temple lasted until the Middle Ages. Both sites have been laid bare. Not only has complete information of the architecture of these shrines been reached, but works of art have been brought to light almost equal in importance to the discoveries of Schliemann. Still more interesting, and possibly more important, are the results of the explorations of the ruins of Niffer, near ancient Babylon, which has been going on since 1887, under the direction of Dr. Peters and Prof. Hilprich, of the University of Pennsylvania. The temple of Bel, the first shrine to the god ever systematically excavated, has been dug out to its foundations. Evidence has been gained from inscriptions that this city was one thousand years older than scientists had believed, and that the antiquity of the human race must be carried back to a period four thousand years before Christ. Our Minister at Constantinople, Mr. Terrill, writing to the State department on this subject, says: "In the number of tablets, brick, inscribed vases, and in the value of cuneiform texts found, American enterprise equals, if it does not excel, the exploration of Layard at Nineveh and Rassam's excavations at Aba-Habba. The religion, government, habits of life, and, to a great extent, customs of men who lived four thousand years before Christ are revealed by the inscriptions which are now being translated here and arranged by Prof. Hilprich."

LONGING.

I CANNOT think but God must know
About the thing I long for so;
I know he is so good, so kind,
I cannot think but he will find
Some way to help, some way to show
Me the thing I long for so.

I stretch my hand—it lies so near;
It looks so sweet, it looks so dear.

"Dear Lord," I pray, "Oh, let me know
If it is wrong to want it so?"
He only smiles—he does not speak:
My heart grows weaker and more weak
With looking at the thing so dear,
Which lies so far and yet so near.

Now Lord, I leave at thy loved feet—
This thing which looks so near, so sweet,
I will not seek, I will not long—
I almost fear I have done wrong.
I'll go and work the harder, Lord,
And wait till by some loud, clear word
Thou callest me to thy loved feet
To take this thing so dear, so sweet.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

How are we able to do it?

These Spoons were made up especially for the World's Fair trade, by THE ONEIDA COMMUNITY, Limited, and were left on their hands. In order to dispose of them quickly, we make this unheard of offer. SIX SOUVENIR SPOONS, after dinner coffee size, HEAVY COIN SILVER PLATED, with GOLD PLATED BOWLS, each spoon representing a different building of the World's Fair. The handles are finely chased, showing head of Columbus, and dates 1492-1893 and wording "World's Fair City." They are genuine works of art, making one of the finest souvenir collections ever produced. Sold during the Fair for $9.00; we now offer the balance of this stock at ONLY 99 CENTS. Sent in elegant plush lined case, properly packed, and express prepaid to any address. Send Postal Note or Currency. Money cheerfully refunded if goods are not as represented.

WHERE SUN AND MOON STOOD STILL.

Ancient Gibeon, the Scene of Joshua's Miraculous Victory over the Canaanitish Kings
—A Great City, Rich in Scriptural Memories, Now a Ruin.

On a sunny slope in the fertile highlands of Palestine which once were the portion of the tribe of Benjamin, is a notable cluster of buildings, a few of comparatively recent date, but the majority of them in a condition of ruinous dilapidation. Few travelers pass that way, and the ancient isolation of the spot is undisturbed by traffic or by contact with the outside world. These ruins mark the site of one of the most powerful and important cities of ancient Canaan—the city of Gibeon. It was one of the four cities of the Hivites, a warlike nation who inhabited Palestine before the Israelitish conquest. Its people, fearing to meet the victorious Hebrew host, made a league with Joshua and thus escaped the fate of Jericho and Ai. It is described in the sacred story as a great, walled city, like a seat of royalty, and garrisoned by a force of practiced warriors. In later years, under Israelitish rule, it was allotted to the Levites and within its walls the tabernacle was set up during the reigns of David and Solomon. When Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, Gibeon for a time became the seat of government. In Jeremiah's days, prophets dwelt there, and at the close of the Captivity, its people returned with Zerubbabel. Under Nehemiah, they shared the toil and the honor of repairing the wall of Jerusalem. But the event by which Gibeon is brought prominently before the readers of Scripture was the memorable battle fought by Joshua's armies, when the Israelites routed their Canaanitish foes. This, doubtless, was one of the most important battles in the world's history. Gibeon had already yielded its submission to the armies of God's chosen people, and all the mountain passes and approaches leading to the Jordan Valley were in Joshua's hands. The Joshua to help it and the great captain, by a forced march, suddenly appeared with his army at the foot of the heights of Gibeon, where the confederate armies were encamped. Taken by surprise, the Canaanitish allies could not withstand the mighty onset of the Israelitish host and they fled toward the passes that led through the hills on the west, pursued by the troops of Joshua. The pursuit led both armies along the road that leads to Beth-horon—a long, rocky, winding mountain highway. From this eminence, the Israelitish commander could see the entire field of conflict, the fleeing legions of foemen and his own fast-following squadrons, streaming across the valley of Ajalon to the westward. As the Canaanites fled they were suddenly caught in a fearful tempest of thunder, lightning and hail, and Josephus records that "they were more which died of the hail-stones still further outstretched against Israel's enemies. In the ancient book of Jasher, where many of the legends and traditions of Israel are preserved, the story of this battle is told in dramatic language. Joshua is pictured standing on the heights watching the disorganized host. It was about noon, and the sun stood high above the hills of Gibeon behind him, while the waning moon showed faintly over the valley to the west. There was a chance that the enemy might even yet escape in the hours of daylight that remained before darkness should overspread the battle-field. Then the inspired Israelitish captain, spoke before all the people;

Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon,
And thou moon in the valley of Ajalon:
And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed Until the people had avenged themselves
Upon their enemies.

And the sacred chronicle, after relating how this prayer was miraculously granted, and the terror-smitten Canaanites routed with great slaughter, adds:

"There was no day like that day before it or after, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man; for the Lord fought for Israel." This divinely-directed victory at Gibeon over an immensely superior force, led to the final subjugation of the whole of Southern Palestine.

El-Jib, the name ancient Gibeon now bears (which is shown in the photograph on this page), lies about seven miles northwest of Jerusalem. Its houses stand irregularly and unevenly, sometimes one apparently above another. Near it is the "pool of Gibeon"

kings of Palestine formed a confederacy to overcome the invading host, and began by besieging Gibeon. That city summoned than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword."

But the hand of the Almighty was to be where the armies of Abner and Joab had an encounter, and where Asahel died. Although a highway passes the place, El-Jib is but little visited, and save for its historical and Biblical associations, has few attractions for the tourist or the investigator.

HADASSAH.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Esther 2: 7: "And he brought up Hadassah."

BEAUTIFUL child was born in the capital of Persia. She was an orphan and a captive, her parents having been stolen from their Israelitish home and carried to Shushan, and had died, leaving their daughter poor and in a strange land. But an Israelite who had been carried into the same captivity was attracted by the case of the orphan. He educated her in his holy religion, and under the root of that good man this adopted child began to develop a sweetness and excellency of character it ever equalled, certainly never surpassed. Beautiful Hadassah! Could that adopted father ever spare her from his household? Her artlessness; her girlish sports; her innocence; her orphanage, had wound themselves thoroughly around his heart, just as around each parent's heart among us there are tendrils climbing, and fastening and blossoming, and growing stronger. I expect he was like others who have loved ones at home,—wondering sometimes if sickness will come, and death, and bereavement. Alas! Worse than anything that the father expects happens to his adopted child. Ahasuerus, a princely scoundrel, demands that Hadassah, the fairest one in all the kingdom, become his wife. Worse than death was marriage to such a monster of iniquity! How great the change when this young woman left the home where God was worshipped and religion honored, to enter a palace devoted to pride, idolatry and sensuality! "As a lamb to the slaughter!"

Ahasuerus knew not that his wife was a Jewess. At the instigation of the infamous prime minister the king decreed that all the Jews in the land should be slain. Hadassah pleads the cause of her people, breaking through the rules of the court, and presenting herself in the very face of death, crying: "If I perish, I perish." Oh, it was a sad time among that enslaved people! They had all heard the decree concerning their death. Sorrow, gaunt and ghastly, sat in thousands of households, and mothers wildly pressed their infants to their breasts as the days of massacre hastened on, praying that the same sword-stroke which slew the mother might also slay the child, rosebud and bud perishing in the same blast.

But Hadassah is busy at court. The hard heart of the king is touched by her story, and although he could not reverse his decree for the slaying of the Jews, he sent forth an order that they should arm themselves for defense. On horseback; on mules; on dromedaries, messengers sped through the land bearing the king's dispatches, and a shout of joy went up from that enslaved people at the faint hope of success. I doubt not many a rusty blade was taken down and sharpened. Unbearded youths grew stout as giants at the thought of defending mothers and sisters. Desperation strung up cowards into heroes, and fragile women grasping their weapons swung them about the cradles impatient for the time to strike the blow in behalf of household and country.

The day of execution dawned. Government officials, armed and drilled, cowed before the battle shout of the oppressed people. The cry of defeat rang back to the palaces, but above the mountains of dead, above 75,000 crushed and mangled corpses sounded the triumph of the delivered Jews, and their enthusiasm was as when the Highlanders came to the relief of Lucknow, and the English army which stood in the very jaws of death, at the sudden hope of assistance and rescue, lifted the shout above belching cannon and the death-groan of hosts, crying, "We are saved! We are saved!"

My subject affords me opportunity of illustrating what Christian character may be under the greatest disadvantages. There is no Christian now exactly what he wants to be. Your standard is much higher than anything you have attained unto. If there be any man so puffed up as to be thoroughly satisfied with the amount of excellency he has already attained, I have nothing to say to such a one. But to those who are dissatisfied with past attainments, who are toiling under disadvantages which are keeping them from being what they ought to be, I have a message from God. You each of you labor under difficulties. There is something in your temperament; in your worldly circumstances; in your calling, that acts powerfully against you. Admitting all this, I introduce to you Hadassah of the text, a noble Christian, notwithstanding the most gigantic difficulties. She whom you might have expected to be one of the worst of women, is one of the best.

In the first place, our subject is an illustration of what Christian character may be under orphanage. This Bible line tells a long story about Hadassah. "She had neither father nor mother." A nobleman had become her guardian, but there is no one who can take the place of a parent. Who so able at night to hear a child's prayer; or at twilight to chide youthful wanderings; or to soothe youthful sorrows? An individual will go through life bearing the marks of orphanage. It will require more strength, more persistence, more grace, to make such an one the right kind of a Christian. He who at 40 years loses a parent must reel under the blow. Even down to old age men are accustomed to rely upon the counsel, or be powerfully influenced by the advice of parents, if they are still alive. But how much greater the bereavement when it comes in early life, before the character is self-reliant, and when naturally the heart is unsophisticated and easily tempted.

And yet behold what a nobility of disposition Hadassah exhibited! Though father and mother were gone, grace had triumphed over all disadvantages. Her willingness to self-sacrifice; her control over the king; her humility; her faithful worship of God, show her to have been one of the best of the world's Christians.

There are those who did not enjoy remarkable early privileges. Perhaps, like the beautiful captive of the text, you were an orphan. You had huge sorrows in your little heart. You sometimes wept in the night when you knew not what was the matter. You felt sad sometimes even on the playground. Your father or mother did not stand in the door to welcome you when you came home from a long journey. You still feel the effect of early disadvantages, and you have sometimes offered them as a reason for your not being as thoroughly religious as you would like to be. But these excuses are not sufficient. God's grace will triumph if you seek it. He knows what obstacles you have fought against, and the more trial the more help. After all, there are no orphans in the world, for the great God is the Father of us all.

Again, our subject is an illustration of what religion may be under the pressure of poverty. The captivity and crushed condition of this orphan girl, and of the kind man who adopted her, suggest a condition of poverty. Yet, from the very first acquaintance we had with Hadassah we find her the same happy and contented Christian. It was only by compulsion she was afterwards taken into a sphere of honor and affluence. In the humble home of Mordecai, her adopted father, she was a light that illumined every privation. In some period in almost every man's life there comes a season of straitened circumstances when the severest calculation and most scraping economy are necessary in order to subsistence and respectability. At the commencement of business, at the entrance upon a profession, when friends are few and the world is afraid of you because there is a possibility of failure, many of the noblest hearts have struggled against poverty, and are now struggling. To such I bear a message of good cheer. You say it is a hard thing for you to be a Christian. This constant anxiety, this unresting calculation, wear out the buoyancy of your spirit, and although you have told perhaps no one about it, cannot I tell that this is the very trouble which keeps you from being what you ought to be? You have no time to think about laying up treasures in heaven when it is a matter of great doubt whether you will be enabled to pay your next quarter's rent. You cannot think of striving after a robe of righteousness until you can get means enough to buy an overcoat to keep out the cold. You want the Bread of Life, but you think you must get along without that until you can buy another barrel of flour for your wife and children. Sometimes you sit down discouraged and almost wish you were dead. Christians in satin slippers, with their feet on damask ottoman, may scout at such a class of temptations, but those who themselves have been in the struggle and grip of hard misfortune can appreciate the power of these evils to disuade the soul away from religious duties. We admit the strength of the temptation, but then we point to Hadassah, her poverty equalled by her piety. Courage down there in the battle! Hurl away your disappointment! Men of half your heart have, through Christ, been more than conquerors. In the name of God, come out of that! The religion of Christ is just what you want out there among the empty flour barrels and beside the cold hearths. You have never told anyone of what a hard time you have had, but God knows it as well as you know it. Your easy times will come after awhile. Do not let your spirits break down mid-life. What if your coat is thin? Run fast enough to keep warm. What if you have no luxuries on your table? High expectations will make your blood tingle better than the best Madeira. If you cannot afford to smoke, you can afford to whistle. But merely animal spirits are not sufficient; the power of the Gospel—that is what you want to wrench despair out of the soul and put you forward into the front of the hosts, encased in impenetrable armor. It does not require extravagant wardrobe, and palatial residence, and dashing equipage to make a man rich. The heart right the estate is right. A new heart is worth the world's wealth in one roll of bank bills; worth all sceptres of earthly power bound in one sheaf; worth all crowns expressed in one coronet. Many a man without a farthing in his pocket has been rich enough to buy the world out and have stock left for larger investment. It is not often that men of good habits come to positive beggary, but among those who live in comfortable houses all about you, among honest mechanics, and professional men who never say a word about it, there are exhibitions of heroism and endurance such as you may never have imagined. These men who ask no aid; who demand no sympathy; who with strong arm and skillful brain push their own way through, are Hannibals scaling the Alps; are Hercules slaying the lion; are Moses in God's name driving back the seas. Hadassah with her needle has done braver things than Cæsar with a sword.

Again, our subject illustrates what religion may be when in a strange land, or far from home. Hadassah was a stranger in Shushan. Perhaps brought up in the quiet of rural scenes, she was now surrounded by the dazzle of a city. Heads as strong as hers had been turned by the transit from country to city. More than that, she was in a strange land. Yet in that loneliness she kept the Christian's integrity, and was as consistent among the allurements of Shushan as among the kindred of her father's house.

Perhaps, I address some who are now far away from the home of their fathers. You came across the seas. The sepulchres of your dead are far away. Whatever may be the comfort and adornment of your present home, you cannot forget the place of your birth, though it may have been lowly and unhonored. You often dream of your youthful days, and in the silent twilight run off to the distant land and seem to see your forsaken home, just as it was when your people were all alive. Though you may have hundreds of friends around you, you often feel that you are strangers in a strange land. God saw the bitter partings when your families were scattered. He watched you in the ship's cabin floundering the stormy seas. He knew the bewilderment of your disembarkation on a strange shore, and your wanderings up and down this land have been under an eye that never sleeps, and felt by a heart that always pities. Stranger far from home, you have a companion in the beautiful Hadassah, a good in Shushan as in her native Jerusalem. Indeed, very many of you are distant from the place of your nativity. Some of you may be pilgrims from the warm South, or from harder climes than ours, from latitudes of deeper snows and sharper frosts. You have come down in these regions for purposes of thrift and gain. You have brought your tents and pitched them here and you seldom now go back again except to visit the old village with wide streets and plenty of trees, on some holiday. This is no the climate in which many of you were born. These mothers are not the neighbors who came to the old homestead to greet you into life. These churches are no those under the shadow of which your grandfather was buried. These are not the ministers of Christ who out of the baptismal font sprinkled your baby brow. Far away the kirk! Far away the homestead! Far away the town! Have you former habits which would not have seemed right in the places and times of which we speak? Have you built an altar in your present abode? Is the religion of olden time one planted in your heart come up in glorious harvest? Is your present home an eulog upon that from which you were transplanted? Then are ye worthy companions of Hadassah, the stranger as holy in Shushan as in Jerusalem.

Again, our subject illustrates what religion may be under the temptation of personal attractiveness. The inspired record says of the heroine of my text, "She was fair and beautiful." Her very name signified, "A myrtle." Yet the admiration, and praise, and flattery of the world did no blight her humility. The simplicity of her manners and behavior equalled her extraordinary attractions. It is the same divine goodness which puts the tinge on the rose's cheek, and the whiteness into the lily, and the gleam on the wave, and that puts color in the cheek, and sparkle in the eye, and majesty in the forehead, and symmetry in to the form, and gracefulness into the gait. But many through the very charm of their personal appearance have been destroyed. There are many flowers that bow down so modestly you cannot see the color in their cheek until you lift up their head, putting your hand under their round chin. Indeed, any kind of personal attractions, whether they be those of the body, the mind, or the heart, may become temptations to pride, and foolish assumption. While the most of us will not have the same kind of temptation which Hadassah must have felt from her attractiveness of personal appearance, there may be some to whom it will be an advantage to hold up the character of the beautiful captive who sacrificed not her humility and earnestness of disposition to the world's admiration and flattery.

Again, our subject exhibits what religion may be under bad domestic influences. Hadassah was snatched from the godly home into which she had been adopted, and introduced into the abominable associations or which wicked Ahasuerus was the centre. What a whirl of blasphemy, and drunkenness, and licentiousness! No altar, no prayer, no Sabbath, no God! If this captive girl can be a Christian there, then it is possible to be a Christian anywhere.

There are a great many of the best people of the world who are obliged to contend with the most adverse domestic influences, children who have grown up into the love of God under the crown of parents, and under the discouragement of bad example. Some sister of the family having professed the faith of Jesus is the subject of unbounded satire inflicted by brothers and sisters. Yea, Hadassah was not the only Christian who had a queer husband. It is no easy matter to maintain correct Christian principles when there is a companion disposed to scoff at them, and to ascribe every imperfection of character to hypocrisy. What a hard thing for one member of the family to rightly keep the Sabbath when others are disposed to make it a day of revelry; or to indicate propriety of speech to the minds of children when there are others to offset the instructions by loose and profane utterances; or to be regularly in attendance upon church when there is more household work demanded for the Lord's Day than is demanded for any secular day. Do I speak of any laboring under these blighting disadvantages? My subject is full of encouragement. Vast responsibilities rest upon you. Be faithful, though you stand as alone as did Lot in Sodom, or Jeremiah in Jerusalem, or Jonah in Nineveh, or Hadassah in the court of Ahasuerus. There are trees which grow the best when their roots clutch among the jagged rocks, and to verily have but poor soil in which to develop, but Grace is a thorough husbandman and can raise a crop anywhere. Glassware moulded over the fire, and in the same way you are to be fitted as a vessel of glory. The Christian victory will be fought just in proportion as the battle is hot. Never despair being a thorough Christian any household which is not worse than the court of Ahasuerus.

Finally, our subject illustrates what reason may be in high worldly position. The one we see in the Bible of Hadassah is that she has become the Queen of Persia. Presently now to see the departure of her humility, and self-sacrifice, and religious principle. As she goes up you may expect Grace to go down. It is easier to be humble in the obscure house of her adopted father than on a throne of dominion. But you misjudge this noble woman. What she was before, she is now—the myrtle. Applauded for her beauty and her crown, she forgets not the cause of her suffering people, and with all simplicity of heart, still remains a worshipper of the God of heaven.

Noble example followed only by a very few. I address some who, through the goodness of God, have risen to positions of influence in the community where you live. In law, in merchandise, in medicine, in mechanics, and in other useful occupations and professions you hold an influence for good, or for evil. Let us see whether, like Hadassah, you can stand elevation. Have you as much simplicity of character as once you evidenced? Do you feel as much dependence upon God; as much your own weakness; as much your accountability for talents entrusted? Or are you proud, and over-demanding, and ungrateful, and unsympathetic, and worldly, and sensual, and devilish? Then you have been spoiled by your success, and you shall not sit on this throne with the heroine of my text. In the day when Hadassah shall come to the grander coronation, in the presence of Christ and the bannered hosts of the redeemed, you will be poor indeed.

A NOOK IN THE GRAND BAZAAR, CONSTANTINOPLE.

While last autumn all through the forests there were luxuriant trees with moderate out-branch, and moderate height, pretending but little, there were foliage shafts that shot far up, looking down with contempt on the whole forest, clapping their hands in the breeze and shouting, "Aha! Do you not wish you were as high up as we are?" But last week a blast let loose from the north, came rushing along and grappling the boasting oaks, hurled them to the ground, and, as they went down, an old tree that had been singing psalms with the thunder one hundred summers, cried out, "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." And humble hickory, and pine and chestnut that had never said their prayers before, bowed their heads as much as to say, "Amen!"

My friends, "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to humble." Take from my subject encouragement. Attempt the service of God, whatever your disadvantages, and whatever our lot, let us seek that grace which outshone all the splendors of the palaces of Shushan.

STAMBOUL'S DESOLATE HOMES.

Thousands of Earthquake Sufferers still Camping Out—The Royal Relief Commission at Work—Appreciation of American Sympathy.

LETTERS received in New York from Constantinople state that the many assurances of practical sympathy received from different European countries, but more especially from the United States, have produced a feeling of deep gratification among all classes in the stricken city. The general condition of affairs among the sufferers whose homes were totally destroyed by the earthquakes is but little changed. They are still camped out in large numbers in the Pera district and elsewhere, and the regular distribution of food is maintained under the direction of the Imperial Relief Commission. This Commission—which is under the immediate patronage of the Sultan—is presided over by His Excellency, Redvan Pasha, the head of the Municipality of Constantinople. Associated with this official, otherwise concerning the extent of the devastation, and which have been published from time to time in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In the illustration on this page is shown a section of the Grand Bazaar in Constantinople, a famous resort for purchasers from all lands and which was one of the leading attractions of the Turkish capital. It is now a mere shapeless ruin.

Not a single dwelling in Stamboul seems to have wholly escaped the earthquake. The lot of those thousands who have been suddenly reduced from respectable industry to destitution would have been one hardly to be borne had not the kindness of the Porte, no less than the sympathy of Christian Europe and America come to their aid. As it is, they stand in need of both food and clothing.

It should not be forgotten that the Turkish Relief Fund presents an opportunity for still further breaking down the old barrier of antagonism that has existed for generations between Moslem and Christian. All Europe has already recognized this and has been quick to respond to the call for aid. Our own land, which has been so nobly responsive in the past, will not be heedless of the appeal of the Fund Committee for Constantinople's homeless thousands, including Greek, Jew, Armenian and Moslem. It is a movement in which all may help, and that must be fruitful of blessing to every sharer in the work. All contributions to the Fund will be acknowledged in these columns. The sums contributed during the week were as follows:

there are eleven other members in the Commission: two from the State Council, two from the Treasury Department, one from the Judiciary, one from the Municipality, one from the Ottoman Bank, and one each from the Greek, Armenian, Jewish and Catholic communities. Already a large amount of relief moneys has been paid over by the Commission to these religious communities, all of which suffered very heavily by the earthquakes. The support of the daily system of food supplies for the homeless population in tents, constitutes a serious draft upon the relief funds, which must soon become exhausted.

Throughout Stamboul, the older portion of the capital, the suffering is still very general, and is most keenly felt among tradesmen and shopkeepers, who, having lost business and homes together, now find themselves dependent upon public charity until the restoration of the ruined part of the city by rebuilding affords them an opportunity of resuming their avocations.

Rev. Dr. A. F. Schauffler, of the New York City Mission and Tract Society, who has just returned from a tour in the east, speaking of the Constantinople calamity, says: "The earthquake in Constantinople was much more destructive than would appear from the reports in the American papers. During the awful shocks 164 mosques were wholly or partially destroyed, and 1,500 stores in the bazaar were buried in the ruins." This confirms the statements that have reached this country in letters and

A SABBATH IN CAPERNAUM.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 21. Mark 1: 21-34. Golden Text, Mark 1: 22. By Mrs. Baxter.

JESUS had constituted at least four of his disciples "fishers of men," that he might associate them with him in his work of seeking and saving that which was lost. Now we follow him into one Sabbath in the days of his ministry,—a sample of many others—when accompanied by them, he carried out the will of his Father in heaven. "He entered the synagogue and taught." This was his custom, but custom with him was never suffered to make his work mechanical. He was ever the Image and the Instrument, the Word and the Messenger of his Father. The Son of God was always, and at all times, the Messenger sent of God. For every new day and every new hour, for every separate occurrence, however ordinary, he was his Father's representative: "Neither came I of myself, but he sent me." (John 8: 42.) "And they were astonished at his teaching, for he taught them and not as the scribes." (R.V.) God's Word shall not return unto him void; it shall accomplish that which he pleases, and prosper in the thing whereunto he sent it. It is the same power which created and maintains this mighty universe: "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made." He upholdeth "all things by the word of his power." The people in the synagogue were conscious that this was no word of mere learning, spoken in the routine of their ordinary worship; it appealed to them, it searched them, they could not get away from it; God was speaking to them and they knew it. Whenever a man of God speaks as a true messenger, the effect will be the same; men will be brought face to face with God, whether they will or no. Things which they have long heard of by the ear will become personal realities to them; they will know that God sent the man who spoke to them, and they may forget everything else they ever heard sooner than that message from the living God.

But wherever the true work of God exists, there the enemy comes in to spoil and hinder. Satan arranged that just when consciences are being aroused, and the Word of God was going home to hearts,—just at the critical moment when, perhaps, great decisions were pending, there should be

A Distraction.

"Straightway there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit." (R.V.) How many an evangelist might have thought, "How unfortunate that this unhappy man should come just now, just when such a deep impression has been made." Jesus lived a life of unbroken faith in the wisdom and love of his Father. To him nothing happened by chance; it was no accident that this man had come into the midst of the assembled congregation just then. What his Father permitted, Jesus permitted also; it could not be wrong; He could trust his Father with the souls to whom he had sent him. The man began to be noisy: could Jesus trust still and was his Father really undertaking? It went further, the poor demoniac interrupted him saying: "What have we to do with thee, Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art the holy One of God." Jesus had trusted to his Father, and his Father had made the very demons to witness to him. And meanwhile the obedient Son of God waited on his Father for further counsel. Then directed from on high, he rebuked him saying, "Hold thy peace and come out of him, and the unclean spirit tearing him and crying with a loud voice, came out of him."

"When he had thrown him in the midst he came out of him." The apparent distraction trusted to his Father, became a means by which his Word was illustrated and enforced, and the authority with which he spoke was sealed by the deed of power. Oh, how safe it is to trust God! Nothing can happen without his permission, and he makes "all things work together for good to them that love him." (Rom. 8: 29.)

If the impression produced by his preaching had been great, it was tenfold greater now that the man, delivered from the demon, was sitting harmless in their midst, and the people had witnessed his deliverance. They were all amazed, inasmuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What is this? A new teaching? With authority he commandeth even the unclean spirits, and they obey him" (ver. 27, R.V.) They could not keep it to themselves; one told another, until that very day, "the report of him went out straightway into all the region of Galilee round about" (R.V.) It was the beginning of the day but much had been done. It was not only the teaching of the people and the deliverance of the poor man which had been accomplished, but Jesus had also manifested to his disciples, and to the people, how as man he could trust his Father with circumstances; and he was educating his disciples while pursuing his ministry.

The Lord Jesus never sought after popularity but always shunned it. "Straightway when they were come out of the synagogue they came into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John." Away from the eyes of the multitude out of sight. Such was generally the instinct of Jesus, and every true witness for God instinctively gets away from man, after having borne a message from God. He cannot discharge himself of his message or throw it off for the time, as a tired man of business can turn entirely from the things which have occupied him during the day, to seek distraction and refreshment in his family life, or in home pursuits when the day's work is over. A witness for God is never off duty, he is a living sacrifice; all he is as well as all he says and does, touches his vocation. Sleeping or waking, on a journey or at home, in the congregation or in a few moments of conversation with a stranger, in the shop or in the street, at table at home or abroad, he never ceases to be

A Witness for His Master.

Our beloved Lord never ceased for one moment of his life to be his Father's witness, and he is the true example of all who would bear witness of him. Entering Simon Peter's house, perhaps to take refuge from the multitude, he was there for his Father. "Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever; and straightway they tell him of her." Luke says (4: 38, 39) and being a physician he would probably give the most graphic and correct account; Simon's wife's mother was holden with a great fever; and they besought him for her. And he stood over her and rebuked the fever; and it left her; and immediately she rose up and administered unto them. "I am the Lord that healeth thee" (Ex. 16: 26) was one of the names of Jehovah to his people Israel. Jesus came in his Father's name and was known already as the healer, the Great Physician. Where he is given full sway sin, sickness and self disappear from before him. The sick woman was no sooner healed than she ministered to Christ and to his disciples. There are many who seek healing and would fain be healed by the Lord for their own convenience and comfort, or to attain their own ends and purposes. Jesus made no compact with this woman, that if he healed her she should minister to him, but he saw in her the true spirit which did not seek its own, which would yield the restored life a living sacrifice to him. "Let my people go," from sin and condemnation, from sickness and infirmity, "that they may serve me." The object of our God in all his dealings with his people is to separate them from themselves and their own selfish life. "He died for all that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died and rose again." "If any man will come after me let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." We are saved that we may minister to him; we are healed that we may minister to him. There is in Scripture as that any should be saved for the sake of the joy and comfort which salvation may bring to them, or healed for no higher end than their own personal comfort. And yet the greater number of believers are more anxious about their own joy and personal satisfaction than about ministering to Jesus, and the thought of what will rejoice his heart is a very occasional one with them.

NATIVES OF CAPERNAUM.

structure, its walls ten feet thick and its roof supported with rows of fine columns. If Tel Hum is really Capernaum these ruins would be the remains of the synagogue built by the Roman Centurion. (Luke 7: 5.) At that time the synagogue was apparently a comparatively modern innovation. No mention is made of such an institution prior to the Captivity, from which we infer that up to that time there was no public worship apart from the Temple. It probably originated in the need of the exiles in Babylon for some place in which they could read their Scriptures and pray. After their return the benefit of such meeting-places would not be forgotten and they would be established as supplementary to the periodical visits to Jerusalem and the Temple. The word synagogue means congregation, and the synagogue service, unlike that of the Temple, was congregational worship. Selections were read from the Law, the Psalms and the Prophets; prayer was offered and an address given. On this occasion Jesus made the address, and the people were impressed by his manner of teaching. It was not the style of the scribes who occupied themselves with minute and trivial questions of the law and ritual, such as whether a blind man who used his staff in groping his way on the Sabbath, was or was not breaking the law against carrying a burden on the holy day. If Jesus used such words as he did on another occasion (Matt. 5: 21-48): "Ye have heard that it hath been said, . . . But I say unto you," it was not surprising that his hearers said he spoke as one that had authority. During or after the service, he gave proof that he had such authority by a remarkable cure. The dreaded malady, known to the Jews of that time as "possession of the devil," manifested itself in one of the men present. It apparently resembled what we know as epilepsy, but was a distinct variety of the disease peculiar to the time. Possibly it was the result of an attempt on the part of the enemy of souls to embarrass Jesus in his work. The subject of the influence lost control of his faculties and acted and spoke as if he were an incarnation of evil. In our own day we recognize in a minor degree such influences when we speak of certain crimes as inhuman or diabolical. Jesus emancipated the man by a word and sternly rejected the testimony to his divinity offered by the man's lips. He would have no support or help from such a source. Later he cured Peter's mother-in-law of fever and in the evening the sick people came in a crowd to him, making the place as a great writer has said, like a camp hospital and Jesus cured them of their diseases. So ended the day and Jesus retired; but probably suffering from nervous exhaustion, was unable to sleep, for he went of long before dawn to seek recuperation in prayer.

Taught them as one that had authority. One of the early missionaries to Tahiti, hearing that dishonesty was regarded in the island as a venial fault, and that there was even god of thieves who was worshipped and was supposed to protect the robbers from detection, preached a vigorous sermon (the sin of stealing). The next morning opening his doors he found his enclosure full of natives, and in the middle of the company a high heap of property of all kind. "It is all stolen stuff," said the leader of the party. "We thought when we were pagans that there was no harm in stealing, we could do it without being caught. But when we heard you say yesterday that Jehovah had commanded that we should not steal, we could not rest, and we have brought it all to you that you may give back to the owners."

A man with an unclean spirit. The word are used in the sense of a spirit defiling and degrading the man. He could not bear the presence of Christ and called out, "Let alone." But the purity of the Holy One involved the exposure and expulsion of the evil. Among a party who visited a sulphur spring in the south, was a lady who was much admired for the beauty of her complexion which she insisted was entirely natural. While the party stood around the spring a great change came over the lady's face. Her friends noticed that it was discolored in large patches. Marks as bruises appeared on her cheeks and forehead as if she had received heavy blows. She was wholly unconscious of the change, but her friends were alarmed at it, when she saw her face in a mirror she, too, was troubled and consented to a physician being summoned. All thought she was stricken with some terrible disease. But the physician allayed their fears. He said the lady had used a cosmetic on her face the ingredients of which had been chemically affected by the sulphur in the spring. He added that he was surprised that any one who used such ointments did not know enough to keep away from sulphur in that form. It was a terrible revealer in such matters.

I know thee who thou art: the Holy One of God. An American lady living in Japan came acquainted with an intelligent young student. She offered to teach him English and he gladly accepted. The first book given him for translation was the Gospel of John. The young man plodded away tent on learning the language, but as he became familiar with it his manner changed. He grew intensely interested in the subject. One day, after going over his translation he said, "This Jesus, I have heard of him as a great Teacher, as a great Man; but I have been reading and I see he could not have been a man; he was God."

They obey him. Many people think that they are so much under the power of the evil habit that they can never be emancipated. But neither liquor, nor opium, nor swearing, nor any other evil, is so strong but it will yield when the victim sincerely and honestly seeks deliverance of Christ. La Fontaine once preached before a regiment on the duty of controlling the temper. The Major was a man of ungovernable temper, and when he met the preacher the next day, he frankly spoke of the fact, and said that it could never be cured. La Fontaine argued with him, but to no purpose. The Major was in despair. He said he had tried so many times and failed that he would not try again. "It will yield," said La Fontaine, "to a stronger power. Do you yield into a passion it you are provoked with the king is present?" The Major admitted that he did not. "Then," said the preacher, "a passion that will yield to your loyalty and reverence for your king, will yield the power of the King of kings. It is a common that knows its master."

STRANGE JAPANESE SUPERSTITIONS.

Yet Amid all there is the Desire for Immortality—Death and Burial Customs of the Ainu—Gospel Progress in the Mikado's Empire.

certain portions of the Japanese Empire. He writes:

"When an Ainu dies, the body, be it that of a man, woman, or child, is dressed in its best clothes, all of which are first cut or torn a little and laid out by the fireside. Should the dead person be a man, his bow and arrow and quiver, his pipe and tobacco-box, a long and short knife, a sword, a cup and tray, and mustache-lifters, and also a bundle of clothes, are placed by his side. All of the clothes are more or less cut or torn, even should they be new garments. Also every one of the other things is broken, ripped or bent. All are buried with the body. Should the corpse be that of a woman, some needles and thread, some native Japanese clothes of various colors and kinds, a set of weaving implements, spoons, ladles, a cup and her trinkets, such as beads and earrings, are placed by her side, also a bundle of clothes, all cut and torn. Children also have a cup, a spoon, some clothes and trinkets placed by them. But the great point to be borne in mind is that all these things are buried with the corpse, and are always first cut or otherwise injured. As soon as death takes place, friends are notified of the fact and a feast is made. This is not indeed a feast for pleasure, but for mourning, weeping, howling and bidding farewell to the departing person, for

must not be looked upon as departed until the body has been placed in the grave. Some of the food, which consists of boiled cakes made of millet, is broken and reverently placed upon the corner of the hearth to be buried with the corpse, and drops of wine are sprinkled in a circle around the head with a mustache-licker, while prayer is being devoutly offered up to the spirit of the departed and to the god. All the people who have come together for the feast also break up their cakes and bury part under the ashes by the fire while eating the remainder. These remnants seem to be the share set apart for the goddess of fire. After the feast is over, all these fragments (the essence having now it is thought been devoured by the goddess) are gathered up with the ashes, and thrown away. It would not do to leave them upon the hearth, as they would be constantly turned up whenever the fire was stirred, and in that way remind friends of death. This feast goes by the name of the "bad thing and drinking," and "the broken thing." This feast having been partaken of, and prayers duly said, the body, together with the things to be buried with it, is taken to the grave. A cooking pot is carried with the other things, which after having been broken, is put upon the grave by the post which answers as a tombstone. Fresh water is also carried in a wooden basin, with which, after the ceremony all those who have taken direct part in the ritual wash their hands. This basin is then broken, by having the bottom knocked out, and placed over the tombstone. When the child is buried the same customs prevail, the only difference being that the pole used in carrying the body to the grave is, as a rule, of the elder tree. The bodies of adults, however, are carried with any other wood that happens to be handy, but by no means the elder be used.

There are customs connected with death and burial of which I might speak, but as I have now mentioned bear directly upon the Ainu ideas concerning religion and either the spirit or life of the person goes after it leaves the body. I suppose the question will be asked: Why do the Ainu break and chip and bend the implements, and cut and tear the clothes which they bury with dead? or, why indeed should these things be buried with them at all? Then again it will be asked why all this ceremony of breaking up millet cakes and knocking the bottoms out of pots and basins? These questions have been asked and variously answered. They have puzzled me for years and I have, I must confess, but just discovered their true meaning. It is said by some persons that the people bury these things with their owners because the work is now over and there will be no more use for them and as a proof of this they mention the fact of their first being broken. I will dismiss this by informing you, that it is not so, according to Ainu ideas. This reason is really an imported one, and is not native at all. If you ask the Ainu, the general answer will be, "to keep the Japanese from stealing them!" But this is certainly not true. A third and truer and more general idea is that the things are buried with the corpse because the spirit is supposed to require them in the next world. This, as in the case with other races, is the done to the body by gods, demons, or men. It is the body only which dies and decays, the spirit never. As, therefore, the living spirits of men will require all this furniture in the next world, the various articles are each in their separate persons or bodies damaged, and their spirits are thus caused to go with their owners to serve them there. Their bodies are damaged, i.e., they are killed. Hence as the human body will, when in the home beyond the grave, need clothing to wear, a quantity is first killed by being cut and then buried; as it will require food, the millet cakes are first killed by being broken, and then sent off on their journey. Coats, I should have said, are cut from the neck down the back, for the backbone is supposed to be the seat of life. These things are pretty curious, mysterious, and very deep, but they serve as very good eye-openers by which we may learn to understand this truly peculiar people. Now death is a thing which cannot take place in a hurry; that is to say, nothing is thoroughly dead till every part of the body in which it lived is decomposed into its elements. Hence, when a body is buried, life or spirit still exists in the grave in some degree, till all has been decomposed. We can therefore understand how it is the people believe that and are afraid to go near them. When the body is in the grave the spirit is there also, in the night. She dreamt, she said, that I had lost my purse and should not be able to pay for my lodging! Of course I paid at once. It was a witty hint.

The district I visited during the tour just ended was that of Piratori, and a very full and pleasant time I had. I was preaching every night to large audiences, and during the day and early evening teaching catechumens and children. Piratori consists of an upper and lower part, separated by about five minutes' walk. All the women in the upper part of the village have, with the exception of one person, been baptized. Most of them were baptized last year, and the solitary non-Christian woman has now asked for baptism. This year all the mothers brought their little children to me to christen. I think there were about twenty of them, so that I had a very hard time at suggesting names, which I must say is one of the most difficult tasks I am called upon to perform. I also baptized some adults from the lower part of the village. There have been now 165 persons baptized in these two villages, so mightily has the Lord worked in and through us.

We have just commenced building a church at Piratori, and the poor people are delighted. It will be the first actual church the Ainu race has ever had, and it is being built in the old Ainu capital. This is a grand triumph of the Gospel of Christ, and an evidence of the Saviour's mighty power and love. The Christians and a few well-disposed heathens each gave a day's hard toil in clearing the land for the church and glebe, and all is now ready for the carpenters, who are actually on the spot. It is wonderful what an impetus this kind of thing gives to the work. The capital, Piratori, will serve as a splendid centre from which to work. Indeed, it has already become the centre of a very interesting mission. The church even now calls itself the true

Mother of the Ainu Churches.

This is good, and gives all the members an interest in what is going on around. It is nice to think that the people look upon the church as their very own.

In one village, which is easily reached from Piratori, and where Mr. Otani, the catechist, has been working, there are now thirty-nine inquirers. I received these as catechumens at the beginning of this month. Mr. Otani has been working here and at Piratori for two years, and another Japanese and Petros, my Ainu assistant, have been helping him for two months. In another village, just about two miles from Piratori, I had the pleasure of baptizing twenty-five persons. There are also many more preparing for that rite. In this village there lives a poor Christian man who has disease of the spine and whose legs are completely paralyzed. He lies by his fireside all the time. He spent nearly the whole of last year here at Sapor in our Ainu hospital rest. While here he became a Christian and was Taught to Read and Sing.

On visiting him I was surprised to find that he gathers the children together every day, teaches them the catechism and some hymns. He now asks for reading books, so as to be able to teach them to read! All this is done quite voluntarily and without a word having been said either by him or us. Surely this is the Holy Spirit prompting. Besides all this, there are many more catechumens in other villages who were received as such last year. But these I cannot yet baptize, because we have been too short-handed to give them sufficient instruction. Poor people, I wish we could be more with them!

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietors, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labor for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

true reason. Extinction and absorption of the spirit forms no part of the Ainu idea of death. Each one will have, it is supposed, a distinct, definite, personal life in a body beyond the grave. And there he will require his hunting and working and cooking utensils. He will have his hut, his wife and dogs, in fact everything as it is here.

The Ainu idea of life is that it is spirit, whether hidden, latent and secret, or manifested and openly energetic. Every possible thing you can imagine as existing has its separate, individual spirit, and always will have. If we lose it in this, it will be found in the next world. It can never be lost or extinguished. Thus, swords, bows, arrows, cups, mustache-lifters, pots, basins, pans, knives, spoons, needles, blankets, beads, earrings, cotton, thread, string, boots, coats, mats—every individual thing is supposed to have its separate and distinct spirit and personality, which can never be lost, whatever happens.

It will Live in Another World.

A spoon will be a spoon there, a sword a sword, a hat a hat, and a pair of shoes will still remain a pair of shoes. You will now probably begin to see the real reason for breaking these things when the owner dies. Death itself is caused by some harm being in part at least, gradually freeing itself from its earthly tabernacle and must be carefully left alone. No one must intrude on its domain, for it requires room and perfect freedom. In this idea, therefore, must be sought the reason why the Ainu bury in separate places far away in the forests and not in cemeteries. These then, and many others like them, are the superstitions the Gospel of Christ is overcoming among the poor Ainu. May his heavenly kingdom here increase mightily.

I have just returned from an itinerating tour in one of my fields of labor, and before I start on another, which I have arranged to do this week, I must tell you of a very sharp and witty thing I experienced on the morning of my return to Sapor. I spent the previous night at a village in which I had never slept before, though I had passed through it frequently. These people did not quite know the requirements and ways of a foreigner, for there were no plates or basins, or anything of the kind to be had in the hut. I was, therefore, obliged to eat my supper out of a frying-pan I always carry with me, for a Bible and a frying-pan are my inseparable and most useful companions when itinerating. Five boards were set upon a stand as my bed. The mistress of the hut was evidently afraid that I would

Bible House, New York City.

THE Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has succeeded in arranging for a remarkable series of premiums. First of all, of course, is the International Teacher's Bible, with all the Helps and Maps, set in Ruby type, Divinity circuit binding overlapping at the ends, with red under gold edges. This eminently serviceable and very pretty Bible is again offered, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at $2. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-Five.

Next in order comes that most beautiful of Bibles known as the International Emerald Teacher's Bible, London Clear Type Edition, leather bound and leather lined, with silk book mark and silk head bands and silk sewed. There were times when a Bible like this would cost $8. To day it cannot be bought everywhere even at $5; but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers it, together with a year's subscription, at $3. This book will last a lifetime. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-Three.

We also continue to offer Dr. Talmage's most marvelous book "From Manger to Throne," which has proved of infinite value to tens of thousands of people, presenting as it does a new view of the life of our Saviour, magnificently illustrated, with many pictures based on photos brought from Palestine by Dr. Talmage, while journeying in the Holy Land with a view to gathering material for this, his latest and greatest work. As last year, so this year, we offer "From Manger to Throne" with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer : B-Four.

Next to a Teachers' Bible, the "Gospel Hymns" sung by Moody and Sankey in their great evangelistic services throughout America and England, are dearest to many a Christian's heart. Never before has it been possible to secure these 739 Hymns, constituting the books usually known as Gospel Hymns 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 all in one volume, but the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, after a conference with the publishers of Gospel Hymns, has succeeded in obtaining a large edition of these marvelously soul-stirring hymns in combined form, without a duplicate and without an omission, printed from large type and set to music, and beautifully bound in maroon cloth, with red edges and gilt. A handsomer hymnal has never been put on the market, and these "Six volumes of Sacred Song, complete in One," are offered to our subscribers with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. If, when you get the volume, you are not entirely pleased in every respect, send it back, and we will immediately refund your money. Messrs. Moody and Sankey in commending the volume say ;

The hymns in this book have been greatly blessed of God to many in our meetings as well as outside of them. May they in this combined form continue to enjoy the blessing of Him to whose honor and glory they have been sung in this and other lands.

This very desirable Premium contains about 700 pages, each page measuring 5½ x 8 inches. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-Two.

Finally, we offer Dr. Talmage's great book, "The Pathway of Life," a large edition of which has been specially prepared for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Talmage kindly consenting to waive all claims to royalty. This great book containing 544 pages, having for a frontispiece a picture of Dr. Talmage recently taken in Australia, embellished by 200 beautiful engravings, in an exceedingly handsome binding of cloth and gold, and sent out into the world to make it better and more useful and more serviceable, is offered in connection with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $2. The book weighs three pounds and measures, when open, from tip to tip 9x15 inches. In shape and size it is a companion book to "From Manger to Throne," but otherwise entirely distinct. This book has been read with interest by Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, ex-President Hayes, ex-President Harrison, Major Gen. O. O. Howard, Secretary J. G. Carlisle, Bishop Vincent, Joseph Cook, Governor Fitzhugh Lee, Bishop Hurst, Miss Frances Willard, General Sherman, Senator John Sherman, John G. Whittier, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Grace Greenwood, Neal Dow, and many other men and women noted throughout the English-speaking world, all of whom unite in warmly and cordially endorsing it. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-One.

Remember that all our Premiums are sent either by mail or express, all charges fully pre-paid.

IF a man find himself in an ancestral current where there is good blood, running smoothly from generation to generation, it is not a very great credit to him if he turn out good and honest and pure and upright and noble. He could hardly help it. But, suppose he is born in a hereditary line where the influences have been bad, and there has been a coming down over a moral declivity, if the man surrender to the influences he will go down in an over-mastering gravitation, unless some supernatural aid can be afforded him. Now, such a person deserves, not your excommunication, but your pity. Do not sit with the lip curled in scorn and with an assumed air of angelic innocence looking down upon such moral precipitation. You had better get down upon your knees and thank the Lord that you have not been thrown under the wheels of that juggernaut. But, supposing now that in this age, where there are so many good people, that I select the very best man, I don't mean the man who would style himself the best, for, probably, he is a hypocrite, but I mean the man who is really the best. I will take you out from your elevated surroundings. I will take you back to boyhood. I will put you in a depraved home. I will put you in a cradle of iniquity. Who is that bending over that cradle? An intoxicated mother. Who is that swearing in the next room? Your father. The neighbors come in and talk and their jokes are unclean. There is not in the house one moral treatise. After awhile you are old enough to get out of the cradle, and you are struck across the head for naughtiness, but never in any kindly manner reprimanded. After awhile you are old enough to go abroad, and you are sent out with a basket to steal. If you come home without any spoil you are whipped until the blood comes. At 15 years of age you are sent out to fight your own battles in this world, which seems to care no more for you than for the dog that has died in a fit under the fence. You are kicked and cuffed and buffeted. Some day, rallying your courage, you resist some wrong. A man says: "Who are you? I know who you are. Your father had free lodgings at Sing Sing. Your mother was up for drunkenness at the Tombs court. Get out of my way, you low-lived wretch." Suppose that had been the history of your advent and the history of your earlier surroundings. Would you have been what you are? I tell you, no. You would have been a vagabond, an outlaw, a murderer on the scaffold atoning for your crime. All these considerations ought to make us merciful in our dealings with others.

IT is a healthful ambition to have in official position men moral, intelligent and competent. The question is a question of equipment. The interests involved are too vast to be entrusted to those incompetent. A man may be competent for one position and not for another. So that mere intelligence is not sufficient. Adaptation to the work to be done becomes a supreme thought at such an hour. There can be no difficulty in finding out the presence or the absence of such qualification, for all the lights are turned on the exposed head of everyone who runs for any office in this country. It is easy to find out what are truths and what are falsehoods regarding any man in nomination. This country has from time to time showed its contempt for brains and good morals by pushing aside the wisest and best men and making sheriffs and aldermen and mayors and governors and presidents out of material astounding both for stupidity and infirm morals. The best argument that I know of to prove the worth of our institutions is that incompetency and corruption have not been able to wreck them. It must be a stout craft that can sail through such cyclones. This country can stand more maladministration than any country under the sun. Notwithstanding all the thefts for scores of years by common councilmen and legislatures and congresses we have more resources than can be foundered. While we deplore the briberies and the swindles and Credit Mobiliers and the river and harbor bills that have put their leeches on the neck and heart and hands and feet of this country, we are grateful that there is enough good blood yet circulating in the body politic to keep this a strong nation. Had there been less vitality in our institutions, and had our fathers exercised less wisdom in their establishment, those institutions would long before this have gone under. Bless the Lord for his securing mercy!

J. M. O., New York City. A friend of mine has two children—nice, bright little boys of five and six years—whom he would like to place in some good Christian family in the country, either in New York State, New Jersey or Connecticut. He will pay a small amount weekly for each to assist in their support and education.

There are many childless homes to which these little ones would come like a beam of blessed sunshine. Any of our readers who would like to undertake this work, can learn all particulars on addressing Mr. O., care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Mrs. J. M. Swift, Northville, Mich. What is the Chinese idea of death and a future life?

Their religious systems show no trace of a belief in personal immortality. After death, as they hold, the material parts of man belong to the earth, and the higher and lower spiritual parts are absorbed by different spirits.

R. S., New York City. Was the poet John Milton a Roman Catholic and did he ever hold any position under Oliver Cromwell?

He was a Protestant, as was his father, who had been disinherited by Milton's grandfather.

for leaving the Catholic Church and adopting the Protestant faith. Young Milton was originally intended for the church, and he had a Puritan tutor, Thomas Young, but circumstances prevented the realization of his parents' wishes in that respect. Milton was appointed Secretary for Foreign Tongues to the Council of State, six weeks after the execution of Charles I., and held the office till a short time previous to the Restoration.

W. G. Young, Philadelphia, Pa. What does Paul mean in Romans 3 : 7, by his remark about a lie causing the truth of God to abound?

He was not stating his own opinion, but was summarizing the arguments of opponents and scoffers, in order to refute them. The previous verses of the chapter are of the same kind. He had the Jews specially in mind in his argument, and he is showing them that a man who brings such reasoning as that in the third, fifth, seventh and eighth verses is inconsistent and illogical.

L. P. Matthew, Crete, Neb. 1. In Numbers 14: 6 Joshua is said to be the son of Nun. But who was Nun? Have we any information in regard to him? 2. Was Joshua married or had he an family? 3. Was Timnath-Serah, the inheritance selected, and which was assigned him, a very desirable one, a hill-top in Mount Ephraim, or did it illustrate the perfect unselfishness of his nature?

1. Nun is supposed to have been an Israelite of the tribe of Ephraim, but no account of his life is given. 2. Nothing is stated on this point although it is a reasonable presumption that he was married, since the people assigned him an inheritance. 3. It was probably a very desirable location, and as such was chosen to him by the Israelites as a reward for his brilliant and faithful public services.

A. A., New York. 1. Is it right for a bookkeeper or stenographer to use the firm's supplies for their private correspondence? 2. If science prove that man was in existence thousands of years before the Bible account, which are we to go by?

1. No; it is one of those petty dishonesties that many people are too apt to indulge in, which are inexcusable and destructive of moral character. 2. Science thus far has not established any theory that conflicts with or disproves the Bible. On the contrary, the Bible finds most unexpected corroboration in many ways from the researches of science, especially among the monuments and remains of ancient peoples. Stand by the Bible.

Subscriber, Dollar Bay, Mich. Can one's conscience be taken as an infallible guide to right living?

Not in its natural state, because it may be misled. A man may do wrong, as Paul did, when he persecuted the church, with a conscientious belief that he is doing right. The conscience needs to be informed and enlightened. The converted man often discovers the habits and practices which his conscience approved before his conversion, it condemns afterwards when it has been quickened and educated by the Holy Spirit. Light and knowledge are necessary in order that the conscience may do its duty efficiently.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

MADAGASCAR'S FOE.

FRANCE is busily preparing for another little war of aggression of a similar character to her recent exploit in Siam. This time the field is Madagascar, the large island, larger than France itself, lying off the southeast coast of Africa. A commissioner has been sent to the island to present the French demands on the Malagasy government. The nature of these demands is not known, but the warlike preparations that are being made indicate that the French government does not expect that they will be granted, and probably does not desire that they should. This is not the first time that there has been trouble with the French in Madagascar. In 1882 the French government attempted to set up a protectorate over the island. It held a strip of land on the Northwest coast which it used as a trading and coaling station, and with this as a basis of operations intrigued against the Malagasy government. Since the beginning of this century, the Hovas who occupy Ankova, the chief province of the island, have exercised supreme sovereignty over the Sakalavas and Betsimisarakas, the other two tribes which with the Hovas, constitute the Malagasy nation. The French made their bargains with the Sakalavas and obtained concessions from them which they had no right to grant. When the Hova Queen refused to ratify them the French bombarded Majunga and seized Tamatave, the chief town on the east of the island. There has now apparently been a revival of the claims and M. Flourens, the ex-Foreign Minister of France, airily explains that it has become necessary to crush the Hovas. Unhappily, Madagascar being without powerful protectors, is at the mercy of the French. She owes all her civilization to the missionaries, most of whom are of English nationality, and she naturally hoped to have English protection, but in arranging the partition of Africa the European powers left Madagascar within the French "sphere of influence," so that England is powerless in the matter. It is feared that if the French succeed in annexing the island, Christian interests will suffer. There are at present thirty-eight English missionaries in Madagascar, about six thousand native preachers, and about 285,000 professing Christians. They have a claim in their sore strait on the sympathy of all Christendom and on the prayers of individual Christians that God, who has in the past delivered his people from their enemies, will now interpose on their behalf; and, although they are in imminent danger from a relentless foe, it may yet be seen that it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man. (Ps. 118: 8.)

Marriage by Imitation.

A curious incident which occurred in Philadelphia recently is reported by the "Times" of that city. A wedding was being solemnized in a well-known church, the contracting parties being a lady and gentleman who move in the fashionable circles of society, while in the corner of the church stood a youthful couple, a mulatto boy and girl. The pair watched the ceremony intently, and copied each movement made by the bride and bridegroom whom the priest were making man and wife. As they knelt down, so did the other couple kneel, and when the bridegroom placed the ring on the bride's finger the young mulatto did likewise, only his ring was of cheaper metal and his bride was less fair. At length, when the procession emerged from the church, the humble double followed, looking as if they were quite as much married as the more fortunate couple. It was learned that such was, indeed, their belief. They had no money wherewith to pay the priest or the fees, so they thought a marriage at second hand would be just as effective and cost nothing. Their friends, doubtless, would peedily undeceive them. It would be easier to do so than to undeceive those who imagine that they have become real Christians by being baptized, joining a church, and doing other things that real Christians do.

It is still necessary, as it was in Paul's time, to insist that nothing avails but a new creation. (Gal. 6: 15.)

Heir by Purchase.

Search is being made through the country for a man who is entitled to the largest share of an estate in Michigan, the owner of which was murdered a few weeks ago. The man would probably have presented himself before this, but for a transaction which took place in 1850. He was then small a sum. Foolish as he was, he is not so foolish as those who might have an eternal inheritance, but choose instead a brief life of sinful indulgence. (Luke 16: 25.)

To Test Subterranean Air.

A device for the detection of the deadly gas in mines is described in a scientific journal. It is called the Formenophone and consists of two ordinary organ pipes. It has been found that the sound of an organ pipe is affected by the quality of the air with which it is fed. If two pipes of the same pitch are sounded simultaneously by means of blowers, fed by pure air, a simple sound is heard, but if there be forced through one of these pipes pure air, while the other is thrown into vibration by means of a mixture of air and gas, the sound of the latter pipe is correspondingly modified, and consequently, when the two pipes are sounded simultaneously, a certain number of interference beats will be heard, depending upon the quality of their distribution among any of his nephews who might be born after his decease. He makes, however, reserve of a line and a few hooks which he requests may be buried with him. "In order," he says, "that there is any fishing in the other world I will be provided with tackle to enjoy the sport, which has afforded me much delight in the present mode of existence." The will concludes: "In reference to my own burial, I direct that there be no religious rites or ceremonies, but that these be conducted by my loving friends in such a way as they deem proper, and I further direct that the normality of interring a Bible with the body be dispensed with in my case." It is astonishing that an intelligent man, as the deceased was, should have thought that it signified what was put in his coffin. The Bible would have been as useless there as the fish-hooks will be. But if he had studied the Bible he would have learned how he might be happy in the other world where spiritual enjoyment is provided for spiritual beings. (Rev. 7: 16, 17.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD makes an announcement on the editorial page this week of a series of exceedingly attractive offers, which deserves the special attention of our readers.

Information has Reached this Office from Massachusetts and Connecticut that contributors are being personally solicited ostensibly for objects of charity in the name of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. No one has been authorized by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to make such appeals and charitably disposed persons should not encourage them.

The London Missionary Society will next year celebrate its centenary. An effort will be made to appropriately honor the event by sending out one hundred new missionaries.

The Chinese Translation of the Old Testament in the Canton vernacular is completed and nearly ready for publication. The work has been done by Dr. Henry and revised by Mr. Noyes.

Rev. Henry Loomis writes home from Japan that all objection has now been removed to the possession and use of the Bible in the higher normal schools of that country.

The Empress of China, who is about to celebrate her sixtieth birthday, will receive among her presents a superbly bound copy of the New Testament in Chinese which is being prepared at the Presbyterian Mission Press in Shanghai.

Rev. R. G. Pearson has been holding successful meetings at Toccoa, Ga. The pastors of the town report a marvelous outpouring of the Spirit. Many have been converted and professing Christians have been stirred up as never before.

The Governor of Kieff in Southern Russia has forbidden the Colporteurs of the British and Foreign Bible Society to work in any of the four provinces under his jurisdiction. He assigns as a reason for his arbitrary act that the work of the colporteurs is practically a Stundist propaganda.

Translators are at work on the Production of the Old Testament in the Korean language. The translation is being done by a committee, of which Dr. Underwood is chairman. The Korean New Testament, prepared by Rev. J. Ross, of Moukdon, North China, is being extensively circulated.

The Sydney "Daily Telegraph," announcing a sermon by Dr. Talmage, in aid of the poor of Sydney states: "The gross amount of the collection at the Town Hall service will be handed over to the Mayor of Sydney for charitable purposes, and the cost of printing hymns and other necessary expenses will be defrayed by Dr. Talmage."

Mr. Norwood, the Agent of the American Bible Society in Venezuela, writes that the tide of public opinion there has turned in his favor. He now receives cordial treatment where formerly he was abused and threatened; and the press, which, at the instigation of the ecclesiastics formerly denounced him as a fraud and the vendor of corrupt books, now severely criticizes his opponents.

Evangelist John H. Elliott has been holding Successful Meetings at Paris, Ill. The "Beacon" of that city reports that audiences of over a thousand persons were gathered night after night and there were large numbers of converts. Mr. Elliott was accompanied by Mr. B. F. Butts of Kansas City, Mo., who conducted the musical part of the services. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, with whom Mr. Elliott formerly labored, cordially recommends him to the churches as an earnest and powerful evangelist. His permanent address is Clifton Springs, N. Y.

The Christian Workers' Association has decided not to hold an international convention this year. It will hold instead a number of district conventions in the Middle, Eastern, and Southern States. The first of these will be held at Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 23 to Nov. 1. The next will be at Syracuse, N. Y. Other conventions will be held afterwards in New England, the dates and places to be announced later. It is expected that in future the international conventions will be triennial, the first of which is to be held in New York or Chicago in 1896.

The New York Rescue Band has Opened a Mission for the reclamation of fallen girls at 17 Doyer Street, where services are held every evening from nine o'clock till midnight. Many remarkable cases of conversion are reported. Several of the converts have been placed in the Bethesda Home in Brooklyn and other Refuges in the neighborhood, where they can be taught trades by which they can support themselves. The Rescue Band hopes eventually to establish a home of its own in Harlem.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance of which Rev. A. B. Simpson is President, is holding its eleventh annual convocation in the Gersgen Tabernacle, New York. Many eminent clergymen and several returned missionaries are taking part and a large number of members of the Alliance from other cities are present. The meetings commence each day at nine o'clock and continue through the day. Next Sunday the meetings will be held in the American Theatre, the Tabernacle being too small to accommodate the audiences.

working as a waiter in a New York hotel and was in urgent need of money. He applied to a money-lender and proposed to borrow a large sum which he would repay at the death of his uncle. He said his uncle owned a large estate, worth $150,000, near Detroit, and, as he was his nearest relative, he would inherit the greater part of it. The lender would not make an advance on those terms, but offered to buy the man's interest in his uncle's estate for two thousand dollars, to be paid in instalments running over five years. The offer was accepted, and for three years the instalments were duly paid, but since then no application has been made for them, and no one appears to know where the man is to be found. He was leading a wandering life, and his need of money was chronic. Such a man must feel deeply chagrined when he hears of his uncle's death, to think that he had sold the property that might have been his for so of gas contained in the air with which the pipe is fed. The formenophone, the apparatus by means of which this operation is performed, consists simply of two blowers each with its appropriate pipe. One is enclosed in an air-tight box containing pure air, and the other is fed by the air that is to be tested. The difference between the note of the latter pipe and that of the pipe fed with pure air indicates the degree in which the air of the mine is impregnated with gas. The condition of the moral atmosphere may be similarly tested. Those who breathe it generally show by the tone of their conversation whether it is impure. (II Peter 3: 11.)

For Postmortem Fishing.

An extraordinary request is contained in the will of an enthusiastic angler who died recently at Memphis, Tenn. He owned a collection of rods and lines which he prized very highly and he provided in his will for

GOD'S ADOPTED CHILDREN.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Rev. R. S.

MacArthur, D.D. Text: I. John 3: 2, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

We have often described the apostle Peter as the apostle of hope; the apostle Paul as the apostle of logic; and the apostle John as the apostle of love. We must not, however, suppose that in so describing these apostles we exclude other commendable qualities which we know that they possessed. There was a vast amount of logic and love in Peter's hope; there was a great degree of hope and love in Paul's logic; and there was an equal amount of logic and hope in John's love.

Never did John forget the moments when he pillowed his head on the bosom of Jesus. He listened to the music of Christ's voice, tuned to tenderest love, and uttered in softest accents of divinest affection. And so toward the close of his life John constantly strikes the note of love and sings this song in almost every chapter that he wrote. Tradition tells us that when at Ephesus and so old and feeble that he could not go to the assemblies of the church without being carried by his disciples, and being unable to deliver long discourses he was accustomed to say, "Little children, love one another; and when some wondered why he so often repeated that exhortation, his answer was, "This is what the Lord commands you; and this, if you do it, is sufficient." There is in this exhortation an echo of the words of Jesus, and a corroboration of the teachings of Paul. As I read these closing epistles I find that there was but little of John left; almost all in his life was Jesus. John was

Passing into the Shadow;

Jesus was coming out into fuller and brighter light. John was joyously decreasing; Christ was gloriously increasing. Thus all through these chapters we hear the echo of Christ's words spoken years before.

We are not surprised, therefore, that he opens this chapter by saying, "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us." It is an interesting fact that nowhere in the Bible is there any attempt made to give us a definition of God's love. If any man might know that love, that man would truly be the apostle John. He did know much of it; he had grasped the hand, looked into the eyes, listened to the voice, and felt the throbbing of the heart of Jesus Christ. But even he does not attempt to give us the measure of love; all that he can say is, "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." And now passing from the precious thought of God's love, the apostle comes to the blessings which that love has secured for the children of God; and these blessings he beautifully enumerates in my text: "Beloved, now are we sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

Allow me in developing these glorious truths to call attention, in the first place, to the present privileges of true believers, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God." In looking at this category of blessings we discover that the first element in it is that we are called "Beloved" by an inspired apostle, and such an apostle as was John. A little time ago that thought came to me with special force. It surely is a great thing to be honored by honorable men; to be beloved by beloved men; but still it is a greater thing to be beloved by an inspired and almost divine man, as was the noble John. "Beloved" is the title which he here gives to God's children. It is a great blessing to be worthy the confidence, esteem, and affection of good men. That man is to be envied whose character entitles him to the affection of high-minded men, and of pure-hearted women. That man is to be pitied and blamed, who, having enjoyed this high honor, forfeits it by unworthiness of character. I beseech you who are the children of God, that you never so speak, never so act, never so think, as to be, or even to seem to be, unworthy of your high title of sons and daughters of God, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ! Oh, be worthy of that lofty designation, that glorious appellation; be worthy of that glorious crown of gold which awaits you; wear right royally that triple crown which God has prepared for the victors in the good fight, the crown of life, the crown of righteousness, and the crown of glory.

The Divine Birth.

Another privilege of true believers in this connection, is that they are called "the sons of God." We have perhaps seldom risen to the height of meaning contained in this expression. In the passage which I read from the 8th of the Romans, as the second lesson this morning, reference is made to our adoption. Adoption is a great and precious truth; but it is not the whole truth concerning the relation of the children of God to their Father in heaven. Adoption indicates a new relationship with God; but regeneration teaches that a new creation by the Spirit of God has been experienced. Adoption implies regeneration, but regeneration necessarily includes adoption. You may adopt a child from the street and give that child your name; but adoption would not give that child your flesh and blood, your very nature; it would not make the child truly part of yourself. We know, however, that when God adopts he regenerates. It certainly is true that God is not satisfied with merely bringing us into his family by an act of adoption; he makes us like his family; he imparts his own nature. We are begotten of God; we are made literally partakers of the divine nature. That is a wonderful truth; so wonderful that we could scarcely believe it, were we not distinctly so taught by the inspiration of God in holy Scripture. We seldom rise to the full height of this gracious truth. We are actually made a part of God; we are actually begotten by God; he becomes more really our Father than our earthly father. God's nature is imparted to us, and we actually become by regeneration the sons and daughters of God. This is a wonderful statement. I wish I could take its full meaning into my own heart; I wish I could impart all of its significance to other minds and hearts. Oh, realize to-day how great, how transcendent is the glory which God has already conferred upon you. A Christian is a Christian is a man who is Christ-like in character; a man who is like Christ in aim and in love, and who one day will be wholly like him when he shall see Christ as he is. Every Christian has now much in possession, but he has still greater things in prospect; thought cannot conceive, much less could language express, all that God has in reserve for his redeemed children. Indeed, only those who are born again can truly address God as "Father;" only they "who are led by the Spirit of God, are the sons of God;" only they who have received the spirit of adoption can truly cry "Abba, Father." Only in a vague sense can unregenerate men say,

"Our Father, who art in heaven." They can call God a father only as a wandering, self-willed, disobedient child who has, like another prodigal, gone into a far country, can apply the endearing name to the father in the old home, when he has forgotten that father's counsels, despised his reproofs, and wellnigh broken his heart. O, wanderer, come home now! Come now into the possession of the great, the divine privilege of being a son, or a daughter of God.

We ought also to emphasize the precious thought that this inestimable privilege is ours here and now—"Beloved, now are we the sons of God." We have erred in not taking into our hearts the blessed truth that this privilege is ours now. We have sometimes thought that to claim this promise now, would be presumptuous. We have thought that to speak doubtfully was a mark of humility. Not so; it is rather a mark of unbelief. True humility takes the place which God assigns: it receives the blessings which God bestows. It is unbelief and not humility which uses "peradventures," "perhapses" and "ifs." Does not a man know that as certainly as that he loves his mother, his wife, or his child? Can he not test his love in practical ways in the one case as truly as in the other? Away with this false humility! Let us receive the honors our Father gives! Let us be children and not merely servants. Let us not linger in the porter's lodge, but go humbly and joyously into the king's palace! This morning, believer, though you be full of doubts and fears, you are a child of God; just now, though sorrows have come to your home and to your heart, you are a child of God, just now, though business perplexities multiply, you are a child of God; just now though conscious of weakness and sin; just now, though at times obliged to confess waywardness and doubt, you are a child of God. Let that sweet hope fill your heart now while I speak, and remain with you as a divine benediction.

I beg, you also, to notice, in the second place, the present limitations of true believers—"It doth not yet appear what we shall be." Of course, it does not yet appear, of course it could not yet appear. We are not capable of taking in all that God has in store for us. Human faculties cannot discern these spiritual realities here or hereafter. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." You are yet but a babe in the kingdom of God. You will one day, in that glorious world, know as you are known and see as you are seen. Here we do not know God as he is, but as we are. We do not know even this world; how then can we know the world that is to come? We are here and now, regarding the things of time and sense. The infinitely great is no more mysterious than the infinitely small. The telescope does not reveal worlds more marvelous than those which are revealed by the microscope. We are between oceans of mystery as we live on our narrow neck of land. During the past generation science has made marvelous discoveries; but every great discovery has simply revealed another sphere of mystery, lying ever beyond. We push the limit of the known further out into the unknown sea; and the sea rolls still beyond into limitless regions of the unknown.

"It doth not yet appear what we shall be." We do not know what it is for a spirit to live in a disembodied state; we have had no experience of such an existence. It doth not yet appear, fully what we shall be in the glorified state. It doth not yet appear what we shall be in the immediate presence of God; it cannot yet appear. We could not take it in; we could not endure the sight. I have listened to strains of music in the "Messiah" so sweet that I felt that I could not endure anything more except I had new faculties to enable me to bear the increased bliss. How then in my present state could I endure heaven? The harmony would exhaust every faculty. No mortal could bear such heavenly delights. Perhaps would blind us; the glory would be too much for mortal sight; and the music would thrill us beyond endurance. I read a little time ago of a French vessel that was four years absent from France and was just returning. As the ship came homeward and was near the shore of France the sailors were almost unfit for service because of their uncontrollable joy; as they came still nearer, they took out various presents which they had brought for mothers, for wives and for children, and displayed them on deck. They came nearer still, and suddenly they saw the shores of France, and up went the shout, "La belle France," "La belle France," beautiful France, beautiful France! Soon they saw their wives, mothers and children on the shore and they were so helpless, in their excited joy, that the Captain had to get others to help in the docking of the ship. I think if the curtain could lift to-day, and we could see the glory of the other land and our beloved ones on that shore, our friends, our children, our parents, we would be unfitted for duty. Thank God, it doth not yet appear what we shall be or what we shall see!

Notice, in the third place, the present knowledge which true believers possess—"We know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Thank God, we know that Christ is to return; he is to be with us and we with him. He came once before in humiliation; he will come this time in glory. He came once as the despised and rejected of men; he will come this time receiving the plaudits of saints, the praises of angels, and the songs of seraphs. He will come as God has promised. Whatever truth God has sent down in a promise, we may send up in a prayer, so let the Church send up her petition to-day, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." We know, too, that we shall see him

When He Comes.

That is a thought of joy and preciousness. We have often wished that we might see him; that thought thrills our souls to-day. There are times and moments of exaltation when we have been on some Mount of Transfiguration; when we have almost seen him; times when we could almost touch the hem of his garment. At such times we, like Peter, wanted to linger long in the Master's presence. And we know too, that we shall be like him. His body underwent great changes between his resurrection and his ascension. He was able to enter rooms through closed doors, and the power he did not seem to possess, at least did not use, previous to his crucifixion and resurrection. Perhaps we shall have bodies like his. Painful and sick bodies shall be banished; crooked and deformed bodies will be all gone for ever. Beautiful bodies shall be ours, bodies without spot, without wrinkle, without defect; glorified bodies. This wonderful body shall be made over again like unto the glorious body of Jesus Christ. We shall perhaps also have wonderful intellectual endowments. A Luther long ago suggested, we look a God's providences now as they are presented to us with the type backward; and so we cannot read the meaning of his dealing with us. But yonder all mysteries shall be solved; yonder the writing will be plain. We shall look at it from another point of view. Oh, what blessed attainments we shall make! I tell you sometimes I become weary with the struggles of life, with its doubts, its perplexities, its unsolved and insoluble problems. And sometimes I wish I could plume my wings for the heavenward flight.

Then we shall Know

even as we are known. We shall make attainments in holiness; of that fact there is no doubt. Perhaps we shall be like Christ in holiness of character. The very thought is bliss. Thus we press forward toward the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Oh, the just now we might most sweetly take into our hearts the great and precious privilege of the children of God! Then we shall follow the exhortation of the apostle give in this connection, to purify ourselves, even as he is pure. Oh, child of God, will you live like a child of the earth? Child of glory, will you look at the attainments of this world, instead of looking to the glory yonder? Just now, I exhort you to look unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our Faith. Get a glimpse here and now of the King in his beauty. Behold, even now the land that is afar off, and your heart shall long for a fuller sight, the brighter glory and the nearer vision. Gaze now on Christ as your atoning Lord and Saviour and then you shall forever see him as the chiefest among ten thousand, and the One altogether lovely.

A GIFT OF A HOME.

The Rescue Mission at Cincinnati has received a gift of a four story brick house in a good location. Twenty fallen girls have already been reclaimed through the ministrations of the home. Three of them were baptized a few days ago. Special meetings for Jews are held in the home every Saturday and are well attended.

THE TRIBAL SEALING.

Character, not Nationality, the Principle of Selection in the Sealing Under the Symbol of the Twelve Tribes.

BY NATHANIEL STARKEY.

ANY difficulties arise in the literal interpretation of the sealing of an equal number from the twelve tribes. (Rev. 7: 4-8.) All these difficulties disappear if we may regard the names of the tribes mentioned as symbolical of character. Thus: "Judah signifies 'the praise of the Lord.'" These are they to whom he said, "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit, so shall ye be my disciples," and of whom he said, "All mine are thine, and thine are mine, and I am glorified in them."

In like manner, seeing that Reuben has for its meaning, one who sees the Son, we are not surprised to see 12,000 of such a tribe sealed, for everyone who "sees the Son and believes on him hath everlasting life." Then, again, seeing that Gad reminds us of a happy band, armed and prepared, it is just such a tribe as we should expect to see among the sealed ones. These are they who have "endured hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ," and although accounted as sheep for slaughter, have in all these things come off far more than conquerors through him that hath loved them.

In like manner, seeing that Asshur is one who walks on happily and prosperously, we should expect to see such find favor with the sealing angel, for already they have found favor with God, and in the light and life thereof are thus pursuing their course happily and prosperously.

Nor shall Naphtali be missed, seeing that he is one who in comparison bears the likeness, for they are all predestinated to become conformed to the image of the Son; and that he might bring the many sons to glory he became likened to them in suffering and death, that they might become likened to him in resurrection life and glory.

Manasseh, too, shall not be forgotten of his God, seeing that his name indicates one who forgets and is forgotten, for the men of his tribe have in love for their Lord forgotten their own people and their first father's house, that so the beauty of their devotedness might meet the desire and approval of their King. And thus they are soon forgotten and cast off by the world.

Then comes Simeon as one that hears and obeys and is heard himself. For hearing him they live, and living obey, and in the path of obedience are heard in all they ask. Like their great Example they have learned to hear and obey in the path of endurance, and so are able to say, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt."

In Levi we find one who is held and associated. And truly they are held up, held in, and held on their way by association with "the Strength of Israel." These are the truly royal priesthood, holy nation, and peculiar people, who, without portion or inheritance on earth, have the Lord for their portion and inheritance.

In Issachar we find men of price, reward and recompense; given of the Father to the Son for a covenant seed, as the price, reward and recompense of his sufferings and death, and in them "He sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied."

Zebulun is a dwelling and habitation; and surely these are they who have become "a habitation for God through the Spirit." Their bodies are called the temple of the Holy Ghost, "lively stones built up a spiritual house," and concerning them, as sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty, he saith, "I will dwell in them, and walk in them; they shall be my people, and I will be their God."

In the tribe of Joseph we find men of increase and addition in abundance, for the archers have made them their mark, and, sorely grieved and wounded, they have been "broken in the place of dragons, and covered with the shadow of death." But through fire and through water they have been brought out into a wealthy place, and all the pruning and discipline has turned to account for fruit-bearing to the glory of the Great Husbandman.

Lastly, in Benjamin we see the son of the right hand, followers of him to whom the Father hath said, "Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool." These sons of the right hand are men of power, through whom God effects his purpose of witness among men. Therefore should we expect to find this tribe among the overcomers, and sealed as the servants of our God in their foreheads.

CHRIST'S TEACHINGS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Oct. 21. Mark 1: 22; Isa. 9: 6.

In assigning as a topic for the week, the question, "Which of Christ's teachings seems to you most wonderful?" the Committee of the Society of Christian Endeavor puts a personal question. The answer, if the members care to answer such a question, must be personal, too. To a large degree it will be affected by personal environment and the circumstances of present spiritual condition. A crisis in life brought about by financial trouble, by social difficulties, by sickness, by bereavement or by any of the many experiences of life, may make some special teaching of special value at the time and so give a temporary prominence to some particular truth, which it does not have at other times and in other circumstances. It is a joy to know that in the rich treasury of Christ's words there is a word adapted to every need, however peculiar. It is a marvellous fact, and one that is a cogent proof that divinity really lived in his humanity, that the words of a Galilean peasant, remote in time, in experience and in environment from us should so completely apply to our own circumstances and to those of every generation. It has often been pointed out that inspiration and help have come from his teaching to kings, though Jesus was never in contact with a king, save as a prisoner; to statesmen, though he never took part in government; to soldiers, though he never wielded a weapon; and to men and women of every station and occupation, old and young. The fact proves the truth of the assertion of the evangelist, that he needed not that any should testify of man, for he knew what was in man. He knew his weaknesses and how to give strength; knew his proclivities and how to extirpate them; and knew his sorrows and how to comfort them. It was a loving heart full of tenderness, and we go to it now with the full assurance of a child who carries his trouble to his mother. He shrank not from loathsome disease, nor from hands tainted with sin, requiring only contrition and a desire for amendment. No being who ever lived so won universal love, even from those who disregard his injunctions. And it must be remembered that we have but the merest hint of his teaching. Again and again the Evangelists speak of his preaching, without giving a word of his discourses, yet what we have is sufficient to win the most complete reverence and affection. His recorded words may be roughly summarized under seven heads: The Sermon on the Mount; The Parables; The Charge to the Apostles; The Denunciation of Scribes, Pharisees, Hypocrites, etc.; His Vindictory Replies to Questioners; the wonderfully beautiful Valedictory Address to the Disciples; and the words of Comfort and Encouragement spoken after his resurrection. It is an inexhaustible store of precious spiritual jewels from which to choose.

THE GERMANTOWN W. C. A.

Encouragement in more than one form has come to the Woman's Christian Association of Germantown, Pa. The most prominent is the extinction of the mortgage on its building, which has been a heavy burden for some time past, absorbing in interest money which was sorely needed for Christian and philanthropic work. A welcome bequest of five thousand dollars from the late Mrs. Ashmead has just been received, which covers the debt and leaves a balance available for improvements or extension of the work. The managers and members are very thankful for this relief, and are setting to their work with new hope. They are cheered, too, by the fact that in several remarkable ways God is answering their prayers. One instance is worth quoting as an illustration of the promise, "Before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking I will hear." There was urgent need of a new piano for use in the devotional and other meetings of the Association, the old instrument having advanced so far into decrepitude that the singing was hindered rather than helped by its wheezy notes. No funds were available for the purchase of a work of the Young Men's Christian Association of that Institution. It is a large edifice measuring sixty-four by one hundred feet and cost thirty thousand dollars. Differing from other association work as the College Association must, owing to its changing constituency, there is no department more necessary or more valuable. The young men in our colleges will in a few years be the leaders of our political and social life, setting an example and exerting an influence which will be potent for good or ill. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that during the crucial period of college life any and every influence that tends to spiritual development may be about them. In Iowa University there are nearly a thousand students and it is gratifying to learn that five hundred of them are members of the Association. Only 225 are at present members of evangelical churches, but it may be hoped that their connection with the Association may lead to an increase of this number.

THE C. E. SOCIETY IN NEW GUINEA.

Missionaries in heathen lands have not been slow to avail themselves of the help of the young people's societies. "The Church at Home and Abroad" has received from New Guinea a glowing report of the organization by native evangelists of a Christian Endeavor Society in New Guinea. It says: "Here comes the report that Samoan native missionaries have established the first C. E. Society in New feel, encouraged and blessed by what I see and heard, and I asked permission to enroll my name together with my wife's. We have both been more and more convinced of the great benefit of the pledge. We have been consciously drawn nearer and nearer to Jesus in blessed fellowship, by prayer and the reading of his Word. That is what I have wished to establish a society here New Guinea, and although there are no members (only eight now), Jesus is with the two or three who meet in his name." "Plans are already matured for establishing another society in another section New Guinea."

AMONG THE ORDERS.

A Convention of the Baptist Young People's Unions of the Buffalo Association was recently held to organize an Association Union. The Young People's Societies of Buffalo are already organized into a Union which is doing valuable Christian work.

The Christian Endeavor Union of Cleveland, O., has arranged for a new form of work in its "Brotherhood Committee." This committee will work in connection with the Y. M. C. A. Representatives of each society will attend the Y. M. C. Sabbath afternoon services, become acquainted with the converts, and offer them a church home.

A Christian Endeavor Society was formed four years ago in the Wisconsin State Prison at Waupun. A record has been kept of its members, from which it appears that after their release three have done conspicuously good service. One is doing evangelistic work among the prisoners New York, a second is laboring for the salvation of men among the copper mines of northern Michigan and a third is leading the gold miners of Montana to embrace the truths taught by our Saviour.

The New York State Christian Endeavor Convention now in session at Albany, N. Y. The event has been anticipated with great interest and elaborate preparations made for a successful meeting. Provision was made for the entertainment of the thousand delegates and friends.

The Christian Endeavor Movement is nowhere making such rapid strides as in the churches of Madagascar connected with the London Missionary Society. There are ninety-one societies, with a membership of 3,377 in the island.

The Theatre Royal Service held by the Adelaide, Australia Y. M. C. A., continue to attract splendid attendances each Sunday evening, the proportion of men present being very gratifying. For seven years these meetings have been held without intermission, and the spiritual good effected by means of them is incalculable. Song services have also proved very successful.

The Eighth Annual Convention of the Illinois Christian Endeavor Union will be held at Galesburg, Ill., Oct. 18-21, a bright and deeply spiritual programme has been prepared and the members are expecting a time of great blessing. Arrangements have been made for the entertainment of visitors at the uniform rate of one dollar a day in private houses. Persons desiring to participate in the arrangement should send notice once to Laura B. Arnold, 607 Elbain, Galesburg, Ill.

Protests continue to be made against the "Good Citizenship" programme of the Christian Endeavor Society. It is urged that the Society will be demoralized by its interest in politics. Many of these protests come from secular papers which know how to make themselves. They strongly deprecate the new departure. Possibly their opposition is not altogether due to their concern for the welfare of the Christian Endeavor Society. In several instances it is certain that Christian Endeavorers vote according to the principles of the Society, they will vote against the candidates favored by the testing newspapers.

THE Y. M. C. A. BUILDING OF THE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA.

a new one, but several members agreed to lay the matter before God in prayer. This was done, and, to their astonishment, they found that while they were at prayer a friend of the Association had called at the business office and quietly informed the secretary in charge that a firm of piano-forte manufacturers would be there on the following day to remove the old piano and leave a new one in its place. Another similar incident has occurred since. Eight beautiful lamps were given to the Association by the father of one of the members, who on calling at the rooms one evening to escort his daughter home, saw that the ladies were sitting in semi-darkness, and resolved to remedy that condition. This need, too, had been made the subject of prayer on the very night of his call, although he did not know it.

IOWA UNIVERSITY Y. M. C. A.

The handsome building, of which we give a picture on this page, is the property of the Iowa State University and is used for the Guinea. How many Endeavorers will have to pick up their atlases and look this up? If they have been wide awake students of missions, they will understand at once that the converts of the Samoan Islands have been doing a noble missionary work in the distant and barbarous island of New Guinea under direction of the London Missionary Society. The announcement of the new society is received from the parent society at Malua, in Samoa, where there is a most successful educational institution for preparing native ministers, the latest report of which says that they have now on their book the names of a hundred students who are preparing for the ministry. The president of the New Guinea society (Pastor Timotea), sent the following lines to the Christian Endeavorers at Malua: "Brethren, your society is the parent of this little society just born. When I visited Samoa, two years ago, I first saw a meeting of a society of Christian Endeavor, and my heart felt then, and has since continued to

LUTHER'S CRADLE HYMN.

A WAY in a manger.
No crib for a bed.
The little Lord Jesus
Lay down his sweet head.
The stars in the sky
Looked down where he lay,
The little Lord Jesus
Asleep on the hay.
The cattle are lowing,
The baby awakes,
But little Lord Jesus
No crying he makes.
I love thee, Lord Jesus!
Look down from the sky,
And stay by my cradle
Till morning is nigh!

Training Oriental Children.

Beautiful Mission Work in California
—Chinese and Japanese Boys and Girls
Learning the Story of Jesus.

ALTHOUGH there is, at the present moment, a very bitter and sanguinary war raging between those two great Asiatic nations, China and Japan, any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who happened to drop in at the cosy and attractive Mission Hall, No. 1036 H Street, in the city of San Diego, would scarcely be able to credit the fact. Indeed, what he would see and hear there would rather lead him to the conclusion that the sons and daughters of the Flowery Kingdom were on the most friendly terms with those of the Mikado's empire, and had never been otherwise. And it is a very desirable state of things, as far as the Oriental part of San Diego's population is concerned at least, has been brought about through the efforts of a Christian American girl, Miss Katie Dewing. Last February, Miss Dewing organized an undenominational Mission reaching Chinese and Japanese men, women and children, and locating them in the lower English branches. But the principal object she had in view was the salvation of their souls. Her efforts among them, directly or indirectly, were put forth to this end. The Mission has a session of school five evenings in the week, from 7:30 to 10 P. M., besides prayer and testimony meetings on Wednesday at 2:30 P. M., and Saturday at 4 P. M. Sunday School is held Tuesday afternoon at 2:30 P. M., and preaching services in Chinese at 3:30 P. M. At these meetings a number of the Chinese and Japanese have manifested a desire to lead the Christian life. Some have made profession of religion and are now earnest workers.

On this page we give the portraits of three little Chinese children of one family belonging to the Mission. They are Tu Len, aged seven, Bin Kin, aged four, and Nellie, who is just about two years old. Very pretty and sweet-tempered children they are, too, and they give rare promise for Sunday School. There are many others like them who come to the Mission, to listen to the story of the Saviour who loved little children and took them in his arms.

This Mission reaches all it can of these Asiatic women and children at their own homes, for Miss Dewing, by her kindness and sympathy, has already won their confidence and love. God has wonderfully blessed her efforts among the women; they invite her to their feasts, visit at her home and in various ways show her favor; they confide to her their troubles and thus open the way for her to point them to Him who bears their sorrows and their griefs.

The Mission ladies have been encouraged by the children who attend their Sunday School. They love to come there and are much attached to their teachers. That they may be "Jesus' little ones," is the desire and prayer of their hearts.

In June last, Miss Dewing secured the rooms over the Mission and opened a Home for the Christian Chinese and Japanese in connection with the school. The object is to provide a pleasant home for them, that they may be surrounded with refining and Christian influences and kept away from the corrupting taint of Chinatown. There are now eight Chinese boys living in the Home and others will come as soon as there is room. The mission has eighty adult witty, humorous friend is like sunshine on a cloudy day. While it is always oppressive to hear persons constantly striving to say witty or funny things, it is comfortable, seeing what a brightener a little fun is, to make an effort to have some at home. It is well to turn off an impatient question sometimes, and regard it from a humorous point of view, instead of becoming irritable about it. Some children have a peculiar faculty for giving a humorous turn to things, when they are reproved. It does just as well sometimes to laugh things off as to scold them off. Laughter is better than tears. Let us have a little more of it at home.

Home Christians.

One sense of the value of the family needs to be revived and roused. The family, is the great institution of Paradise, the scene of purest love, the nursery of infancy, and the stimulus and shelter of all the virtues. Each man and woman has a duty to this end. A homeless civilization is sure to be a satanic one; the vices will be nipped by the untimely frost. It is only in the religious household we may hope to find children who, as manhood dawns, will respond to the sense of duty by following Christ in the serene and bloodless triumphs of his kingdom on earth. Back of the good man must needs be the good household. Here and there may be a saint and an apostle won from the dens of vice; but unless Chinamen and Japanese on its roll, besides women and children. All take great interest in the studies and learn rapidly, though there is no salaried work done in this Mission and Home. All the Chinese and Japanese support themselves by their own industry. Miss Dewing, the superintendent, the Rev. C. B. Roberts, the pastor and his wife, and Rev. Tong Cohn, the Chinese preacher and helper, all devote their time gratuitously to the work.

Both Mission and Home are conducted as a work of faith, their conductors relying wholly on the undertaking receiving the voluntary support of those Christian people who are interested in the evangelization of the Oriental mothers and children who live among us, and who would otherwise be denied the inestimable privilege we seek so gladly for our own little ones—the privilege of knowing Christ and learning in youth to love and follow him.

Humor at Home.

Many homes and lives are dull because they are allowed to become too deeply impressed with the sense of the cares and responsibilities of life to recognize its bright and especially its mirthful side. Into such a household, good but dull, the advent of a den be reformed, a miracle only can insure the safety of the new convert. In the future, as in the past, the solid and reliable men and women, the leaders in business and society and the pillars in the Church of the Lord Jesus, will be found in quiet and holy homes.

They Love to be Trusted.

None are so proud and happy as young children when they first understand that their parents have confidence in their honor and in their faithful performance of such duties as are committed to their care. The feeling of responsibility awakened by this knowledge in little children brings to them their first sensation of self-respect. They soon learn that faithfulness is absolutely necessary to the satisfactory execution of any work they may be called to perform. Thus good seed is daily sown, which in after years will yield abundant harvest and repay all the trouble it may have cost to prepare the soil to receive it.

Youthful Manliness.

It is the greatest delusion in the world for a youth to get the idea that his method of life is of no consequence, and that the character of it will not be noticed. A manly, truthful boy will shine like a star in any community. A boy may possess as much of noble character as a man. He may so speak and so live the truth that there shall be no discount on his word. And there are such noble, Christian boys: and wider and deeper than they are apt to think is their influence. They are the king boys among their fellows, having an immense influence for good, and beloved and respected because of the simple fact of living the truth.

A ROYAL HOUSEWIFE.

REAL happiness is not found in wealth or high social position, but in the conscientious performance of duty and the loving helpfulness we extend to others. A recent letter from Germany gives us a pleasant picture of the life of the Empress, which illustrates this fact. The writer says among other things:

"Before his marriage, Emperor William used to say that a 'wife with a talent for making jam is preferable to one who has the wish to amend the constitution.' He must have found his ideal, for, in a speech recently delivered by him, he said: 'I cannot wish anything more pleasant for the men of my nation than that the women may, like the Empress, devote their attention chiefly to the three great C's: Church, children and cookery.' Empress Augustus Victoria is the daughter of the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, and has been trained to superintend household affairs after the manner of the daughter of a German yeoman. Her parents taught her to be saving, diligent and modest—qualities which she now endeavors to instil into her own children.

No particular of the Imperial household escapes her attention; she takes especial pride in attending to the mending of the Emperor's linen, and darns his stockings, after the manner of old-fashioned housewives, who would consider it a crime to throw away a pair which could be mended. Much of her time is devoted to charity and especially do poor children find her a willing listener. In giving presents, she chooses some useful article. The simplicity of the life led by her household may be gathered from the fact that she rises, summer and winter, at 5 A. M. Breakfast is taken at 6, dinner at 1 P. M., tea at 5, and supper at 8. At half-past ten the whole Imperial family is generally asleep. She is held in loving reverence by her sons. The crown prince, aged twelve, upon hearing his teacher say that 'all mankind are sinners,' inquired if this applied to the high as well as to the humble. Being told that this was the case, he answered: 'Well, my father may be a sinner, but my mother isn't.'"

Visitors' Advice.

"No doubt there are times when a visitor may fittingly offer advice—sometimes, that is, and some visitors and some sorts of advice. But it should scarcely ever be done in the hearing of the children themselves. Suggestions that the mother would find really helpful if she were left to follow them out at her own judgment, only prove occasions of embarrassment if they are given unseasonably. Courtesy to the visitor often seems to involve discourtesy to the child. An innovation that might have been welcomed if it had been introduced with tact, arouses antagonism at the very outset. Or—more annoying still—an idea that does not commend itself to the mother is taken up by the children with an enthusiasm that embarrasses her.

A Test of School Children.

Under the auspices of the United States Bureau of Education, Dr. Arthur McDonald, an enthusiastic student of man, has made in Washington a "physical, moral and mental" test of twenty-five thousand school children. It was a difficult and delicate undertaking. At first in some of his experiments he found that the older boys and girls who had been examined, scared the younger ones so completely by the tales of horror they told, that the little ones could not be persuaded to submit to the very simple tests. Parents took their children from school lest some grievous harm would be done them. Later he began with the little ones and worked upward, and the older ones would not for shame refuse to do what the "infants" had done. The outcome of these tests will be eagerly looked for.

A NEW FASHIONED WOMAN

Written Specially for
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
BY
MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

CHAPTER V.

"Both the sleeping and the dreaming were delightful."

THE evening for the lawn party rolled quickly around. Everything was propitious. A half moon looked down upon a scene of unsurpassed beauty. There were no little patch-work beds in these grounds, but serpentine walks, large plats of grass bordered by gay flowers, strips of ribbon-beds dazzlingly bright, here a little rockery, artistic in its studied negligence, there Corinthian columns up which vines were creeping and connected by arches of green. Here was a knotted rustic seat, there a summer house for resting—as though one would ever grow weary amid such beauties!

As darkness came stealing on, from every column there flashing innumerable gas jets amid the dark green, and from every tree and bush there swung weird Japanese lanterns. It was not night out on the grounds; it seemed day, bright and beautiful.

Annie, handsomely, but suitably attired, stood at the entrance of the first parlor to receive the guests as Roy ushered them in from the dressing-room. Ease and elegance characterized her bearing as she stood waiting, and talking to lively friends close by. Val was not far off, dressed in white. A white rose gleamed in her burnished hair, her eyes sparkled, her lips smiled, her whole being seemed suffused with joy, while, between the introductions which followed every new arrival, she conversed with Dr. Gordon, who stood by her side.

The grounds were thronged already with pleasure-seekers, and seekers after cool breezes, and both they found out under the stars. Suddenly a brass band employed by Roy for the evening struck up "Maggie by My Side," and Val sprang to her feet just as Roy stepped up and said:

"Doctor, why are not you and Cousin Val out on the lawn?"

Then the Doctor's arm was proffered and gladly accepted for a promenade. As they stood upon the marble platform listening to the music, before descending into the yard, Val said:

"Dr. Gordon, this is my first experience at a lawn party."

"Well, how does the prospect from this standpoint please you, Miss Vernon?"

"I imagine I feel as Psyche must have felt when she was waited to her palace on invisible wings, when invisible minstrels delighted her ear with sweet music, and when odors from thousands of flowers regaled her, and when invisible waiters attended her."

"That will do. You are Psyche. In more than one respect you will answer."

"Oh, Dr. Gordon, I only meant—"

"No, you are by no means a bad Psyche. Psyche in Greek means, soul, and that you have in full measure, and Psyche was beautiful—what does your mirror tell you of your face, Miss Vernon?"

"Tell me, sir? Why, it speaks the plainest truth to me, the truth so plainly discernable that if my charms depend upon my face, then I must forever remain charmless."

"Shall I undecieve you? Would you like that?"

"I like truth, Dr. Gordon. Candor, even though it involves criticism, proves friendship, and an interest for and in me, for which I am ever grateful."

"Shall I criticize? Ah, well, then, Miss Vernon, your eyes are too bright for fashionable life, that life that keeps late hours. In short, Miss Vernon, you are too healthy and happy, transparent and sincere for fashionable life. Now, I have criticized and been candid, for these are my true sentiments. What think you now of the speaker and his speech?"

"I must confess, sir, that I admire the speaker's candor more than I like his speech. Are health and happiness incompatible with fashionable life, Dr. Gordon?"

"Even so."

"You surprise me, sir. If there is no happiness in this gay scene, where shall I look the world over?"

"Not in fashionable life. The butterflies of society are the most fettered, and, I believe, the most miserable creatures that life knows. Bound to obey the mandates of their imperious, capricious queen, they seek happiness here, there, everywhere, in unrest and in unsuccessful search, yet death comes, pale beauty has to go—a fashionable funeral, and that's the end."

"If this be true, and if you fully realize it, Doctor, why do you mingle in such society yourself?"

"I am not, by any means, a fashionable man, Miss Vernon; my profession is my queen; I acknowledge no sovereignty but hers. Devotion to my duties confines me closely. At the request of Miss Annie, whom I certainly esteem very highly, I came to-night to meet her cousin. I suppose I was invited to make the party one of enjoyment to her, and it strikes me that I have taken a strange method by which to accomplish this end. Please excuse me, but as a physician, I do prize a natural figure, and a face expressive in every feature of that greatest of earthly boons, health. Seeing that you possessed these, I could not bear to think of your losing them in a vortex of pleasure, by sumptuous suppers, wine-drinking, theatre-going, card-playing, and late hours."

"I thank you for the caution, Dr. Gordon, though I assure you I am in no immediate danger. My stay here will be short, and my home and surroundings are very different from these."

The conversation was interrupted by Roy coming up and exclaiming:

"Well, if I haven't hunted these grounds over and over for you, and here you are, haven't yet reached the lawn. Doctor, the company awaits Cousin Val, for supper has been announced. Will you please lead the charge?"

Then they joined the long procession which by a circuitous pathway led to the rear of the mansion. What a fairy-like scene met their eyes! Adjectives were exhausted in exclamations of admiration and delight! Then before them in the distance was a lovely, brilliantly lighted table, and it was loaded down with every delicacy—stands of fruit, clusters of red, white and purple grapes pendant everywhere, flowers of endless variety. Everything was beautiful, everything was delicious, and they stood and ate, chatted and laughed, while the band made the sweetest music. Then they scattered, some to dance on the smooth grass, some to play games, some to promenade, and some to continue conversation begun before.

So the hours took wings and flew. Mirth and frivolity reigned supreme, and not till the city clock struck "three" did Val bid the family "good-night," and turn to her room. Then she slept and dreamed, waked and dreamed again, and both the sleeping and the dreaming were delightful.

CHAPTER VI.

"Tsk! Tsk! Tsk!"

At different hours next morning the family of Col. St. Clair breakfasted. He, himself, had retired early the night previous, since he had to take the early morning train to look after some business. Roy and his mother had taken their meal together, and at ten o'clock Annie and Val made their appearance, looking rather jaded and worn after the night's dissipation. Mrs. St. Clair had gone back to her lounge complaining of a headache. As the sun was too warm for an out-door chat, the girls concluded to go up to Annie's room, and have a good talk. As they threw themselves in easy chairs close together, Annie said:

"Let's compare notes, Val, and see if the same stereotyped love speeches were made to you as well as to me."

"Oh, Annie, none were made to me, so I can't compare my notes with yours, having none to compare."

"Well, did you have a good time?"
"Better than good, just glorious."
"Well, my dear, did you see anybody you liked better than yourself?"
"Oh, yes indeed, a great many."
"Who, for instance?"
"Why, you and Roy, the Misses Melville, Bonar, Du Vant and a host of others. I liked the gentlemen too."
"I don't care to hear about the gentlemen, but about one gentleman. How did you like Dr. Gordon?"
"Famously! He is a very intelligent, entertaining man, but somehow it strikes me—"

"Well, I am waiting to hear what struck you."

"Only this, that Dr. Gordon takes a physician's view of life and people, health out-balancing everything seemingly."

"And yet, strange to say, he deals not with health, but with sickness, though, I suppose, to cure the sick is to restore to health."

"Perhaps seeing so many pale faces and so much suffering makes him admire health, activity and cheerful spirits."

"Oh, he admired, did he?"

"No, I did not mean to say admire, but appreciate."

"Come, Val, out with it, Dr. Gordon expressed his admiration, that's the word, for your bright face, did he not? Honor bright now."

"Y-e-s, no, since I come to think of it, he said nothing that I could construe into any such thing. He did say that he admired health, and advised me never to become a fashionable young lady, as their roses were generally artificial, and as long as I owned those of nature, to keep them. He is no flatterer, Annie."

"Our roses bought of a modiste, hey! They may be and yet they may not. He has sullen views of life, don't you think he has, Val?"

"Of life in the abstract, or of fashionable life only?"

"Oh, I don't know, I don't feel equal to abstractions to-day (yawning.) Dr. Gordon is a very plain man, has good common-sense and a fine practice. Val, I've picked him out for you."

"For me? My dear cousin, you are certainly kind and most disinterested. Methinks you had better begin with your own wayward heart, and bid it love and secure this young doctor for yourself."

"He is too humdrum for me. I couldn't stand a man forever plunged headlong into his profession. The idea of my marrying a doctor, of having him come from the sick and dying! I should always think he smelled like asafetida. I don't want the hand that is constantly closing glassy eyes to come caressing me. Ugh! It makes me shiver, just the thought! I don't want Dr. Gordon. He don't suit me at all, but I thought maybe you could overlook the various odors, and take him."

"None of these things would would make one particle of difference to me. I would be only too glad for my husband, if I had one, to be a man as useful as I believe Dr. Gordon is."

"Useful? You are so prosaic, so flatly practical. I never did anybody any good in my life, and don't expect, as long as life lasts."

"And when it ends?"

"When it ends!—Well, I suppose it must end at some time or other.—Oh, my programme is all mapped out. I'll give it to you. Here it is.—Live happily, enjoy life to its fullest extent, drink every cup of pleasure, marry a man in my own circle, have the very grandest wedding of the season, let Worth furnish the trousseau complete, never have a child to be crying after and tormenting me to death, travel with my husband, quarrel a little, make up a heap, give grand dinners and parties, keep out of the clutches of old age just as long as possible, defer gray hairs and wrinkles for ages to come, but of course if I have no cares, tears will not dim my eyes nor troubles turrow my cheeks, spend summers tilting about at Saratoga and other fashionable watering-places, the winters among our orange groves in Florida, inhaling balmy air and the odors of thousands of flowers, and then when the end must come,—death's a terrible inconvenience,—but if it must come,—well, I'll lie down in my elegant Parisian bed, draw up my fine linen sheets, send for Dr. Gordon, breathe out my life in dignity, lie in state under the rarest flowers in every conceivable device, have a fashionable funeral, a long procession, a still longer obituary notice which would make me open my dead eyes in wonder and admiration of my self could I see it, then have a magnificent granite (that's the fashion) monument, that would satisfy even my fastidious taste could I only step out and look at it, and—that's the end. Pshaw! I don't like to think of the end; I'm just at the beginning. The end is a long way off, and in the meantime looks very much smaller and more insignificant than this present. Don't sigh so at the way I am rattling on. I'm in a state of hilarity to-day for I had two offers of marriage last night, and what turn a young girl's head so much as conquests I am satisfied with my night's work."

"Night's work! I don't understand you Annie."

"Oh, well I mean it figuratively. Pshaw! What do I care for offers! I have had a ready more than I can count on the fingers of my two hands, and so I shall keep on, suppose, till I am twenty, and then I shall settle down into an old married woman. The truth is, one of these fellows I have been toying with for some time, surrenders and cast himself at my feet. A girl can manage these things you know,—lead a man until he declares himself, and then be so surprised. It's funny how surprised we are. It takes right good acting to keep from being caught sometimes. The first one I dismissed at once, and as I started to express very sweetly, the hope that he would still be my friend, he burst out with, 'don't see friend, I despise the word,' and springing to his feet, he must have left the ground for I saw him no more. The other—he wait awhile. It is so nice to keep one suspense, when the suspense does not affect one's own happiness."

Val looked at her cousin with wide open eyes. Annie caught the expression of her face, and with a merry laugh, said:

"Why, you little innocent thing, you look horror struck. Will your fair hand take up the gage for these Knights errant I verily believe they would and fight me valiantly."

"Annie, my dear cousin, I thought you had a big, noble heart, and that you would never stoop to conquer."

"You made a grand mistake then. I'll long to society, and to-day I am in a fashionable humor, though I am not always this mood and tense—potential mood, you know and present tense, no past, no future."

"May I hurt your feelings?"

"With the greatest pleasure," laughed again merrily. "Go ahead, catechize a condemn to your heart's content, Miss Vernon of Virginia."

"Annie, I thought the offer of a marriage and hand in marriage was the highest possible compliment he could pay a woman."

"Worthless gifts, generally, and not serving of more than a passing, 'not an thank you.' There are, however, I confess, some noble specimens of manhood in our circle, but these are too sharp to caught with chaff. You can't put salt every bird's tail, you know. Now this offer was from one whom I merely invited for politeness' sake, and I think he was ing to cut his notch almost too high when aspired to the hand of Col. Royal St. Clair only daughter."

"Annie, you have several times used term 'our circle.' Have you a distinct idea in which you move, and if so, whom it include and how far does it extend?"

"Oh, well, in a city one is compelled to hold oneself aloof from common people, those not fashionable, not in your set, those who are compelled to work for a support and who have neither the money nor leisure for recreation, those who are—Oh! doesn't matter about defining them further; now what about Dr. Gordon, Val? I invited him purposely for you, why did you captivate him?"

"I am ignorant of the art of captivating, Annie, but were I thoroughly versed, Dr. Gordon is the very last person I should practice upon."

"And why, pray?"

"Because he is a high-toned man, earnest Christian, and one whose love woman in any circle might feel honored and proud to possess. I respect him much to trifle with him, did I understand the art. He is far above me in worldly experience, looks down upon me as a child who needs to be protected and guided. Yes, he is far above me and above me, Annie."

"Pshaw! Who cares that for Dr. Gordon!" and Annie snapped her jeweled fingers contemptuously.

A TRIBUTE TO MISSIONS.

REMARKABLE testimony to the value of missionary work in rendering a district safe from the depredations of lawless men is quoted in "The Missionary Herald." It says: "Within the Republic of Paraguay are the Indians of Chaco, among whom the agents of the South American Missionary Society have been laboring. The Public Land Surveyor of the Republic, on the 30th of December last, addressed a letter to the President of the Republic in which he refers to an expedition into the interior from which he had that day returned. He says: I am surprised at the security and tranquility with which we can now travel among them, thanks to the effective measures taken by the missionaries of the South American Missionary Society to Christianize those savages. The last time I traversed the same bound, five years ago, I took with me fifty specially selected men, all armed with Remington rifles and revolvers, and I never allowed anyone to go alone to seek water to explore our road. We always rode in company and armed, and never went far from our encampment. At night we set sentinels and slept with our weapons at hand. When measuring, if we saw smoke we fell back on our main body, and any signs of Indians made us advance with rebuffed caution. In the "toldo" (Indian village) of the chief, called Michi, near the Montelindo River, our horses disappeared, and while a portion of our party sought them, the remainder, who were in camp, were surprised by a company of naked Indians, painted and adorned with feathers, who certainly had no peaceable or friendly intentions. To-day this spirit of hostility is entirely disappeared. I made my preliminary survey with Indian assistance, and have carried a single firearm. At night we slept tranquilly at whatever spot our labor for the day had ceased, no watch being set, and several times in the vicinity of stranger Indians whom we met on the road. We sought the villages instead of avoiding them as formerly." This Public Land Surveyor concludes his letter to the President commending specially a "fair, delicate, and young English lady, who, in connection with others, has for some time been incessantly visiting these savages, giving them her medical and surgical skill, etc., instructing them in civilization, and teaching them from the sacred words of the Bible how to live: with the sole desire and hope of lifting them from the sorrow and degradation of heathenism into the happy and peaceful life of Christianity."

A SUBMERGED CITY.

The lost cities of Biblical history—Nineveh, Tanis, Lachish, and Babylon—which recent excavators have partially brought again to view, have a parallel in a submerged city of East Anglia, which, tradition asserts, lies at the sea's bottom off the town of Dunwich, on the English coast. Even the greater part of England had not as yet emerged from barbarism, even as far back as the first century; Dunwich was the seat of an Episcopal See, its twenty-four bishops wielding their croziers over nearly the whole of East Anglia. The See is believed to have been founded under King Sigebert by St. Felix, who first brought the Gospel to those shores. There were at that remote time in Dunwich strong walls and brazen gates, well fortified, enclosing a king's court, a bishop's palace, a great number of parish churches, several monasteries, and a capacious harbor, which sent forth its merchantmen to all parts of the then known world: and in the time of Edward I. Dunwich provided eleven ships of war for the royal service.

But, in the reign of Henry III. the harbor silted up, and the glory of Dunwich departed. There was no catastrophe. The encroachments of the sea gradually undermined temples, palaces, and buildings. The See had long since been removed to Norwich, and one by one the churches disappeared. A fragment of St. Nicholas was standing till 1740, when it also crumbled away. There may be more striking memorials of the ravages of the sea in other parts of the world, but so complete a swallowing up of an opulent and royal city is unique in historical records.

Fall Medicine

Is fully as important and as beneficial as Spring Medicine, for at this season there is great danger to health in the varying temperature, cold storms, malarial germs, and the prevalence of fevers and other serious diseases. All these may be avoided if the blood is kept pure, the digestion good, and the bodily health vigorous, by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Hood's Sarsaparilla Cures

My little boy four-teen years old had a terrible scrofula bunch on his neck. A friend of mine said Hood's Sarsaparilla cured his little boy, so I procured a bottle of the medicine, and the result has been that the bunch has left his neck. It was so near the throat, that he could not have stood it much longer without relief. Mrs. INA HOOD, 324 Thorndike St., Lowell, Mass.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MOPENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN. Discovered by Accident.—In COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MOPENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENS SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS. Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. A MISSIONARY HERO.*

IN the year 1880 the British forces in Afghanistan sustained a most severe and bloody defeat at the battle of Maiwand. The shattered remnant found refuge at Kandahar, and were there closely besieged, until the brilliant victory gained by Sir Frederick Roberts, after the great march from Kabul to Kandahar, once more set them free.

During the siege a sortie was ordered against a village from which a destructive fire was being poured in upon Kandahar. In the hospital within the walls, helping to receive the wounded as they arrived from the front, was a missionary. After a time he went to the Kabul gate for the same purpose. There they told him of certain wounded men lying untended in a shrine some two or three hundred yards outside. With a dooly and bearers he at once went off to their aid, though the fire was heavy. Arrived at the shrine originally pointed out, he found it empty: the wounded were not there, but at another shrine some thirty yards away. The danger increased at every step, and an officer advised the missionary not to proceed. He could not, however, be persuaded to return; and, whilst starting for the second shrine, he was struck by a bullet. He was taken into Kandahar in the dooly he had brought out for others, and on the same afternoon he died. The missionary who thus fell was George Maxwell Gordon, an honorary agent of the Church Missionary Society.

The "pilgrim missionary of the Punjab" belonged to the band of noble men who, possessing ample means, have dedicated all without reserve to the service of Christ in foreign lands. George Maxwell Gordon might have lived a life of ease at home; he was content to "endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." He might have filled posts of honor under less exacting circumstances; he preferred the perils of a pioneer's work in India.

In 1866 Gordon offered himself to the Church Missionary Society. His wish was to serve without stipend or allowance, and the offer was accepted. Gordon went out to India in the December of that year, and joined the Madras itineracy. It was the kind of work which exactly suited his athletic frame and his eager temperament, the kind of work to which he always gave himself with delight until his life's end.

In 1871 we find him in Persia, just when the country was in the throes of famine. With characteristic zeal he could not use his money to procure ease. "The ride to Teheran," he wrote, "is four hundred miles, and by changing horses every fifteen or twenty miles, and riding day and night, I got to Teheran in five days." The sights by the way and wherever the missionaries went were heart-rending. It was little they could do in their labors "as well for the body as the soul," but Gordon soon found himself acting as "relieving officer, doctor, purveyor, poorhouse gardener and inspector, outfitter and undertaker to a community of eight hundred poor Armenians."

In time Gordon's plans took the form of a systematic itineracy in a district lying between the Indus and the Jhilm. Working in a methodical way, and inspiring native agents with something of his own enthusiasm, he prepared the whole of his district for the labors of a permanent mission.

On his itinerating tours he did not even care to use the native bedstead as a resting-place: "the ground is good enough," he would say, and upon a little straw or date-palm leaves he slept soundly. In the matter

An Asthma Cure at Last

Europe and American physicians and medical journals report a positive cure for Asthma, in the Kola plant, found on the Congo River, West Africa. The Kola Importing Co., 1164 Broadway, New York, are sending free trial cases of the Kola Compound by mail to all sufferers from Asthma, who send name and address on a postal card. A trial costs you nothing.

First, weak, nervous, organs impure blood, and overwork or too much strain on brain and body. The only way to cure it is to feed the nerves on pure blood. Take Host's Sanaparilla. Don't delay.

of food he was equally independent; he drank water or milk and water, rarely ate meat, but was content with "chuppaties," fruits and vegetables. Yet the man who sought no comfort for himself was full of consideration for others. He was known to tramp all day long under the burning sun whilst a weak and sickly native rode his pony. In the cold of the trans-frontier winter he was met one day, miles from his station, without overcoat or vest; he had taken them off to clothe a sick native and child whom he had met by the way suffering from the cold.

There were yet other fields over which Gordon yearned. In 1878 war broke out with Afghanistan. To Gordon it seemed that this might be a means of carrying the Gospel into a land in which its proclamation was attended with peculiar difficulty and peril. He accordingly offered his services as honorary chaplain for the campaign, and was attached to General Biddulph's command. Gordon's discharge of his new duties were far from formal, as his diaries show. "A very hearty little prayer-meeting in my tent, attended by four officers and eight soldiers," and many like entries witness to the thoroughness of his chaplain life. He returned to his old work to find new helpers. Hurrying on in advance of the returning troops, he surprised his colleagues at Clarkabad. He arrived on foot, accompanied by his spaniel, and looking to the eve of the newcomers very much like an Old Testament prophet. In 1880 he went again to Kandahar, where he fell in the field under the circumstances already described.

on the one hand—ruined garments on the other. That will be the result of your trying to save money by using poor, cheap washing-powders, instead of Pearl-line. Just consider. How much could you save in a year if you bought the cheapest and most worthless? And how far would it go toward paying for the things ruined in a single month? You can't save anything by buying cheap washing-powders. The way to save money in washing is to use what has been proved to be absolutely safe. That is Pearl-line. Millions use it. 417

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of a wearing cough. Very respectfully I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be sent post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

Corticelli Filo Silk

This variety of Wash Silk is popular on account of high lustre and beautiful dyes. Being loosely twisted, the best way to buy it is on spools which keep the silk clean and prevent shop wear and fraying. In this way you save time and money by avoiding waste and inconvenience, at the same time improving your workmanship. Corticelli Filo Silk is put up on spools or in skeins as buyers prefer. Awarded the Gold Medal and Special Diploma of Honor at the California International Exposition, 1894.

"Florence Home Needlework" for 1894 is now ready. Subjects: Corticelli Darning, 22 new designs; Knitting, Crochet and Correct Colors for Flowers. Send 6 cents, mentioning year, and we will mail you the book, 36 pages, 10 illustrations.

DELAYED TOO LONG.

WO notable cases of delay in accepting Christ are related, the first by Dr. Singleton, a pious and eminently active Christian, who is well known both in England and Australia. He writes:

While in Australia, at various times I in the practice of my profession some cases. I was once called to attend a professed infidel for an alarming attack of sickness. I treated him promptly and successfully; but, in a few hours, seeing the case increase, I advised a consultation. Meanwhile, at the request of a relative of who told me of his and his two brothers-in-law, I spoke to him plainly, yet kindly, about his eternal welfare. He evinced a marked dislike to this, and refused to his brothers—also unbelievers—about it. They called in as a consultant a doctor who was known as a Deist. We agreed on the treatment; he, however, added the presence of the brothers, that the patient should be kept perfectly quiet, and could not be spoken to. I understood the plan, but not the propriety or need of it in any respect, and continued to speak to him now and then, while prayer was constantly offered for his conversion. The next morning he died while I was in the room. I had requested a minister of the Gospel to call, and he did so, but the sick man begged him to leave him for the present to call some other time. With a kindly warning and a declaration of God's love to the sinner in giving his Son to atone for his sins, and for those of the whole world, the minister withdrew. A few minutes afterwards, the patient raised himself in the bed, uttered a groan so loud and terrible that his poor wife hurried to the room; but his vital spark had fled. She got on her knees on the bed beside him, and in deep anguish cried out, 'He is gone! He is gone! Oh, William! I often told you you would be your end!' How different the death-beds of the righteous that I so often witnessed. Surely godliness is profitable for this life as well as for the next.

The other is related by Rev. Dr. Cuyler of Brooklyn. An old man told him this experience: 'When I was about seventeen, I often deeply, but I determined to put off a decision until I was settled in life. After I married, I remembered that the time would come when I promised to attend to religion; but I had bought this farm and was anxious to avoid all expense, such as churching would involve, and so I put it off for years more. When the ten years came and I thought no more about it. I often thought to think now, but I cannot keep my mind on any subject one moment. It is too late now. I fear that my doom is sealed, but it is just that it should be so, for I have strove long with me, but I refused to do so. Now it is too late.' The poor man, as he had lived, one of the many millions who had extinguished the offered light and groped through a midnight of darkness into a hopeless eternity.'

FEARING AN IDOL'S WRATH.

A letter from Foochow, China, Mr. Water of the American Board describes the discreet act of a Chinese convert which excited the fears of the people and has caused an increase of prejudice. He says: 'One of the villages near us lived a young man and his mother, both believers. Some time early last autumn this young man was talking with three other young men and they asked him if he dared to leave an idol. He said, 'Yes,' and he further said he would handle it if they would let him about it. They promised, and he picked it up, it being a small one, turned it over, and, setting it back again, he rubbed some mud in its face, some of which went into its eyes. This was of course an unwise thing to do. Some time after the last of December a number of people died in that immediate neighborhood, and the people began to attribute it to the anger of this idol, for of course the promise kept silent about the young Christian's act had been broken. There was in the village one Taoist who explained the matter. He said that turning the image upside down had confused the idol, and spat out dirt in his eyes had blinded him, and that his blindness and confusion he had turned on to the cattle and wreaked his vengeance on them. The young man was compelled to pay a fine of ten odd dollars; and here the matter rested for a time.

Since then he has been compelled to sign a bond that he would be responsible for any misfortune that might befall the village; then he was released on the recognizance of the innkeeper and came to the inn, where I was staying, and I received him and his mother to the church.'

After trial you pay the retail value of the Soaps alone. All middlemen's profits are returned to you in valuable premiums, so well bought as to save you half the regular retail prices. The Larkin plan saves you half the cost. The manufacturer alone adds VALUE; every middleman adds COST. The publishers of this paper know every claim is sustained by the facts.

Many people prefer to send cash with order—it is not asked—but if you remit in advance, you will receive in addition to all extras named, a nice present for the lady of the house, and shipment same day order is received. The publishers also know that your money will be refunded without argument or comment if the box or HEATER does not prove all expected. Booklet illustrating ten other premiums, including the famous Chautauqua Desk, free upon application.

Write your order like this, TO-DAY—while you think of it, or cut this out and sign it: "You may ship me, subject to thirty days' trial, ONE COMBINATION BOX OF "SWEET HOME" SOAP, with extras, etc., and the CHAUTAUQUA HEATER.

If after thirty days' trial I find the Soaps and the Heater entirely satisfactory and as represented, I will remit you $10.00, if not, I will notify you goods are subject to your order and you must remove them, making no charge for what I have used."

THE CRADLE OF PRESBYTERIANISM.

Hempstead, L. I., Celebrating the 250th Anniversary of the Pioneer Presbyterian Church in America—An Eventful History that goes back to the "Mayflower" Days—Faith Bravely Upheld throughout the Vicissitudes of War and Peace.

DURING the present week, the beautiful old town of Hempstead, Long Island, is celebrating an event which possesses a significant interest, not for that part of New York State alone, but for all religious America. It is the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding in 1644, of the first Presbyterian Church in America. Although long generations have passed away since that event took place, and the old church has experienced many vicissitudes of war and peace, the faith and worship of its founders have been loyally preserved in their descendants.

Rev. Frank Melville Kerr, the present pastor of this grand old pioneer church, has prepared a review of its history, which we are privileged to present in substance to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It carries us back almost to the "Mayflower" days and the times of the early Puritan settlers of America. The success of the Mayflower expedition soon brought many Puritans to the New England States, and many Presbyterians were among the arrivals. These latter found a warm welcome in Connecticut. Among those who left their churches in England and came to this country on account of opposition to Dissent was a Non-conformist minister of the Presbyterian type, by name Richard Denton. He was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1586 of a good and respectable family, and educated at Cambridge. For seven years after graduation he was the settled minister of Coley Chapel, Halifax, Yorkshire, England. But the promulgation of the "Book of Sports," (a publication sanctioned by royalty, and aimed at the Puritans, as it encouraged the public indulgence of secular amusements on the Sabbath), and many other acts on the part of the king were of such a character that the young divine could not accept this conscientiously; so in 1630 he gave up his work and, with many followers, set sail for America. In the year fully one thousand Puritans reached this new country. It was at the time that Gov. Winthrop arrived in Salem, and in all probability Richard Denton came over with him. He landed first at Watertown, Mass., but in 1635, on account of opposition, started a new settlement in Connecticut and gave it the name Weathersfield. Shortly after, he removed to Hempstead, Long Island, and many of his followers in the Old World came with him to this new territory, and in 1644, there established a church upon a permanent basis. This was the origin of the first Presbyterian Church in America, the memory of whose founding is now being celebrated by a three days' jubilee, in which hundreds of the lineal descendants of its original worshippers are participating. The name of "Christ's First Presbyterian Church," which has come down to us from the early period, is an evident indication that the founders knew that they were establishing the first Presbyterian Church in this country and gave it this distinctive appellation.

Richard Denton was pastor of the church until 1659 and received a salary of $350, which was paid in such articles as were most useful and available. He retired from the pastorate in 1659, and left behind him four sons, two of whom, Nathaniel and Daniel, established the town of Jamaica, L. I., in 1656, and aided in the plantation of Elizabethtown, N. J., in 1664. Denton returned to England in 1659 and spent the remainder of his life in Essex, where he died in 1662.

The illustrious Cotton Mather was able to give a description of the founder of the Hempstead Church. He says:

"Among those clouds," meaning the ministers who early came to New England "was one pious and learned Mr Richard Denton, a Yorkshire man, who, having watered Halifax, in England, where, first at Weathersfield, and then at Stamford, his doctrine dropped as the rain, his speech distilled as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass. Though he were a lit-not the least among the Seers of Israel; he saw a very considerable portion of those things which eye considering the four-fold state of man, in his created purity, contracted deformity, restored beauty, and celestial glory, that judicious persons, who have seen it, very much lament the churches being so much deprived of it. At length he got into heaven beyond the clouds, and so beyond storms; waiting the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, in the clouds of heaven, when he will have his rewards among the saints."

Work upon the first meeting house commenced almost immediately after the arrival of the settlers on that part of Long Island; but it was not till 1648 that the structure was completed. The building was twenty-four feet square and had connected with it a fort, or stockade, for protection in case the Indians manifested any hostility. But after a time on account of an increasing congregation, they ceased holding church services in it and used it for town purposes entirely. In 1770 it was sold and removed to North Hempstead, and another meeting-house was built. There were no pews but simply benches which could be easily removed. The parsonage was erected in 1682, and served the purpose for over one hundred years.

After the departure of Richard Denton the church secured the services of Rev. Jonas Fordham. Its next minister was Rev. Jeremiah Hobart, who was called on the 6th of May, 1682. He was the grandfather of the celebrated David Brainard, the missionary to the Indians. These early pastors had to contend with disadvantages that would have been regarded by most men as insurmountable; yet, despite hardships and opposition, they clung to their posts and faithfully discharged their duties.

After Mr. Hobart's pastorate, there was a period of discouragement among the little Presbyterian flock at Hempstead. Their neighbors, the Episcopalians, had obtained possession of the church, parsonage and lands which they formerly occupied, so they contented themselves with meeting in different places for a time until 1762, when a new church was built. This was the third church the congregation had used and it stood, as nearly as can be ascertained, on the site of the present church. They enjoyed religious services among themselves and preaching by

THE OARSMEN DEFEATED.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Jonah 1: 13, 14: "The men rowed hard to bring it to the land; but they could not: wherefore they cried unto the Lord."

NAVIGATION in the Mediterranean Sea always was perilous, especially so in early times. Vessels were propelled partly by sail and partly by oar. When, by reason of great stress of weather, it was necessary to reef the canvas or haul it in, then the vessel was entirely dependent upon the oars, sometimes twenty or thirty of them on either side the vessel. You would not venture outside your harbor with such a craft as my text finds Jonah sailing in; but he had not much choice of vessels. He was running away from the Lord: and when a man is running away from the Lord, he has to run very fast.

God had told Jonah to go to Nineveh, to preach about the destruction of that city. Jonah disobeyed. That always makes rough water, whether in the Mediterranean, or the Atlantic, or the Pacific, or the Caspian Sea. It is a very hard thing to scare sailors. I have seen them, when the prow of the vessel was almost under water, and they were walking the deck knee-deep in the surf, and the small boats by the side of the vessel had been crushed as small as kindling-wood, whistling as though nothing had happened: but the Bible says that these mariners of whom I speak were frightened. That which sailors call "a lump of a sea" had become a blinding, deafening, swamping fury. How mad the wind can get at the water, and the water can get at the wind, you do not know unless you have been spectators. I have in my house a piece of the sail of a ship, no larger than the palm of my hand: that piece of canvas was all that was left of the largest sail of the ship "Greece," that went into the storm two hundred miles off Newfoundland. Oh, what a night that was! I suppose it was in some such storm as this that Jonah was caught.

He knew that the tempest was on his account, and he asked the sailors to throw him overboard. Sailors are a generous-hearted race, and they resolved to make their escape, if possible, without resorting to such extreme measures. The sails are of no use, and so they lay hold on their oars. I see the long bank of shining blades on either side the vessel. Oh! how they did pull, the bronzed seamen, as they laid back into the oars. But rowing on the sea is very different from rowing upon a river; and as the vessel hoists, the oars slip the wave and miss the stroke, and the tempest laughs to scorn the flying paddles. It is of no use, no use. There comes a wave that crashes the last mast, and sweeps the oarsmen from their places, and tumbles everything in the confusion of impending shipwreck, or, as my text has it, "The men rowed hard to bring it to the land; but they could not: wherefore they cried unto the Lord."

This scene is very suggestive to me, and I pray God I may have grace and strength enough to represent it intelligently to you. Years ago I preached a sermon on another phase of this very subject, and I got a letter from Houston, Texas, the writer saying that the reading of that sermon in London had led him to God. And I received another letter from South Australia, saying that the reading of that sermon in Australia had brought several souls to Christ. And then, I thought; why not now take another phase of the same subject, for perhaps that God who can raise in power that which is sown in weakness may now, through another phase of the same subject, bring salvation to the people who shall hear, and salvation to the people who shall read. Men and women, who know how to pray, lay hold of the Lord God Almighty, and wrestle for the blessing.

Bishop Latimer would stop sometimes in his sermon, in the midst of his argument, and say, "Now, I will tell you a fable;" and to-day I would like to bring the scene of the text as an illustration of a most important religious truth. As those Mediterranean oarsmen trying to bring Jonah ashore, were discomfited, I have to tell you that they were not the only men who have been broken down on their paddles, and have been obliged to call on the Lord for help. I want to say that the unavailing efforts of those Mediterranean oarsmen have a counterpart in the efforts we are making to bring souls to the shore of safety and set their feet on the Rock of Ages. You have a father, or mother, or husband, or wife, or child, or near friend, who is not a Christian. There have been times when you have been in agony about their salvation. A minister of Christ, whose wife was dying without any hope in Jesus, walked the floor, wrung his hands, cried bitterly, and said, "I believe I shall go insane, for I know she is not prepared to meet God." And there may have been days of sickness in your household, when you feared it would be a fatal sickness; and how closely you examined the face of the doctor as he came in and scrutinized the patient, and felt the pulse, and you followed him into the next room, and said, "There isn't any danger, is there, doctor?" And the hesitation and the uncertainty of the reply made two eternities flash before your vision. And then you went and talked to the sick one about the great future. Oh, there are those here who have tried to bring their friends to God! They have been unable to bring them to the shore of safety. They are no nearer that point than they were twenty years ago. You think you have got them almost to the shore, when you are swept back again. What shall you do? Put down the oar? Oh, no! I do not advise that; but I do advise that you appeal to that God to whom the Mediterranean oarsmen appealed—the God who could silence the tempest and bring the ship in safety to the port. I tell you, my friends, that there has got to be a good deal of praying before our families are brought to Christ. Ah! it is an awful thing to have half a household on one side the line, and the other part of the household on the other side of the line! Two vessels part on the ocean of eternity, one going to the right and the other to the left—farther apart, and farther apart—until the signals cease to be recognized, and there are only two specks on the horizon, and then they are lost to sight forever!

I have to tell you that the unavailing efforts of these Mediterranean oarsmen have a counterpart in the efforts some of us are making to bring our children to the shore of safety. There never were so many temptations for young people as there are now. The literary and the social influences seem to be against their spiritual interests. Christ seems to be driven almost entirely from the school and the pleasurable concourse, yet God knows how anxious we are for our children. We cannot think of going into heaven without them. We do not want to leave this life while they are tossing on the waves of temptation and away from God. From which of them could we consent to be eternally separated? Would it be the son? Would it be the daughter? Would it be the eldest? Would it be the youngest? Would it be the one that is well and stout, or the one that is sick? Oh, I hear some parent saying to-night, "I have tried my best to bring my children to Christ. I have laid hold of the oars until they bent in my grasp, and I have braced myself against the ribs of the boat, and I have pulled for their eternal rescue; but I can't get them to Christ." Then I ask you to imitate the men of the text, and cry mightily unto God. We want more importunate praying for children, such as the father indulged in when he had tried to bring his six sons to Christ, and they had wandered off into dissipation. Then he got down in his prayers, and said, "O, God! take away my life, if through that means my sons may repent and be brought to Christ;" and the Lord startlingly answered the prayer, and in a few weeks the father was taken away, and through the solemnity the six sons fled unto God. Oh, that father could afford to die for the eternal welfare of his children! He rowed hard to bring them to the land, but could not, and then he cried unto the Lord.

There are parents who are almost discouraged about their children. Where is your son to-night? He has wandered off, perhaps, to the ends of the earth. It seems as if he cannot get far enough away from your Christian counsel. What does he care about the furrows that come to your brow; about the quick whitening of the hair; about the fact that your back begins to stoop with the burdens? Why, he would not care much if he heard you were dead! The black-edged letter that brought the tidings he would put in the same package with other letters telling the story of his shame. What are you going to do? Both paddles broken at the middle of the blade how can you pull him ashore? I throw you one oar now with which I believe you can bring him into harbor. It is the glorious promise: "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed after thee." Oh, broken-hearted father and mother, you have tried everything else, now make an appeal for the help and omnipotence of the covenant-keeping God! and perhaps at your next family gathering—perhaps on Thanksgiving day, perhaps next Christmas day—the prodigal may be home; and if you crowd on his plate more luxuries than on any other plate at the table, I am sure the brothers will not be jealous, but they will wake up all the music in the house, "because the dead is alive again, and because the lost is found." Perhaps your prayers have been answered already. The vessel may be coming homeward, and by the light of this night's stars that absent son may be pacing the deck of the ship, anxious for the time to come when he can throw his arm around your neck and ask for forgiveness for that he has been wringing your old heart so long. Glorious reunion! that will be too sacred for outsiders to look upon; but I would just like to look through the window when you have all got together again, and are seated at the banquet.

Though parents may in covenant be,
And have their heaven in view;
They are not happy till they see
Their children happy too.

Again, I remark that the unavailing effort of the Mediterranean oarsmen has a counterpart in the effort which we are making to bring this world back to God, his pardon, and safety. If this world could have been saved by human effort, it would have been done long ago. John Howard took hold of one oar, and Carey took hold of another oar, and Adoniram Judson took hold of another oar, and Luther took hold of another oar, and John Knox took hold of another oar, and they pulled until they lay back dead from the exhaustion. Some died in the ashes of martyrdom, some on the scalping-knives of savages, and some in the plague-struck room of the lazaret, and still the chains are not broken, and the despotisms are not demolished, and the world is unsaved. What then? Down the oars and make no effort? I do not advise that. But I want you, Christian brethren, to understand that the church and the school, and the college, and the missionary society are only the instrumentalities; and if this work is ever done at all, God must do it, and he will do it, in answer to our prayer. "They rowed hard to bring it to the land; but they could not: wherefore they cried unto the Lord."

Again, the unavailing effort of the Mediterranean oarsmen has a counterpart in every man that is trying to row his soul into safety. When the Eternal Spirit flashes upon us our condition, we try to save ourselves. We say, "Give me a stout oar for my right hand, give me a stout oar for my left hand, and I will pull myself out of safety." No. A wave of sin comes and dashes you one way, and a wave of temptation comes and dashes you in another way, and there are plenty of rocks on which you founder, but seemingly no harbor to which to sail. Sin must be thrown on board, or we must perish. There are men who have tried for years to become Christians. They believe all I say in regard to a future world. They believe that religion is the first, the last, the infinite necessity. They do everything but trust in Christ. They make sixty strokes in a minute, they bend forward with all earnestness, and they lie back until the muscles are distorted, and yet they have not made one inch of progress toward heaven. What is the reason? That is not the way to go to work. You might as well take a frail skiff, and go down at the foot of Niagara, and then dash it up toward the churning thunderbolts of waters, and expect to work your way through the lightning of the foam into Lake Erie, as for you to try to pull yourself through the surf of your sin into the land of pardon, and placidity of the God. You cannot do it in that way. Sin is a rough sea, and long-boat, yawl, piner, and gondola go down unless the Lord lives; but if you will cry to Christ and hold of divine mercy, you are as safe as eternal condemnation as though you had been twenty years in heaven.

I wish I could put before my unpaired readers, their own helplessness. No human arm was ever strong enough to unlock the door of heaven. No foot was mighty enough to break the shackle of sin. No oarsman swarthy enough to row himself into God's harbor. The wind is against you. The tide is against you. The waves are against you. Ten thousand corrupting influences are against you. Helpless and undone. Not so helpless a sailor as a plank, mid-Atlantic. Not so helpless a traveler girded by twenty miles of rope on fire. Prove it, you say. I will prove it. John 6: 44: "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me, will him."

But while I have shown your helplessness, I want to put by the side of it the power and willingness of Christ to save you. I think it was in 1686 a vessel was bound for Portugal, but it was driven by pieces of an unfriendly coast. The captain had his son with him, and with the crew they wandered up the beach, and started on the long journey to find relief. At a while, the son fainted by reason of hunger and the length of the way. The captain said to the crew, "Carry my boy for me on your shoulders." They carried him on until the journey was so long, that after awhile the crew fainted from hunger and weariness, and could carry him no longer. Then the father rallied his almost wretched

CONSTANTINOPLE'S URGENT NEED.

An Official Statement of the Condition of the Earthquake Sufferers - A Great Fire Adds to the Number of Destitute - Progress of the Relief Work.

By the latest mails from Constantinople comes intelligence which shows far more convincingly than any mere description, however graphic, the present pitiful condition of the thousands of homeless victims of the recent earthquakes. It is in the form of a communication from the members of the English Chamber of Commerce in Constantinople to the Lord Mayor of London, and is substantially as follows:

"As we are concluding the distribution of the Relief Fund at our disposition, we deem it our duty to inform your Lordship that we have received in all £2,260 stg. Of this, $1,750 is the amount sent by you; the rest we have collected here. With such a small sum, it was impossible to undertake the work of repairing the houses that were damaged by the earthquake in our section, which includes Stamboul, San Stefano, and the islands, as the damaged dwellings number several thousands. Therefore, we have de-

"We are convinced, by experience, that the misery and distress will increase when cold weather comes, because many of the people have no home and no shelter and, besides, no work. The Grand Bazar, the chief centre of trade in this country, which was greatly damaged, has been closed from the date of the earthquakes until now. There remains in our hands now less than £200 sterling and the people are in urgent need of help, but we cannot satisfy their necessities, even though we had ten times the amount now at our disposal. With the consent of the English Ambassador, we have increased the number of our Committee to six."

As if the burdens of the afflicted city were not enough, new calamities have fallen upon Constantinople since the earthquakes laid a large portion of its area in ruins. In the quarter known as Hasskeoi, on the Pera side of the Golden Horn, and principally inhabited by Armenians, a destructive conflagration occurred on the night of Sept. 12. It broke out in the Yeshil Direk or "Street of the Green Column" in the Chiksalin District, in the house of an Armenian, and before its progress could be stayed, over 150 houses - including many shops as well as dwellings - were by whose orders a multitude of useful gifts were distributed, together with a more generous food supply.

Many hundreds of workmen are busy repairing and rebuilding. Gangs of laborers are clearing away the piles of broken masonry in the Grand Bazaar.

All contributions from friends in America should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which has been appointed treasurer of the Fund for the American Relief Committee. As the need is still very great, it is especially desirable that those who may feel disposed to help in this work of world-wide benevolence should forward their offerings at the earliest moment possible. It is a movement in which all Christendom is actively interested, as it affords a precious opportunity of exercising the true spirit of Christian helpfulness toward a great community in distress. Every contribution will be acknowledged in these columns. The Fund is now over $2,000.

A STREET OF CONSTANTINOPLE, SINCE DEMOLISHED BY EARTHQUAKE.

ergy, and took up his own boy, and put on his shoulder, and carried him on after mile, mile after mile, until, overcome himself by hunger and weariness, he fainted by the way. The boy lay down and died, and the father, just at the time came to him, also perished, living long enough to tell the story - sad story, indeed! But glory be to God that Jesus Christ is able to take us up out of shipwrecked and dying condition, and us on the shoulder of his strength, and the omnipotence of his Gospel bear us on through all the journey of this life, and at the opening gates of heaven! It is mighty to save. Though your sin be as black, and inexcusable, and outrageous, the very moment you believe I will claim pardon - quick, full, grand, unconditional, uncompromising, illimitable, infinite. Oh the grace of God! I am overwhelmed when I come to think of it. Give a thousand ladders, lashed fast to each other, that I may scale the height. Let the run out with the anchor until all the vessels of earth are exhausted, that we may reach the depth. Let the archangel fly in the midst of eternal ages in trying to sweep up this theme. Oh the grace of God! It is so high. It is so broad. It is so deep. It is to my God, that where man's ears are out, God's arm begins! Why will ye try your sins and your sorrows any longer when Christ offers to take them? Why do you wrestle down your fears when this moment you might give up and be saved? Do you not know that everything is ready? There is plenty of room at the feast. Jesus has nothing of his love all ready to put upon your hand. Come now and sit down, ye hungry ones, at the banquet. Ye who are rags of sin, take the robe of Christ. Ye are swamped by the breakers around you, cry to Christ to pilot you into smooth waters. On account of the peculiar case of the subject, I have drawn my pen illustrations, you see, chiefly, from the water. I remember that a vessel went down in the Bermudas a great many years ago. It had a vast treasure on board. The vessel being sunk, no effort was made to raise it. After many years had elapsed, a company of adventurers went from England, and after a long voyage reached the place where the vessel was supposed to have sunk. They got into a small boat and hovered over the place. Then the boat went down, and they broke through what looked like a limestone covering, and treasures rolled out - what was found proved to be in American money, worth a million five hundred thousand dollars, and the foundation of a great business here. At that time the whole world rejoiced over what was called the luck of the adventurers. Oh, ye who have been struggling toward the shore, and have not been able to reach it, I want to tell you tonight that your boat hovers over infinite treasure! All the riches of God are at your feet. Treasures that never fail, and crowns that never grow dim. Who will go down and seek them? Who will dive for the pearls of great price? Who will be prepared to die, for death, for judgment, for the long eternity? See two hands of blood stretched out toward thy soul, as Jesus says, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

A MARTYR'S DEATH.

For five years past, Mrs. Mary J. Platt has been a teacher in the Pichango Indian Reservation at a village near Temecula, Cal., and has faithfully performed her duties educating the children and endeavoring to instill Gospel truths in their youthful minds. She has made many sacrifices for the sake of her pupils, and has at different times been in grave peril. Lately a body was found in the ruins of her cabin, and there were evidences that she had been murdered. Mrs. Platt has been kind to the savages on the reservation and it was not believed that they would have offered violence; but that they had added another name to the long list of those who have literally given their lives for the cause of Indian evangelization, seems now beyond a doubt.

cided to help only sufferers who were unable to earn a livelihood, viz: old people, the infirm, widows and orphans. We concluded that it would be proper to allow in the proportion of five Turkish pounds to each family, although we seldom give so much to a single family, regulating the relief according to the number in each household.

"We have thus far helped in all 876 families. Of these, seven are English or Maltese, 287 Mohammedan, 156 Armenian, 276 Greek, and 136 Jews. We have also paid for 24,300 okkas (an okka is a loaf of bread weighing about three pounds), which the local sub-committee are now engaged in distributing.

"The distribution of money we have made either personally, or by means of reliable agents, who have offered their services free for this work. Thus, the distribution of the Fund has been conducted without expense.

completely destroyed. Ever since the earthquake there has been serious trouble with the water supply in various quarters of the city, and this condition of affairs made the work of the firemen of Hasskeoi largely ineffective. Several hundred families have been rendered homeless by the fire, and their numbers are now added to the thousands of others who are recipients of relief, being unable to find work, food or shelter, for the present at least. Cholera's advent in the city within the last two weeks, has filled its cup of misery and rendered Constantinople the most wretched of cities.

One bright spot amid the general gloom and despondency was the recent anniversary of the Sultan's coronation, when the Turkish people usually celebrate, with lavish display and enthusiasm, the accession to the throne. On that day, the poor of the capital - never so numerous as now - were gladdened by the munificence of the Sultan

A PARALYTIC HEALED.

S.S. Lesson for Oct. 28. Mark, 2: 1-12. Golden Text, Mark, 2: 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE have seen that Jesus after his glorious Sabbath at Capernaum had risen very early. "a great while before day," to escape from man and get alone with his Father. It was an intense necessity to him. Yet he was to be interrupted. The disciples found him out and broke into his solitude with the words: "All are seeking thee." (R.V.) But instead of pursuing the advantage gained at Capernaum, he said, "Let us go elsewhere into the next towns, that I may preach there also; for to this end I came forth." And what was to become of his precious solitude? In this also he was ready to yield to his Father. Even communion with God may become selfish, and a matter of self-will; if the interruptions permitted by God are not as welcome to us as the communion itself; providing, however, they do not occur by any want of watchfulness on our part to keep the early hours of the day for the Lord.

In the course of his teaching and preaching in the synagogues of Galilee, it happened that a leper came to him beseeching and "kneeling down to him and saying unto him, If thou wilt thou canst make me clean." Had Jesus refused any sick one who came to him that this poor leper should raise the question of his willingness? Never. No refusal of Christ's to heal in any single instance is on record. Why then should the poor leper doubt? He thought perhaps that his case was an exception. Excommunicated from the worship of God, forbidden intercourse with his fellow men, the poor leper was indeed an outcast. "The leper in whom the plague is, his clothes shall be rent, and his head bare, and he shall put a covering upon his upper lip, and shall say unclean, unclean. All the days wherein the plague shall be in him he shall be defiled; he is unclean; he shall dwell alone; without the camp shall his habitation be." (Lev. 13: 45, 46.) How could one under such a curse expect that the great Teacher and Healer should deal with him as with other sick ones? Looking at himself the leper had good reason for his doubt. Looking at Jesus, and at the word of God he was indeed in the wrong. "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else." Again the healing of Naaman and Miriam were known and read in the synagogues; and the leper might have known that God's mercy extended even to the outcast leper. But in any case he doubted not the power, but only the will of the Prophet of Nazareth. Thou canst, but wilt thou? And Jesus? Was he so grieved at the leper's doubt as to be unwilling to heal him? Far be such a thought about our beloved Lord. The very doubt of the poor leper made him to be the more really in need of Jesus. Being moved with compassion he stretched forth his hand "and touched him and saith unto him, I will be thou clean." No explanation, no entering into the details of his case; the answer included all. And immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed. There is more of pride than we know whenever we make our case an exception. What is the difference between two condemned criminals? At the Cross we find ourselves all on one level, the lowest? The same "I will" proceeding from his own will, which led him to the Cross for us, insures our salvation and our cleansing. The same word of power, "Be thou clean," is our only guarantee for cleansing. "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you." (John 15: 3.)

Jesus commanded the cleansed leper to say nothing to any man, but to go direct to the priest, and offer for his cleansing "those things which Moses commanded" (Lev. 15), so wonderfully figurative of the cleansing by the blood of Christ and the anointing by the Holy Ghost. But he, taking things into his own hands, "went out and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more enter into the city, but was without in desert places; and they came to him from every quarter." Here again we have a lesson of how much there was in the ministry of Jesus to try and to test him. It would seem as if the healing of the leper might so blessedly have worked to convince the priests that Jesus was indeed the Messiah. Yet we hear not one word of impatience or complaint. His plans upset, the Son of Man recognizes only his Father's hand in all and submits. The proving of his own spirit, under all these circumstances, was going to be of more consequence to a lost world, and an untaithful church than the immediate gaining of the priests to his cause. In his own falling into the ground, and dying to himself and his own will, like the corn of wheat, he was laying the foundation for much fruit in "a people for his name." His chosen Bride, whom he lived and died to purchase and to prepare for himself, that with her, with his saints, he might also bless the whole world. He must tread every step of the way which his chosen ones must tread hereafter; and therefore he accepted all from his Father.

Led once again to Capernaum after some days "It was noised about that he was in the house;" no possibility of his entering the city unnoticed. The house filled with eager listeners and needy ones, until there was no room for them even about the door, and he spake the Word unto them. How many of those eager hearers became really saved? We know not. The word fell into various soils, then as now; some received it and some rejected it; to some it was a savor of life unto life, and to some of death unto death. It was not often that our beloved Lord had an uninterrupted opportunity to teach. Speaking "as never man spake," words which were "spirit and life," on which hung the everlasting salvation of the souls present, and of tens of thousands who should live afterwards, yet the patient Lamb of God never fretted against, or even complained of an interruption. His confidence in his Father was so complete, so unlimited that he could instantly put the interrupted thread into his safe keeping, and be ready to deal with whatever he permitted to happen.

The interruption this time was an exceedingly distracting one. Four zealous men touched with compassion for their paralytic neighbor, had brought him on his eastern mattress to be healed by the great Prophet. Finding no way to enter with their burden, they had found means to get the poor sick man on the roof which covered a considerable number of the audience. Removing the tiling and so making an aperture large enough to accomplish their purpose, they let down the mattress with its burden immediately in front of Jesus, until the sick man lay in his helplessness at his very feet.

Jesus did not look at the distractions; that was a personal matter and he left all such considerations to his Father. But he saw in the men who caused the distraction a faith which rejoiced his heart, because it honored God. "When Jesus saw their faith, he said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee." This was by no means the result which was expected by the four men who had borne their neighbor to Christ. They looked for physical healing for their protegee. Into the midst of some such teaching comes this helpless man. Unable to do anything, unable to pray, unable so much as to confess with his voice his past sins, he lies at the feet of him to whom John the Baptist bore witness: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world," and with authority Jesus announces to him, "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee." Son! This was the truest welcome. The distraction should in his Father's hand serve the purpose of his ministry and help, not hinder. It should afford a present example of his teaching.

For the first time in his ministry he exercised his right to forgive sins. There were those present who could not tolerate this. "There were certain of the scribes sitting there, and reasoning in their hearts, Why doth this man speak? He blasphemeth. Who can forgive sins but one, even God?" (R.V.) How could Jesus meet them? Always in communion with his Father, he perceived in his Spirit that they so reasoned within themselves, and to their infinite surprise answered the secret workings of their hearts, thus again conquering things which seemed to be contrary to his ministry.

CARRYING THE PARALYTIC TO JESUS.

THE story of Christ's life following Mark's narrative, which at this period is the one chronologically accurate, brings us in this lesson to Capernaum again. Jesus had been away from the town on a preaching tour through Galilee, a province somewhat smaller than the State of Delaware. It is uncertain how long he was away, but from various clues it would appear that he returned late in the fall of the year. He started on his tour on the day following the memorable Sabbath evening when all Capernaum was busy bringing sick people to him to be healed. Peter followed him to his solitary place of devotion early in the morning, with the message that the people were seeking him. Instead of going to them he set out on his tour. They would naturally be disappointed, but Jesus had a wise purpose in view. He did not wish to be regarded as a mere miracle worker, which was the view they were taking of him. Miracles were a subsidiary part of his mission. They were merely signs, or divine credentials. Christ worked a miracle with the same object that Moses had when he flung down his staff for it to become a serpent. It was to show that he came from God and had divine authority for his message. Jesus was sorry that signs were necessary to gain attention; it was still more humiliating to have the people so occupied with wonder at the sign as to ignore the lesson it was intended to teach. News of his return spread quickly through Capernaum and the people flocked around him. He preached to them, probably standing in the open quadrangle around which, as was customary in Palestine, the house was built. The crowd was so dense that when four men came, carrying a paralyzed man on a bed, they could not get through. The opportunity was not to be missed, as Jesus might go away again. So they carried the sufferer up the stairway on the outside of the house to the flat roof, in which they could easily make an opening and so let him down with ropes to where Jesus stood. In effecting the cure, Jesus reversed the order expected by the people, doubtless with the purpose of provoking a challenge and so emphasizing the lesson of miracles. He first forgave the man's sins and when the spectators questioned his right to do so, he showed that he had the right by miraculously curing the man. As he performed the miracle he stated the object of that and his other miracles: "That ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins."

It was noised that he was in the house. When Christ by his Spirit dwells in a house (in a man it is sure to be known. "Have you ever heard the Gospel?" asked a traveler of a Chinaman at Ning-po. "No," he replied, "but I have seen it. I know a man who used to be the terror of his neighborhood. If you gave him offence he would curse you and shout out his abuse for days. He was an opium-smoker, a criminal and as dangerous as a wild beast. But when the religion of Jesus took hold of him he became wholly changed. He is gentle, moral, soon angry and he has left off opium." By the Gospel as I have seen it is good.)

Borne of four. How many men and might become Christians, if those of friends who are already Christians would take them to Christ as these four carried the sick man to him when he was on the roof. This may be done by telling the unclean boy or man how much Jesus has done for them, or it may be done by using prayer. The house surgeon of St. Bartholomew's Hospital in London, tells a touching story which he vouches for as absolutely true. It was his custom to take a walk every evening in the neighborhood of the hospital for an hour, while a colleague was on duty. One winter night, as he was entering the hospital after his walk, the piercing howls of a dog struck him. The dog had been run over by a cab. The surgeon was fond of dogs and stayed to see where this one was hurt. He like the appearance of it as it was not a common mongrel and he picked it up and carried it into the hospital. He found that a bone in one of its legs was broken and it was badly bruised, but otherwise sound. He treated the animal and in a few days it was sufficiently recovered to go home. Several weeks passed and the surgeon had almost forgotten the incident, when one evening out for his usual evening ramble, he jumped up at him as he opened the hospital gate. It made great demonstration of affection and he at once recognized his discharged canine patient. He patted him and would have gone on, but the dog would not and ran to and fro between him and the corner of the archway. The surgeon suspected that the dog wanted him to go and he went. There lay another dog with a broken leg. How the cured dog brought him to the hospital, could not be discovered, but he had evidently done so and in some way had made him understand that he could be cured there. The surgeon was deeply affected by the intelligence displayed and undertook the new case with interest. If every boy who has gained admission to school were to do as the dog did, many a soul might be saved.

When they could not come nigh . . . then they covered the roof. Spurgeon used to say that he derived encouragement in undertaking tasks that were unusually difficult, from the recollection of a road in the Tyne. It runs over a bare mountain side which is worse than perpendicular for it overlooks the lake. Looking at it one would say that it was impossible to make a road there. It has been done. When men are really earnest they are apt to find a way. A engineer employed a lot of men to hew a groove in the side of the mountain. Below it looks like the semi-circular impression left in a block of wood when a carpenter has run one of his curved chisels along it. But when you come to travel on it you find it is a good solid level road. The mountain arches over your head. Is a tunnel with one of its sides missing. A very ingenious man was that engineer. It is so nearly everywhere; when a man wants very much to go somewhere he does a way or makes one. When the men wanted to get their friend to Christ and did not take him by the door they let him come from the roof. The earnest man is saved there somehow. So if you do not get Christ it is because you are not earnest.

Thy sins are forgiven thee. A desperate brutal man whose crimes brought him to prison was in sullen, rebellious mood when the chaplain visited him. He would not at first, but when the chaplain told him it was Christ's forgiveness that he could offer, the prisoner became attentive. "You do not know all I have done," he said. "You did, you would not talk about forgiveness." The chaplain preached the Gospel, full of pardon, and the prisoner meditated on this after the chaplain left him. At the next meeting he was completely broken down. Later on, when he came to speak of Christ to others, he used to say with feeling, "He is a great forgiver. I ought to know and I tell you he is a great forgiver."

applies, until the Rev. Joshua Hart became settled pastor in 1772. But one calamity ever another visited the struggling congregation. The Revolutionary war began in 1766 and all dissenting churches were harshly treated. It is recorded that Mr. Hart was remarkably loyal to the American cause and preached boldly against the indifference to which characterized many in Hempstead. One time, while he was preaching, a British company approached and the captain at the band in front of the church to distract the hearers and drown the voice of the pastor. Mr. Hart asked the congregation to remain seated and hear the music. After singing for half an hour the musicians became tired and departed, allowing the pastor to finish his sermon.

The church was afterwards used by the officers as a place to keep their horses, and when they went away nothing but a shell was left. After the war was over, the congregation repaired the building and had a singing service at the reopening.

The edifice stood until March, 1803, when it was destroyed by fire. A meeting was called to discuss the project of erecting a new church. At this meeting only a handful were present, and Mr. Beadell, an elder, sorrowfully said that it was impossible to do anything towards a new church. "Oh," said one of the younger men, who afterwards became Elder Pine, "we can build a church." "Well," said the old gentleman, "I will do as much as any of you." As a result of the courage of these few men, a new building was soon erected, which was dedicated as a church until 1846, when the present structure was put up, and the old church moved to the corner of Fulton and Washington streets, and remodeled for use as a parsonage where it continues as such to the present time.

The Rev. Joshua Hart preached to the congregation at two different periods after the Revolutionary war.

In 1818, the Rev. Charles Foster came, and under his ministry the congregation trebled in numbers. He was pastor till 1837, and was followed by Mr. Woodbridge in 1838. Mr. Woodbridge resigned to go to California as a missionary. He was followed by Charles M. Shields, who was pastor during 1849 and 1850. At a later date he became a professor in the Princeton Theological Seminary, where he has done excellent service in training young men for the Gospel ministry. Mr. Dunn, also a former pastor, who received instruction from Dr. Shields, speaks of him as "one of the most gifted philosophers and scholars of the land."

Dr. Shields came Rev. N. C. Locke, who was pastor from 1850 to 1860, and was succeeded by the Rev. J. J. A. Morgan. Rev. J. B. Finch came in 1867 and labored until 1875, when he resigned on account of ill health. He gave place to the Rev. Franklin Noble, who served successfully till 1880. Rev. F. E. Hopkins preached as a supply during 1881 and '82, and pastor in 1884, when he accepted a call to Bridgeport, Conn. The Rev. Charles E. Dunn came from Princeton Seminary, where he had just graduated, and remained as pastor until 1888. In 1890, the Rev. John A. Davis, entered on the ministerial duties, continuing till 1893. On April 25th, 1894, the Rev. Frank Melville Kerr, a graduate of Albany College, Meadville, Pa., class of 1888 and of Union Theological Seminary, New York, class of 1891, and pastor of the Presbyterian church of Chester, N. J., was installed as pastor, being the twenty-fifth minister who has served the congregation since 1644.

The membership of this venerable church is over 300, many coming long distances to attend its services. Its session is constituted as follows: J. Edward Davidson, Luke Fleet, Charles H. Ludlum, Percy B. Bromfield, William F. Conklin and Thomas F. Gilloert, elders, and the pastor. The Sunday School has an enrollment of 258, and when all the scholars attend, the chapel is large enough to comfortably accommodate the school. The superintendent is Mr. B. Bromfield, under whose faithful and experienced leadership it has made great advances. The present chapel was erected in 1855 and dedicated in 1856.

Few churches can point to such a splendid record of continuous and unbroken service. During the existence of this historic church, from its foundation up to the present time, the roll of its pastors, both regular and supply, has been as follows:

James B. Finch, 1867-1875, pastor; Franklin Noble, 1875-1880, pastor; F. E. Hopkins, 1881-1882, supply; F. E. Hopkins, 1882-1884, pastor; Charles E. Dunn, July 21, 1884-1888; John A. Davis, Jan. 1890-Sept. 1893; and Frank Melville Kerr, April 25, 1894.

Dr. Nathaniel Prime, the famous historian, in his history of Long Island calls attention to this continuous service as being phenomenal, and especially during the troublous years of the last half of the eighteenth century.

The future of the oldest of churches—have only served to knit faster the bonds of spiritual union and brotherhood in this flock, who, with the staunch determination of their Puritan ancestors, resolved to stand by their church at all hazards. Hardly another church in America can point to such a long and practically unbroken record of Christian service in the fraternal bonds of church fellowship.

This "Mother of Presbyterianism" gladly welcomes her children to her two hundred and fiftieth birthday. The Presbyterian churches of many of the neighboring Long Island villages, which were formerly within the bounds of the Hempstead parish, are rejoicing with the Mother who has brought to light and tenderly nourished, under difficulties, trials and persecutions, so many Gospel children and which, strong and glorious in old age, is still going on to future triumphs in the Christian cause.

Dr. Talmage Bound for Home.

He Sailed from Bombay, Oct. 6.—How Mammoth Australian Audiences Welcomed the Brooklyn Divine.

ON Saturday, Oct. 6, Rev. Dr. Talmage took steamer at Bombay to begin his homeward journey. When this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches our readers, its editor will either be ploughing across the Indian Ocean or else speeding along on a smoother course up the Suez Canal. His round-the-world tour has now been almost two-thirds completed. Proceeding from San Francisco by steamer to Hawaii, he next visited Samoa, Tasmania, New Zealand and Australia. Thence he sailed to Colombo, the capital of Ceylon and visited Kandy. From Ceylon he went to Calcutta and a cablegram informs us that while there he preached in Bishop Thoburn's church and also in the Duff Missionary College, Cawnpore, Allahabad, Madras, Benares, Agra, Delhi, Lucknow and Bombay, were each visited in turn.

His receptions at every point have been cordial and enthusiastic—some even having the character of public demonstrations. Especially has this been the case in Australia, where he has long been well known and where his sermons are almost universally read. In Sydney the welcome accorded him was a remarkable one. He was invited to preach at the Town Hall at 3 P. M., and as early as 11:30 A. M., the place began to fill, being overcrowded by noon, while thousands gathered outside. One Australian newspaper, the Sydney "Herald," says: "A considerable number brought their lunch—or a light substitute for the midday meal—with them, and took it 'al fresco.' By 1 o'clock the crowd had assumed great proportions. Every available inch of floor and gallery space was occupied. At 2 o'clock the outer gates were closed, strict orders being given to the police that no person was to be admitted. At 2:15 the disappointed crowd outside might have been counted in its thousands. Many had come miles to hear the famous orator. Dr. Talmage briefly addressed the crowd outside from the balcony above the portico. He stood there to proclaim the Lord Christ as a healer of all human ills, a strengthener of all human weakness, and a comforter in all human sorrow. Earnestly he besought them to turn their hearts to the one on whom—and on whom only—reliance could be placed. He wished them prosperity in this life, and joy in the life to come." The great outside throng—such a gathering had never before been seen in Sydney—listened with breathless interest to the words of the American preacher, whose sermons they had long been familiar with through the Australian press.

In the Town Hall the service was most impressive, and one long to be remembered by Australians. Over 5,000 were present inside the building. The use of the hall and organ was given free by the Mayor, and Dr. Talmage himself bore all the other expenses. Before sailing for Ceylon, Dr. Talmage visited all the leading Australian cities, speaking to large audiences in Paramatta, Melbourne, Adelaide, and elsewhere. It is generally conceded that the vast assemblages that greeted him everywhere have never been equalled in Australia.

MORAL VELOCITIES.

WE live so rapidly in these times that it is most important that we live aright! For the swiftest express cars are built especially strong and the train is under the care of engineer and conductor especially wise and careful. And if in our time we are moving so rapidly and amid such quick revolution of events, there are especial hazards and we need especial caution and especial guidance, only God can rightly conduct the train. It going only at the rate of twenty miles the hour an accommodation train jumps the track, the calamity is not half so dreadful as if going at six miles the hour. So in these times if the man goes wrong the smash up is far more terrific than if he were moving in times slow and deliberate. In olden times if a man became dissipated it took him ten or twenty years to get clear down, but now young men die of delirium tremens at twenty-one years. During the last week, in the courts, there was a drunkard at thirteen years of age! The moral velocities equal the temporal velocities. Our state prisons have in them young men who by thirty years of age foundered banks and wrecked insurance companies, and arrived at the awful terminus of the penitentiary at an age when under slower movement of opportunities they would yet have been clerks taking their first steps in banking or merchandise. God save the young man, for the perils are multiplied and terrific.

We are all in an express train speeding toward the finality of our earthly existence, and we come to higher realization of small fragments of time. When one year closes and another year begins we bethink ourselves of the value of the years, but what about our minutes and what about our seconds? Take care of the minutes and the years will take care of themselves. The most solemn thing on earth is a clock, and the next in suggestiveness is a watch. On a slow rail-train time lost may be made up, and, though half way to Chicago it be three hours behind, it may by the time it reaches the site of the late World's Fair have made up for delays and arrive on the minute promised in the schedule. But on an express train it is almost impossible to make up for lost time, because it is going at utmost speed constantly. And I have to tell you that on this express train of human life, time lost is lost forever.

PLAGUE AND MICROBE.

THREE great diseases have had an especial grudge against the human race. Their play-ground has been the graves and. Their banqueting hall has been the sepulchre. The Asiatic cholera has been known for centuries, but in 1817 it started from the banks of the Ganges to swelter and cramp the nations all around the world. It swept off 30,000 people in Upper Hindostan and 150,000 in Bombay, prostrated Central Asia, and, following the line of the rivers, crossed into Russia and down into Central Europe, marching on year by year, its path one great field of skulls, until, in 1831, it appeared in England, and, taking ship to our own country, this monstrous sickness landed at Quebec, June 8, 1832, and June 21 of that year it arrived in New York and all the cities shivered with horror and Death had hardly barns large enough to contain his harvests. Medical science has done much to alleviate the power of this great pestilence, but still it is unslain and every summer stands looking east, west, north and south to see which nation is most unable to resist its ravages. Another giant terror of the world was the plague. It formerly visited England every thirty or forty years. In the fourteenth century it did its worst. The carbuncled and swollen victims died until one-third of the entire population of London perished.

To make a trinity of horrors, yellow fever came in. Within narrow geographical limits it has always done its work of devastation, but done it thoroughly. The Southern cities of the United States seem to have been marked for its special havoc. It is now many years since it struck New York and sent its population flying in panic. Not figuratively but literally grass grew in Broadway. One of my ancestors was a victim of the scourge. It is an awful mystery. The things explained in regard to it are few compared with the inexplicable. That it should affect the Southern cities of the United States and a portion of Africa and be an entire stranger to China and India, is a fact insoluble. The medical profession have for long years been in constant discussion about its contagiousness. Some of the vessels in the British West Indian Squadron have reeled with it, and others, under the very same influences, have floated free. It is found out to come from a microbe that floats in the air. But that discovery does not help to stop the ailment, for who knows how to catch and kill the microbe? May we not pray for some light upon the scientific investigations of the day? There grows a herb somewhere or sleeps a mineral or waits in some laboratory a chemical which will defeat this assailment of our national health. The God who made the human body and all the plants and minerals alone can make the saving revelation.

THE BLESSING OF WATER.

WE are so stupid that nothing but the misfortune of others or our own misfortune can waken us to an appreciation of the common mercies of life. We all need to learn the lesson now taught with such emphasis by the scant reservoirs that millions of people are this moment giving heed to. We poetize about it when we see the water dancing in the shower or flashing in the lake or imperaled in the hoar frost or enthroned in the rainbow, but how little ordinarily do we think of the necessity which it supplies. No one but the infinite God could mingle this elixir which we call water. In right proportion are its elements combined, or instead of life it would be death. So simple it seems that poured out in a cup or standing in a pitcher it excites no remark, but what a divine mingling of sodium, chloride of magnesium, chloride of calcium, sulphate of lime, carbonate of soda, sulphate of soda, and many constituent parts I have not time to name. The human hand and brain can manufacture liquids deleterious or liquids that may be refreshing for a while, but it takes a God to manufacture, to mingle this wine of the hills, which never intoxicates and has no baleful reactions and is so superior to all other beverages that whatever else we taste, with water we close the feast, banishing all other tastes from our mouths with a taste of this divinely mingled fluid. Its importance God indicated when, in the formation of the earth, he put into it two and three-fourths times more water than dry land. You thank God for bread: why not thank him for water? The one is as great a necessity as the other. And here let me say there is no excuse for any American city being short of supply when there are great lakes of fresh water and great rivers of fresh water, north, south, east and west. Why does New York dip its cup into a puddle a few miles up when it might pour Lake George or Niagara Falls into its chalices? It is a small part of the money misappropriated in all the cities was devoted to the bringing down of more abundant waters, there would be in no city of America a threat of water famine. I rejoice that the Bible is all a sparkle with fountains, wells, rivers and oceans. They toss up their brightness from almost every chapter. Solomon, refreshed with the story of heaven, exclaims: "As cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country." Isaiah, speaking of the blessedness of Christians, says: "They shall spring as willows by the water courses." In the Canticles the church is often spoken of as "a well of living water" and "streams from Lebanon." The prophet, glowing with appreciation of the millennium, says: "streams shall break forth in the desert." And to make heaven the more alluring to those of us who have lived on the banks of rivers and are fond of landscapes ribboned and glorified with bright streams, St. John says: "He showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

P. C. Charey, New Salem, Ill. We are taught in God's Word to forgive others, as we have to be forgiven. But if there is no change in their conduct or character, and they do not ask forgiveness, are we to forgive them anyhow? Is so doing would we be holding them guiltless, while they are unrepentant?

Your Christian example of forgiveness may be the one thing needed to bring the offender to a true sense of his own condition and may lead to his penitence and reformation. We are to forgive and to labor with and pray for our erring friends, and strive, even against their obstinacy, to bring them into the light of Divine love and forgiveness.

M. T. Lewis, Cohoes, N. Y. 1. What did Peter mean by the restitution of all things (Acts 3: 19-21)? 2. What does Paul mean by Christ being the Saviour of all men (1 Tim. 4: 10)?

1. Many different interpretations have been given by commentators. The one that is most widely accepted is that it refers to the second coming of Christ and his millennial reign. This would render it a similar teaching to that in Rom. 8: 19-23 where Paul describes the restoration of the material world to its former glory. Isa. 11: 6-9 refers to the same time. 2. That all men may find salvation in him. He is the Light of the World but he is still more a light to his own people.

S. E. A., Albany, N. Y. Is there any difference between Christian Scientists and those who profess to cure disease by faith and prayer?

A very essential difference. Christian Scientists hold that there are two states—"the mortal mind" and "the spiritual mind." Those who are in the mortal mind, that is in the ordinary sinful worldly life, are liable to the common ailments of the flesh. But those who are in the spiritual mind are at one with the spirit of God in the universe and are impregnable to disease. Their mode of treatment is to bring the patient into this state of "spiritual mind" in which they will not feel pain. The other class are those who believe that Christ will heal the diseases of those who trust him with their bodies as they trust him with their souls, that is, exercise faith in him and ask him for healing.

Subscriber. 1. What is the best remedy for a young man who is habitually tempted with evil thoughts? 2. Is it wrong for a Christian to write letters on the Sabbath? 3. Can your Bible, previously advertised, be still purchased with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for $3?

1. Physical and mental activity. Find some congenial and improving study or pursuit for your leisure hours, that will employ both mind and body and enter into it heartily. When so engaged, you will have no time for wicked thoughts, which usually assail the idle. Pray for deliverance from them and earnest prayer, supplemented by a healthy and engrossing activity, will soon prove effective. 2. Yes, unless it be a case of urgent necessity. 3. Yes, by sending $3 to this office you can still secure the Emerald Type Teachers' Bible, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year.

Reader, Cuero, Tex. If a person attends the convention of his political party and promises to vote for the party nominees, and one of the nominees is a drunkard or a gambler or otherwise not acceptable, has said person the right to bolt said nominee and vote for a candidate of another party, or should he vote for the nominees of his party, both good and bad?

No self-respecting citizen can support for public office a man of the character described.

A promise, actual or implied, to support a party nominee can be reasonably construed as coming with it the condition that the nominee must be men of such character and reputation as to deserve the suffrages of the voters. In doing this, it is both the privilege and the duty of the citizen to transfer his support to some other candidate who is fit to be trusted with the conduct of public affairs.

J. J. Culberson, Ashland, O. What sort of argument should we send to Constantinople? Can we free transportation on Erie lines to New York?

Where "everything" is needed, it is difficult to specify. The best way to help is to send your gift in money to the Turkish Fund which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is Treasurer. All contributions are forwarded to our mirror in Constantinople and by him handed to the Relief Commission, which deals with sufferers personally. The transportation of or clothing would probably cost more than the value of the articles.

Geo. Kendall, Murray, Iowa. 1. Will the heathen who have no knowledge of God be saved by the Gospel? 2. Was the wine which was made at the wedding at Cana an intoxicating beverage?

1. God has not revealed to us what treat the heathen will receive at his hands. The only passage directly bearing on the question appears to be the remark of Christ, that he knew not his Lord's will and committed to worthy of stripes shall be beaten with stripes (Luke 12: 48). Meanwhile it is our clear duty to send them the Gospel. 2. An Evangelist in recording the miracle made statement on the subject of its intoxicating non-intoxicating quality, no authoritative can be given to your question. We know the narrative only that it was palatable but may infer from the character of Christ it was not intoxicating.

Subscriber, Gladstone, Mass. Do you think a son who is not a Christian, yet does many unselfish and kindly acts, will receive a portion of it and reward for them in the next or will he stand the same as one who is purely selfish life?

He will not stand the same as one who is purely selfish life, because he will not expect those reproaches of conscience, which we expect to torture the selfish man. If, ever, he has heard the Gospel and rejected it, we do not see how he can expect recognition, or reward from God on account of his deeds. Christ said emphatically, "no cometh unto the Father but by me." If, therefore, a man rejects Christ and takes his on his own merits, he plainly intimates that he considers his way better than God's way makes Christ's life and death, so far as concerned, unnecessary. That is an absurd thing is not likely to overlook. If a man is bringing a suit in a court wilfully and temptuously ignores the rules of the court would not be heard, no matter what were merits of his case. So a man who rejects Christ puts himself out of court and cannot expect God to recognize or reward him.

W. S. Forsey, Finch, Ont. What power was conferred on Peter by Christ's commission he keys, etc., (Matt. 16: 18, 19)?

The keys and the power of binding and loosing referred to a common Jewish custom. When a man had passed his examinations for the high position of a doctor of the law, he received as his diploma, a key which was handed him with the words, "Receive authority to bind and to loose," that is to permit or forbid. He mastered the law, he could say whether an act was lawful or unlawful. Peter's declaration that Jesus was the Son of God was the event of his having reached a state of spiritual perception which Christ recognized in the current phrase of admission to the highest in his church. Afterward it was seen that the power conferred was real, when Ananias and Sapphira died at his word. The keys may have had reference to Peter's opening the way of Christ's kingdom to the multitude of the day of Pentecost and to the Gentiles by pointing to Cornelius. It is clear that the apostles did not recognize Peter as superior to themselves. It was James who passed sentence on the council (Acts 15: 13, 19) although was present; and Paul "withstood Peter face" (Gal. 2: 11).

THE STRICKEN CZAR.

RUMORS of the serious illness of the Emperor of Russia which were current during the summer, took definite shape last week in the statement that he was afflicted with an incurable disease. The critical nature of his malady was concealed for some time, but when Prof. Leyden was summoned from Berlin to consult with Prof. Charin of Moscow, the public realized the life of the Emperor was in danger. The fact caused genuine and widespread regret. The conviction has been growing throughout Europe for years, that the autocratic ruler of the great Russian Empire was wise, discreet, peace-loving man. To his sense, more than to any other cause, Europe has been indebted for the past years of tranquility. He has succeeded not only in maintaining the ferocity of his own generals the arrogant bearing of his diplomat, but has exerted a pacific influence on the French Government, which was a more cultured business. At a time when France would listen to no other voice and when she was eager for a war by which she might gain her prestige, the Czar's influence was on the side of peace. Europe owes a debt of gratitude for using the enormous power in his hands for the general peace and it, therefore, hears of his approaching death with sorrow. Human sympathy, too, is stirred by the pathos of the reports that have been published. It appears that the chronic disease from which he has long been suffering was brought to a acute stage by paternal anxiety. His favorite son George was lying ill of consumption in the Caucasus and the Czar's stern would not let him sleep. He rose at one o'clock in the morning and went to the telegraph office to obtain tidings of the invalid's condition. He waited in the office an hour and a half for a reply from his son's physician and caught the news were cold. A few weeks later he traveled south to see his son, and one night his arrival he rose from his bed and went to Prince George's room and sat a long time watching the sleeping youth. On his way back to his own chamber, he had to go through a cold, draughty passage, and he renewed his cold and brought on an attack of rheumatism, which in his condition, was the worst ailment that could befall him. Since that time he has suffered much, and although his strong will and manly vigor have kept him from being confined to his bed, he has evidently been growing weaker day by day. The tone of the medical reports now indicates that the Russians have abandoned hope, although they think his life may be prolonged for a few months. He is forty-nine years old and has reigned thirteen years. Probably no man in the whole world has so much to do as he, yet in this extremity he stands on a level with the humblest of his subjects. He must die and his earthly rank and various position are of less moment to him than the record of his private life. He who are concentrating all their efforts on the attainment of worldly honor, can learn a lesson from the spectacle of this mighty potentate standing powerless on the verge of the grave. (Eccles. 8: 8.)

Contributions of Skin.

A press dispatch from Montclair, N. J., says that a case in the hands of two local physicians is eliciting strange expressions of racial sympathy. It is that of a boy who was severely burned on the Fourth of July by the explosion of a pocket-full of crackers. He has been under the doctors' care ever since and for a time it was doubtful whether he could be cured. Now, however, they pronounce him in a fair way of recovery, providing they can obtain a sufficient quantity of skin for grafting purposes. There is a space on his body of about four square inches which has to be grafted. The child's parents and several friends have contributed pieces of skin, but, as more than three thousand pieces are needed, the doctors are glad to receive offers from any one who is willing to give portions of their skin for the boy's benefit. Several persons have volunteered and the doctors think that there will be no difficulty in obtaining all they require. The grafting is to be done twice a week and will continue for six months. There can be no question about the genuine personal sympathy of the contributors. Money is often given to various causes by persons who do not care very much about them, but when a man is willing to suffer that some one else may be cured, we know that his sympathy is of the genuine kind. It is to such a spirit of self-sacrifice that the world owes its opportunity of redemption. Christ loved it well enough to die for it. (John 3: 16.)

Fought his Own Image.

A man was admitted to Bellevue Hospital, New York, on Oct. 3, who was suffering from a wound caused by a drunken who has the power to transform him into his own image, "reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord." (II. Cor. 3: 18.)

An Indestructible Lamp.

An ingenious inventor claims to have devised a lamp wick which, being made entirely of clay, will give some twenty-five per cent. more light than the cotton article. It is, as described, made capillary by incorporating with the clay, while in a plastic state, filaments of unspun vegetable fibre, which are burned out in the process of baking, the object being to provide an indestructible wick which shall possess all the advantageous qualities of an ordinary cotton or fibre wick, and shall also last an indefinite length of time, without renewal or necessity of trimming or other care. When the clay is baked the vegetable fibre is burned out, leaving capillary tubes running longitudinally through the wick, through which the oil from the lamp will be raised to the flame by capillary attraction. Owing to the perfect combustion of the wick, the flame is perfectly white, devoid of odor, and smokeless. It would appear from this that the light of a lamp is purer and stronger when the wick is only a channel for the oil and does not contribute of its own substance to the light. It is so with the spiritual lamps that are set for the lighting of the persons who had in various ways helped him or been kind to him. The young man had met with a good deal of kindness from one or another, but his mother was anxious to have the whole list, that none who had done her son a service might go unrewarded. Probably none of them ever expected to receive any return for their kindness, so that they are all as much surprised as the young heir. There is a similar but far greater surprise in store for some who have been kind to the Lord's poor. They will learn in the day of final account that he regards the service rendered to them as service done to himself. (Matt. 24: 37-40.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has Accepted an Invitation from the pastors of the Reformed, Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist churches of Hackensack, New Jersey to open a vigorous evangelistic work during the coming winter with a series of services.

Dr. J. W. Chapman has been Conducting special services at Terre Haute, Ind. A practical outcome of his work is likely to result in a united effort of all the churches against gambling and other forms of vice in the city.

At the Recent Ordination of Elders at the Pittsburg Conference of the M. F. Church, Bishop Foster was assisted by the pastors of the Baptist and Presbyterian churches, who cordially accepted the bishop's invitation to participate in the service.

Mr. Lyle, the Scotch Evangelist has been assisting the pastor of the South Chicago Presbyterian Church in a series of meetings. The church has been crowded and there have been many conversions. The interest has extended far beyond the district of the church.

Very Successful Festival Services have been conducted recently in Vermont by women evangelists, Royalton, Essex Junction, Troy and Marlboro have all benefited by these services. The preachers at these places were Misses Harmon, Nelson, M. D. Moffat and Etta Miller.

Major James H. Cole, the Evangelist, has just closed some very successful revival meetings in Clinton, Mo. It was a united effort on the part of the pastors and people of the Presbyterian, Cumberland Presbyterian, Methodist Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal South and Baptist churches.

The Famous Five Points Mission in New York is being rebuilt. At the ceremony of laying the foundation stone recently, a Bible was placed in the cavity which had been thirty-one years inside the foundation stone of the former building. The site is still the one formerly occupied by the Old Brewery.

Senor Calrera was, on Sept. 23, Consecrated first Protestant Bishop of Madrid. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Dublin, and the Bishops of Clogher and Down. For the past seven years efforts have been made to have this ceremony performed, but they been heretofore thwarted by the ritualists.

The Editor of a Prominent Japanese Daily journal said recently that judging by the number of converts to Christianity in Japan, Christian missionary effort there might be considered a failure; but he could personally testify that there is a higher standard of morality in Japan than ever existed before and he believed that the cause of the advance was the religion of Jesus.

The Seamen's Mission at Rotterdam, to the support of which some of our readers contributed last year, writes that during the year it has welcomed many American sailors and has been the means of usefulness to them. It would be glad if Christian people who take an interest in the welfare of the sailor would help them to support the mission by sending financial help occasionally to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be forwarded to them.

Canon Utterton of the Protestant Episcopal Church has just received the medal of the Royal Humane Society for saving a man from drowning. The Canon added to the service he rendered the man by giving him good advice. The rescued man was profuse in his thanks and ended by saying, "O sir, you have saved my life!" The Canon looked kindly but seriously at him and said, "Go and make good use of it."

The Death of Oliver Wendell Holmes Causes sorrow in thousands of homes in this and other lands. The genial writer was loved wherever his works were read. He had attained the age of eighty-five years and, as he said, he felt that he had had a full share of even an old man's allowance of life. But he was bright and cheerful to the last and at the recent celebration of his birthday dedicated a poem to the public which indicated that he had premonitions of the approach of the end.

The Pastor of the First Congregational Church of Portland, Ore., has announced from the pulpit that it has come to his knowledge that several houses in the city which are used for gambling and other immoral purposes are owned by members of Christian churches and that they know that their property is being so used. He added that the mills of his own church would be carefully scrutinized, and if the name of any person whose property was rented for such purposes was found there, he would be excluded from membership.

Rev. Asbury C. Clarke, Pastor of Grace Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, died in that city recently, after a protracted illness. He was forty-two years of age, was graduated from Dickinson College and had conducted a successful pastorate in Philadelphia before coming to Brooklyn. Under his spiritual care, Grace Church greatly increased its membership and Christian activities. Mr. Clarke was a most eloquent and effective preacher, and during his two years' pastorate in Brooklyn, was instrumental in bringing many souls into the kingdom.

The Pacific Garden Mission, Chicago, founded by the late Col. George R. Clarke, and carried on by his widow reports that during the past year the attendance has been from three to four hundred week day evenings and between five and six hundred Sundays. The mission is open all day Sunday and services continue throughout the day. It has a large Sunday School recruited from the slums, it supports a Gospel wagon for work in outlying districts, has a medical mission and dispensary and a regular system of jail visitation.

ALEXANDER III, EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

delusion. He came to New York from Boston, Mass., and after his business had been transacted he went out to see the city. He visited several saloons and became both hilarious and pugnacious. As he was passing a large store uptown, he caught sight of a figure that seemed familiar to him. He nodded in a friendly manner and stopped. His faculties were too much disturbed by his potatoes for him to realize that the figure before him was nothing more than his own reflection in a large mirror. He conceived the idea that the man was too proud to come out and speak to him, and regarding his manner as an insult he shook his fist at him. The answering gesture in the mirror convinced him that he was being mocked and that was more than he could bear. Mustering all his strength he struck a blow which shattered the show-window and the broken glass cut his arm severely. An ambulance was called and he was taken to the hospital where his wound was treated. Perhaps, by this time he has come to the conclusion that he was not wrong in thinking he was striking at an enemy, for the drunkard has no worse enemy than himself. It would be a good thing if his experience led him to give himself to Christ, world. The most useful lights are not those in which human gifts of genius and eloquence are conspicuous, but those that come from the oil of grace with which the Holy Spirit fills the heart. (II. Cor. 4: 7.)

An Unconscious Heir.

A New York daily journal publishes a dispatch from one of its country correspondents in which he describes a genuine romance. The hero is a waiter in a restaurant. He has lived all his life with a farmer and his wife who came from England about twenty years ago. He called them father and mother and always supposed that they stood in that relation to him. A few weeks ago, however, they informed him that he was their son only by adoption, and that his real mother was an English lady, who had notified them of her intention to reclaim him. Not long afterwards she arrived and had an interview with her son. She proved to be enormously rich and has taken her son away from the restaurant and sent him to college. She remained for some time in the neighborhood making liberal provision not only for the couple who had taken care of her son, but making suitable presents to

"Thine Ancient People the Jews."

Our Traveler spends a Day Among the Poor Arabian Jews of Jerusalem—Patiently Waiting for the Messiah.

OUR excursion to-day has brought us to a muddy common, outside the walls of Jerusalem. Right in the centre of it sprawls the most miserable village that can be imagined. Houses of unbaked clay and stubble, of cobble-stones held unsteadily in place by dried mud; board shanties, roofed and sheathed with tin cans beaten out flat and nailed on, all one-roomed huts, built along miry alleys, hardly six feet wide—make up the "Box Colony," tenanted by immigrant Jews from all quarters of the globe. The ground is lent to them rent-free by a wealthy Hebrew resident of Jerusalem. Most of the rooms are windowless, and every door stands wide open, to admit the light of a short winter afternoon. A bundle of rags, or a heap of straw, does duty in each as a family bed; braziers of charcoal are kindled with thorn-bushes, a heap of which lies in a central shed. There are children! children! everywhere.

Four of us women have driven out from town as close to the settlement as a carriage can approach, then walked down the crazy slope. Not far from Dr. Sandresky's hospital is a neat dwelling inhabited by two American missionaries—ladies, by birth and breeding, who at their own charges have devoted time and labor and life to the work of ameliorating the physical ills and enlightening the souls of this Jewish settlement. I have begged the favor of their escort, assured that the sight of these ministers of mercy will admit and recommend me everywhere. Mrs. Jamal accompanies me as interpreter.

Our first call in the forbidding circuit is upon a family of Aymonites, or Arabian Jews, usually esteemed as the most devout of all the sects. Our missionary friends have spoken warmly of their faith in God and the revelation made in their Scriptures of him and his purposes toward their race. An elderly woman sits flat upon the mud floor, stitching at a nondescript garment of many-colored rags. Near her stands a striking figure, a man with an Arab face and head-gear. His eyes glow like live coals; his manner of greeting us has a gentle courtesy out of keeping with his patched abieh and bare feet. He holds a baby in his arms who clutches his beard for protection while staring at us. We have not talked a minute before the room begins to fill with interested auditors. Every woman has a child in her arms, and presses to the front; the few men skulk in the rear of the crowd, and peer in at the door; the children fill up the chinks in the living wall.

The picture is peculiar and impressive. Near the door Miss Dunn, of New York, small in stature, with delicate features, and dressed simply in black, takes in every feature of the scene through grave, pitying eyes; at my side Miss Robertson, a native Kentuckian, whose Southern intonations sound strangely and sweetly familiar to me in this far-distant land, salutes each newcomer with a smile or word, and when the conversation opens, harkens with eyes as with ear. Mrs. Jamal, handsome and vivacious, ready with both the languages in which the colloquy must be carried on, her white izzar fallen back from her head and the blue-flowered mendeel lifted from her face, is at my other hand. To the man, as a leader and a teacher among his people, my queries are addressed:

"Where was your home before you came to Jerusalem?"

"In Arabia."

"What brought you so far from it?"

"We came as pilgrims, as Abraham of old, to the Land of Promise. Jerusalem is the City of the Great King. Our fathers builded it. It is our city."

"How have you fared here?"

"Badly enough, as you see. We left a land where we were comfortable, and had enough to eat and to wear, to become something little better than beggars."

"Was that wise? Do you not regret it?"

"Not for a moment. We bear all hardships patiently, expecting a release from captivity. Weeping may endure for a night. Joy cometh in the morning."

"You expect the Messiah to come before long, perhaps?"

A gesture of amazement.

"Who does not? The Deliverer will come to Zion. We are here to wait for him."

"When will he come?"

He spreads out his palms in Oriental (and Hebraistic) fashion.

"Ah! who can tell? We Arabians have three proverbs—'Who can tell when the rain will fall? Who can foretell when a child will be born?'"

Who knoweth when Messiah will appear?"

Mrs. Jamal's face lights up archly; she takes a step forward and answers quickly:

"But there are in two of these cases signs which we may read correctly. When clouds gather, we say, 'The rain is coming.' When pain takes hold of a woman, she knows that her hour is near. Do you, who watch and expect, see no signs that the day of the Lord is at hand?"

"We believe that we do. I name but one. Houses are rising within and upon Jerusalem's measuring-line—from the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner, and upon the hill Gareb and compassing about to Goath. Have you not read that 'the whole valley of dead bodies and of the ashes and all the fields unto the brook of Kidron, unto the corner of the horse-gate toward the east shall be holy unto the Lord'—that is, a part of the holy city? And beyond the Jaffa gate, behold houses upon houses, building! building! continually. It is written that there shall be one great, beautiful city stretching from Jerusalem even unto Jaffa."

His air is that of an inspired seer and he piles word upon word breathlessly. A low chorus of what sounds like "Amen!" arises from the listening women. One kisses her baby convulsively and begins to sob. Tears are on other cheeks.

"Ask him," I request of Mrs. Jamal, "where he has read the prophecy about the line of the houses from Jerusalem to Jaffa."

"In our sacred books," is the reply. "Not in the Scriptures that the lady knows."

"Will Messiah be born as a child, or as a man?"

"He will come as a King, descending from heaven, and clothed with majesty,—and as we believe, very soon."

"Will your children probably see Him?"

A sudden look at the unconscious infant who still plays with the father's matted beard, a closer clasp of the little form, and he shows us a face from which the light of holy exaltation has faded into quiet resignation:

"Who can know that? God's ways and God's times are past finding out."

A woman breaks in excitedly here. Mrs. Jamal turns to listen kindly and answers gently.

"She says that it must be! that God will not let them cry, 'How long? how long?' forever. And that they are weary, weary, weary, with waiting."

"Will the Temple be restored in all its beauty and glory and given to the Jews?" is my last question.

"Surely, yes, for thus it is written, and God keeps his word."

consumption, a huddle of rags all that shields her worn body from the damp earth. The missionaries have brought her clean clothing and nourishing broth. In another is a baby but three days old, for whom they have flannels and slips and petticoats. With them they leave a leaflet containing a hymn translated into Hebrew.

A man with long curls and beard cut in accordance with the prohibition—"Ye shall not round the corners of your heads, neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard," clothed in a black velvet gaberdine or gown, a tall cap edged with a strip of mangy fur upon his head, and a most disreputable bundle in his hand—stops to stare at us, as we quit the wretched home of mother and child. He is to American eyes, a villainous looking tramp, but Miss Robertson touches me apprehensively:

"He is one of their priests, and will, I am sure, question the poor woman sharply as to what I said to her; he will certainly take the leaflet away from her should he see it."

Glancing over our shoulders, we see him enter the hovel, no doubt with the intention she has indicated.

The good done in this unpromising place by these devoted women is incalculable by any system of human statistics. Walk meekly and unobtrusively in the footsteps of the Master, in sight of the hill up which he died, they have but one rule action, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," when the day is to succor the oppressed, feed the hungry and minister to the sick. Their part is their vineyard,—their world,—is the scene before us; their recompense will be given in the day when the Lord of those servants shall come and reckon with them.

There lies open before me as I write printed report signed by Dr. Merrill, consul at Jerusalem, of the present condition of the Jews in Palestine, from which am permitted to glean certain facts, regretting, in condensing the story, that I have not room to copy it in full.

According to this able archæologist and historian, in 1882-3 there was a sudden influx of foreign Jews into this country so large that, as many readers may recall, the attention of the Christian world was attracted to what might be the fulfillment of prophecies pointing to the literal return of the scattered tribes to the former home of the race. Dr. Merrill accounts for the movement by the railroad "boom," resulting in the construction of the line from Jaffa to Jerusalem. Many came to look over the ground and to confirm or dissipate the belief that money could be made by the chase and sale of real estate. Much land was exchanged hands during this period of excitement. Of the multitude of Israelites who then visited the Holy Land, a fair proportion remained. Dr. Merrill estimates the number here now at from forty-two to forty-five thousand, about twelve thousand more than the reckoning of the Chief Rabbi, given in my last paper.

In July 1891, the Turkish Government forbade the immigration of Russian Jews to Palestine, and land went down one-third in price. The late consul adds that the immigrants are almost entirely of the lower and poorer classes. Well-to-do Jews prefer to live in rich towns, seeking centres of trade. As a race, they are notoriously non-agricultural. Of four hundred and thirty families belonging to the thirteen colonies of Jews established at a comparatively recent date in the Holy Land, two hundred and forty-five are beneficiaries of the Russian Government, and practically semi-paupers. The Russian child has built model lodging-houses overlooking the Valley of Jehoshaphat and the Pool and Village of Siloam, and, by giving them house-rent and paying wages and rates and synagogue-tithes, allows a person a fixed sum per month for maintenance. The like provisions are made with regard to the farm-houses erected upon tracts of arable land in various parts of Palestine, where it is alleged, (although on this I have no data from Dr. Merrill to work upon) that the colonists hire the neighboring fellahen to do the work at extremely low prices, and do not themselves put the soil to the plough.

"In a word"—thus the ex-consul sums up the case—"Palestine is not ready for Jews, and the Jews are not ready for Palestine."

WHEN I AM GLORIFIED.

IN hope of heaven I find relief;
Although my heart is bound with grief;
A balm for every wound is sent,
With Christ my Shepherd I'm content.
The pathway for my trembling feet
May never bloom with roses sweet,
Whatever, then, shall be my fate,
I'll calmly trust the Lord and wait.

I'll hold the hand that leadeth me
O'er life's eventful, troubled sea;
And pray for strength to live aright
Though curtains dark obscure the light.
His wisdom and his goodness prove
A foretaste of his matchless love.

In verdant pasture I may rest
When Eden dons her nightly vest,
For then shall bloom immortal groves
When Error's lost in blessed truth.
From sin's deep stain I shall be free
Dear Lord, at last to rest with thee.

Those portals blest shall open wide
When with the Lord I'm glorified,
Then blessed Lord, O lead me on
To that bright world that blissful home,
And let me dwell in mansions fair
With all the pure from every care,
When death and pain shall no more be,
To live and reign with Christ at home.

PREMIUM ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has succeeded in arranging for a remarkable series of premiums. First of all, of course, is the International Teacher's Bible, with all the Helps and Maps, set in Ruby type, Divinity circuit binding overrapping at the ends, with red under gold edges. This eminently serviceable and very pretty Bible is again offered, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at $2. When ordering please mention Premium Offer: B-Five.

Next in order comes that most beautiful of Bibles known as the International Emerald Teacher's Bible, London Clear Type Edition, leather bound and leather lined, with silk book mark and silk head bands and silk sewed. There were times when a Bible like this would cost $8. To-day it cannot be bought everywhere even at $5; but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers it, together with a year's subscription, at $3. This book will last a lifetime. When ordering, mention Premium Offer: B-Three.

We also continue to offer Dr. Talmage's most marvelous book "From Manger to Throne," which has proved of infinite value to tens of thousands of people, presenting it does a new view of the life of our Saviour, magnificently illustrated, with many pictures based on photos brought from Palestine by Dr. Talmage, while journeying in the Holy Land with a view to gathering material for this, his latest and greatest work. As last year, so this year, we offer "From Manger to Throne" with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD $2. Mention Premium Offer: B-Four.

Next to a Teachers' Bible, the "Gospel Hymns" sung by Moody and Sankey in their great evangelistic services throughout America and England, are dearest to many Christian's heart. Never before has it been possible to secure these 739 Hymns, constituting the books usually known as Gospel Hymns 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 all in one volume, but the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, after a conference with the publishers of Gospel Hymns, has succeeded in obtaining a large edition of these marvellously soul-stirring hymns in combined form, without a duplicate and without an omission, printed from large type and set to music, and beautifully bound in maroon cloth, with red edges and gilt. A handsome hymnal has never been put on the market, and these "Six volumes of Sacred Song, complete in One," are offered to our subscribers with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. If, when you get the volume, you are not entirely pleased, send it back, and we will refund our money. Messrs. Moody and Sankey commending the volume say:

"The hymns in this book have been greatly blessed to many in our meetings as well as outside of them. May they in this combined form continue to bring the blessing of Him to whose honor and glory they have been sung in this and other lands."

This very desirable Premium contains over 700 pages, each page measuring 5 1/2 by 8 inches. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-Two.

Finally, we offer Dr. Talmage's great book, "The Pathway of Life," a large edition of which has been specially prepared for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Talmage kindly consenting to waive all claims to royalty. This great book containing 544 pages, having for a frontispiece a picture of Dr. Talmage recently taken in Australia, embellished by 200 beautiful engravings, in exceedingly handsome binding of cloth and gilt, and sent out into the world to make it better and more useful and more serviceable, is offered in connection with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $2. The book weighs three pounds and measures, when open, from tip to tip 9x15 inches. In shape and size it is a companion book to "From Manger to Throne," but otherwise entirely distinct. This book has been read with interest by Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, ex-President Hayes, ex-President Harrison, Major Gen. O. O. Howard, Secretary J. G. Carlisle, Bishop Vincent, Joseph Cook, Governor Fitzhugh, Bishop Hurst, Miss Frances Willard, General Sherman, Senator John Sherman, J. G. Whittier, Harriet Beecher Stowe, George Greenwood, Neal Dow, and many other men and women noted throughout the English-speaking world, all of whom unite warmly and cordially endorsing it. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-One.

Remember that all our Premiums are sent at charges fully pre-paid.

Words of Cheer.

ALLEN A. JUDSON.

IRA D. SANKEY.

1. We come to-day from near and far, The light of hope our guiding star;
2. 'Tis good to meet in His dear name, And all His wondrous love proclaim;
3. O Saviour, bless our Christian band, For Thee en-list-ed, heart and hand;
4. And when we leave this hallowed place, O grant to us Thy heavenly grace;

In Je - sus' name we gath - er here, For strength and words of cheer.
To learn the way of life more clear, And hear glad words of cheer.
In - cline to us Thy gra-cious ear, And give us words of cheer.
In all our way, O be Thou near, To speak glad words of cheer.

Chorus.

O wondrous words, sweet words of cheer, That Je - sus speaks in tones so clear:

Still may they grow to us more dear, While gath-ered in His name.

PRAYER SPEEDILY ANSWERED.

As an illustration of the power of earnest, believing prayer, the following incident is related by a Protestant missionary in South America: A poor native woman, who had been employed in the missionary's family, and had learned the way of life and the value of true prayer (so different from the senseless repetition of words before images of saints), was in great distress and want. The family were so poor that the father and mother were almost hopeless. One day Josepha came to the missionary lady who had been her help in times past and said: "Everything is going hard with us. We know not what to do. Will you not appoint an hour of prayer for us, and let us ask God's help together?" This was gladly done and at the set time Josepha and her husband came to the missionary's house. The hour of prayer was kept with great earnestness, and the two poor people went away comforted.

The next day Josepha came hurrying into the room where her kind friend sat with her children. The dark face was all aglow, and the dark eyes shining. "God has heard! God has heard!" she exclaimed. "Some one came from the other end of town and brought seven dollars' worth of thatching, and my step-son came in on the boat and brought sugar and plantains and chocolate and gave fifteen cents towards the dinner, a thing he never did before." This was rightly connected with the prayer offered—and was it not an answer?

COMING TO JESUS.

Written for The Christian Herald.

JESUS, I come! The portals open
That lead to thine abode.
Through life's dark scenes, no more I'll
But walk the heavenly road: [grope.
Thy light and love illumine the way:
It seems like one eternal day.

Here treasures rich and rare I find,
And pleasures ever new.
And all the joys of earth combined,
Compared with these are few:
Who would not leave the haunts of sin,
For bliss like this to triumph in?

Jesus, I come! unveil thy face,
Its radiance now impart:
I long each lineament to trace,
And 'grave it on my heart:
There, may the impress ever be,
I come! I come and dwell with thee.

Vain world, adieu, my wandering steps
I gladly now retrace.
And from my heart's most secret depths,
All thy desires efface:
Jesus! thou wilt my portion be,
I come! I come and dwell with thee.

THE TRIBAL SEALING.

Character, not Nationality, the Principle of Selection in the Sealing Under the Symbol of the Twelve Tribes.

BY NATHANIEL STARKEY.

IT is evident that the tribes mentioned in Rev. 7: 4-8 are, as we have seen, representative of classes or groups of distinct characters which are sealed for their preservation because they are characterized by certain qualities.

But we miss the tribe of Dan, and right glad we are at length to miss it, significant as it is of judgment, or one that judges. For these "judges of evil thoughts" have been sad troublemakers in Israel for ages, not fearing to trouble their brother and set at naught their brother: they have judged everything and everyone but themselves. All who have not pronounced the shibboleth, or seen not eye to eye with them, have been adjudged as heretics, not to be tolerated, but tabooed to the extent of their ability. And so in the place of Dan the judge, we get Manasseh, one who forgets, one who, though cast off by his brethren, forgets and forgives their injuries: and we account it a good exchange. And in our New Jerusalem home, when failure will be no more, Dan, either as a serpent in the way or a lion's whelp, would be as much out of work as out of place.

Thus, surely, we have names of the tribes enumerated as sealed ones the excellent of the earth, upon whom the seal of Divine complacency rests as upon those who shall be sheltered in the coming storm, and eventually caught away to meet their coming Lord.

These are they who dwell in the secret place of the Most High, and abide under the shadow of the Almighty; so that a thousand shall fall at their side and ten thousand at their right hand, but it shall not come nigh them; only with their eyes shall they behold and see the reward of the wicked. For, like their prototype in Egypt, the children of Israel were sheltered under the blood, while the Angel of Death smote their enemies so these shall be sheltered under this sealing of the angel a while after the storm of judgment has commenced, and as men of faith they shall shine as stars in the world's midnight.

And what are these various names but so many features of the one name, expressive of the one nature, in which all so endowed shall presently be swallowed up and lost; the one Jehovah-tsidkenu, which name the Bridegroom and the Bride are mutually to share, "For this is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness" (Jer. 23: 6), and, "This is the name wherewith she shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness" (Jer. 33: 16), which is seen to be the work of the Holy Spirit during the present age, in visiting the Gentiles, "to take out of them a people for his name" (Acts 15: 14). Having taken out of the natural branch a goodly remnant in the past age, he is now taking out of the branch, wild by nature but grafted into the good olive-tree, a further remnant, and thus is "making ready a people prepared for the Lord." And when she shall be seen coming down from God out of heaven prepared as a bride adorned for her husband, both branches shall be seen combined in the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb inscribed on her foundations, and these names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel inscribed on her gates.

Now that it is the true Israel of God, and not the seed of Jacob after the flesh, which are here intended, should be manifest to the spiritual discernment as well as to the most superficial observer of prophecy. Beyond preserving their nationality for the purpose of his grace in the coming age, God has had no dealings in grace with the Jew, nor will he have during this age, wherein they have rejected his Son from becoming their King. If our reading of prophecy be correct, two tribes alone return to Palestine and rebuild their city.

Before closing we venture to suggest to our readers that the 144,000 of Rev. 7: 4 and the same number of Rev. 14: 1 are not identical, although the latter may include the former, as the greater includes the lesser. In each case the number is symbolical of a class that can be numbered, and are numbered, and therefore a number distinct from "the multitude which no man could number" (Rev. 7: 9); but the former, on earth, the bride militant, and therefore incomplete; the latter, in heaven, the bride triumphant, and therefore complete.

CHRIST'S HEALING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Oct. 28. Matt. 8: 5-17.

HEALING at Christ's hands suggests more instructive thoughts than appear on the surface. The instances recorded vary in certain fundamental principles. He turned none away who came to him and he never failed to cure the sufferer, but the circumstances differed. In some instances, as in the case of the leper and blind Bartimeus, there was a declaration of faith on the part of the sufferer and an appeal for help. In others, as in the case of the centurion and the father of the demoniac, there was no appeal from the afflicted person nor evidence of any faith in him, but there was faith in his friends who appealed to Christ on his behalf. Again there were cases like the cripple by the pool of Bethesda and the paralyzed man let down from the roof in which no oral appeal for help was made, but Christ healed out of pure compassion. So it appears that the healing power of Christ was exercised altogether apart from the disposition of those on whom it was exercised. Two elements appear to have entered into the miracles of healing. One was the simple compassionate love of the Master and the other the value of the cure as an evidence to the spectators of Christ's supernatural power. After his departure, the Apostles exerted that power as a trust left in their hands for the benefit of their work, and the same elements were in operation; for it was in the name of Christ that every cure was performed. The healing gift was still in the hands of Christ and it is there yet. The fact is encouraging both to those who need his help and have faith in him, and to those who ask it for others who need it but have no faith. The miracles as such appear to have been held by Christ in light esteem. He bade his disciples to seek higher gifts than that of the power to heal. The miracles were simply means to an end. And that end is with us to-day. Christ wanted men to trust him and believe in him, and his miracles were the coarser inducements that all could appreciate. He wished them to think of him as the fountain of spiritual life, and he knew that they might be led to do so by seeing him as the fountain of physical life. It is this which we put to the test now. A man possessed by the demon of drunkenness, or sensuality, or any of the passions which degrade or debase humanity is invited to trust in Christ. What he did on earth with the body he can do with the soul. Spiritual life flows from him now as physical life flowed from his body. "I am so weak; I know I shall fall," says the victim; but Christ imparts life and he becomes strong. Temptations assail, but omnipotent force and vigor oppose them and they are vanquished. It is not a creed that we accept when we become Christians, but a vital connection with Christ and from him receive power. The form of the malady is nothing and the helplessness of the sufferer is nothing; the power is in Christ. The miracle of transformed nature and character is far greater than the miracle of restored health, and this miracle is being worked around us every day.

AN EPWORTH LEAGUE ENTERTAINMENT IN INDIA.

The first Epworth League in Bengal to receive its charter has been celebrating the event by a public entertainment. "The Indian Witness" gives the following report of the proceedings: "The meeting was held in the Bengali Methodist Episcopal Church in Dharamtala, Calcutta, and it was such a successful affair that the members are inspired with new zeal and enthusiasm. The evening's entertainment was under the direction of Miss Blair, chairman of the literary department, and much of the acknowledged success of the evening is due to her efforts in training the singers for their part of the entertainment. There were songs by young men and one song by Bengali women which was of special merit

BULGARIAN KING'S DAUGHTERS—THE ROYAL HELPERS OF SAMOKOV.

A song in the Oriya language with violin accompaniment added variety to the entertainment. Mr. Kripa Nath Biswas gave an address on the Epworth League, and Mr. Lieden interested all present with a historical summary of Methodism. This bare outline of the proceedings quite fails to show the very enjoyable character of the meeting. Its good results will no doubt appear in better attendance upon the devotional and literary meetings of the League and promise well for its increased usefulness and prosperity. In the Epworth League, however, as everywhere else, there is no excellence without labor. The most successful portions of this entertainment were those on which the most labor had been bestowed. The League will prosper everywhere exactly in proportion to the amount of patient labor which faithful men and women put upon it."

The brethren were preparing when the mail left for a District Conference of the Bombay Leagues to be held Sept. 20-21.

BULGARIAN KING'S DAUGHTERS.

On this page we give a picture of a group of King's Daughters, taken from a photograph, for which we are indebted to the Secretary of the Order. The ladies who make up the group belong to the Circle of Royal Helpers which meets at Samokov in Bulgaria. The principles of the Order are of universal application, and Bulgaria is no exception to the rule. Those who desire to serve Christ by helping the people in his name never lack opportunities, wherever they may be. These Bulgarian ladies have among their charges an aged blind woman, a woman who has been a cripple for more than eleven years, and a family of orphan children whose father died early this year, after a protracted sickness, in which the Royal Helpers ministered to him with Christian kindness. They have given an unusual proof of self-denial in agreeing among themselves to make no presents to each other on birth-days, Christmas-days or New Year's. The cost of the presents they Miss D. Stoeva. "We ask you," writes Miss Kasurova, with a pathos which must appeal to every King's Daughter in America, "as we have but lately begun this work, to remember us in your prayers that we may rejoice the King with our small service."

AMONG THE ORDERS

An Epworth League Union to hold a meetings every four months has been organized in Connecticut consisting of the Leagues of Windsor, Warehouse Point, West Suffield, Thompsonville, and Hazardville.

An Epworth League of the First Church of Los Angeles, Cal., has been giving gold and silver badges as prizes for the best and second best essays on, "How to interest boys in the Epworth League." The offer has aroused considerable interest.

The journal of Newcastle (N. S. W.) Association, the "Lighthouse," has changed its form and now comes out as the "Young Men's Echo." It tells of excellent work done by the Association, which hopes in a very short time to be occupying a building of its own.

Some of the Montreal Christian Endeavor Societies are engaged in temperance work after a very vigorous fashion. They are securing pledges against the patronage of licensed grocers, and in favor of the patronage of those who do not sell liquors.

The Swedish Baptist Young People's Unions of Minnesota have organized a State Union. Rev. O. L. Bodien, Minneapolis, is President. Rev. M. Larson, Duluth, Vice-President; Rev. L. J. Cloud, Secretary and Miss Lottie Anderson, Scandia, Treasurer. It is expected that the Swedish Union of Epworth League will also be organized in Minnesota.

The Anglo-American Y. M. C. A. 160 Rue Montmartre, Paris, ask young men coming to the French capital to apply, personally or by letter, to the secretary for information required. To those intending residence in Paris, the advantages of the Association, religiously and socially are invaluable.

The Christian Endeavor movement is making considerable progress in Ireland. On September 25, Donegal Street Church, Belfast, was filled with young Endeavorers, who met to hear an address on Christian life and work from Rev. Henry Montgomery. The chair was occupied by Rev. James Riley. The meeting was most profitable and enthusiastic.

A movement in connection with the Baptist Young People's Union has been inaugurated in Chicago for a general campaign on behalf of missionary extension. Its object is to hold a series of mass meetings throughout the country to arouse and quicken the interest of churches in foreign missions, and is hoped that in every city and town where there is a B. Y. P. U. a large meeting will be held under its auspices. A committee has been formed to promote the effort.

The total cost of the San Francisco Young Men's Christian Association building the record of such enterprises. It is $328,000. The lot cost $105,000; the building $203,000 and the gymnasium outfit and interior furnishing $20,000.

The General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada recently in session, London, Ont., rejected by a large majority the proposal to adopt for Young People Societies the official name of Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor. It decided by a majority of three to four to make the official name The Epworth League. The reason urged against this course was that the face of united Catholicism in Quebec and other large cities, it was desirable for union of Protestants of all denominations. There are now 250 young people's societies in the Canadian Methodist Churches.

AT EVENING.

Is it sunset in the west?
Life is often at its best
The evening should be bright,
And God long delay the night,
And keep you here for love's caressing,
Safe and happy, blest and blessing,
Hope will grow, and faith will strengthen,
And the shadows, though they lengthen,
Will be pleasant, cool, rest-giving!
And the joy of gentle living
Shall be greater as the days
Are hallowed into songs of praise.

But when night comes on apace,
And the light fades from the face;
When strange sounds are in the air,
And the soul, compelled to prayer,
To the body bids farewell,
Think not 'tis a funeral knell;
'Tis the song of birds at morn,
The stir of Day that soon is born—
Then lift up your head on high,
Your redemption draweth nigh.

-MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

The Maoris at Home.

Curiosities of the Aborigines of New Zealand—Strange Customs and hideous Disfigurements—Tattooing and Scarring—Maori Wives and Widows.

HERE is probably no people in the world among whom the savage art of tattooing has been brought to greater perfection than the Maoris of New Zealand. Rev. Dr. Talmage, who recently spent some time in that country while on his round-the-world tour, gave us in his letters a most interesting picture of the aboriginal remnant, which is now fast dying out. Tawhiao, the last of the Maori kings, passed away recently at the ripe age of seventy. He was a picturesque old savage, artistically tattooed and with a history almost as checked as the painted lines and furrows upon his face. Like the chief whose portrait is given on this page, Tawhiao's countenance was seamed and scarred by sharp shells, which had dug out innumerable lines that were anything else than "lines of beauty." It is such a display of the tattooer's skill as is considered worthy of a great chief. Even in these days, when the younger generation of Maoris is adopting the customs of civilization and becoming educated and Christianized, tattooing is held in esteem in many parts of New Zealand. Formerly a youth was not regarded as fit to enter the ranks as a warrior or to claim manhood's privileges unless he had been tattooed; and it was customary for the young men to seclude themselves in the bush and there undergo the torture and assume the dignity of the facial decorations which their ancestors were so proud.

Another peculiar custom is illustrated in the larger photograph upon this page, which has been forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Dr. Talmage. It represents two Maori women, both widows, getting each other after the strange fashion observed among these people, viz: by rubbing their foreheads together. This grotesque ceremonial is performed with the utmost seriousness by these antipodean dames, who make no more of it than Americans make of the familiar handshake and "how do you do?" The dress is one that is seen everywhere among these people in New Zealand. Following another ancient custom—a relic of savagery, when woman was regarded as a chattel or slave—the hands of these matrons branded their husbands upon the arms of their wives. Sadly, such customs are now dying out, as superstition and barbarism are superseded by educated intelligence and Christian kindness. Woman's condition in New Zealand to-day is completely revolutionized since the time—less than twenty years ago, probably—when these two poor native wives were branded like cattle. The contrast is a remarkable one, and more so from the fact that New Zealand has been the first country in the world to accord woman full recognition in public affairs and to grant her the franchise privilege to which those of Maori descent are eligible equally with the wives and daughters of white settlers. After long centuries of degradation, the brighter day has come for the Maori women. With pleasant homes, kind treatment and bright Christian hope, they have reached an atmosphere of which their embruted and enslaved predecessors could never have dreamed.

A Mother's Victory.

There are difficulties in many a family which others little dream of, and one of the hardest things is divided counsel, where husband and wife are not one, and yet the one who has the deep spiritual life (and especially if she be the mother) will, I believe, win in the end. I read some time ago of a deeply devoted Christian mother whose husband had become sceptical, and head, and brother in the other with a cut finger, and a lot of sewing on her lap, and she was rocking the cradle besides."

A Brahmin's Views of American Wives.

A native Brahmin of India, Purushotam Rao Telang, writes: "The Hindu woman, having been tied to the lot of the man early, thinks only of him. His happiness in her happiness. She loves her husband devotedly. In the Western nations, I observe that the man works from morning to late in the night to earn money. He has no rest. Who enjoys the benefits of his money? His wife. While he is struggling to get the almighty dollar, his wife is enjoying the luxury and the leisure it buys. If she cannot get the newest fashions of ornaments or clothing, she is often unhappy, and consequently, if the husband cannot buy them, he, too, is made unhappy. The young girl is brought up by her mother to think that she is equal to the man and in some respects superior to him. She spends much time at her toilet: she wears in her bonnet flowers, feathers, dead birds, sea-weeds, moss, horns, thorns, big give to all who ask him, even his own blood, we need not fear that a press of business or contact with a sinful world will stain our hearts or lives." This pure plant, which is endowed with the power to shake off all soot and dirt and anything that would soil its freshness and beauty, is a fit type of the soul that has the spiritual panoply of Christian purity and righteousness, which will enable it to resist the temptations of the world and the contamination of sin.

At Life's Close.

An aged Christian thus writes of the "last rounds of life,"—the sweet pleasure of contemplating the rest beyond: "It is graceful for an old man to take a rest; and it is decidedly ungraceful for him to hold on to place or money till his bony, old fingers are loosened from their grip by force or by death. The world has almost slipped away from us and we reciprocate by desiring to slip away from it and to go to that better world. This world and we are getting ready to turn our backs upon each other, not in disgust or contempt, but because that is the order of nature with which both the world and we are in harmony. We are satisfied. We have had our full share of its joys and sorrows. Its joys have lost their zest, but its griefs and cares have not lost their sting. Nature prepares us for the changes that await us. The desire of old age to retire from the world is only the oncoming of sleep. It is natural and it is pleasant. We will wake up fresh and bright in the heavenly morning."

OVER-SENSITIVE PEOPLE.

HERE is a class of people with whom it is painful to come in contact. Very nice, they may be, and good in all respects; but the fact that they are gifted with an undue amount of sensitiveness makes life often a burden to themselves and to others. In many cases this intense sensitiveness has its origin in childhood when children are made much of, until they grow to be wonderfully conscious of themselves. If parents, when they see the dawnings of this trait, which grows to be such a painful one after awhile, would do all they could to check and discourage it; if those who have a temperament which inclines them to sensitiveness would call to their aid all the common-sense they possess and reason out the causes for offense which meet them so much oftener than they meet others and consider how much of it has its origin in imagination, both they and the world would be gainers. The busy world has no time to stop to listen to small complaints, and complainers are apt to be left in the back-ground, and sometimes to be so pushed aside as to really have some grounds for discontent. The wisest plan is to try as far as possible to forget self. The slights which are usually so trying may be ignored, for it is not a matter of so much importance how one is treated as is the effect it has upon the character. That effect is lasting, the other is but transient.

October's Party.

October gave a party;
The leaves by hundreds came—
The Ashes, Oaks and Maples,
And those of every name;
The sunshine spread a carpet,
And everything was grand,
Miss Weather led the dancing,
Professor Wind the band.
The Chestnuts came in yellow,
The Oaks in crimson dressed;
The lovely Misses Maple
In scarlet looked their best,
And balanced all their partners
And gaily fluttered by;
The sight was like a rainbow
New-fallen from the sky.
Then in the rustic hollows
At "hide and seek" they played;
The party closed at sundown,
And everybody stayed;
Professor Wind played louder,
They flew along the ground,
And then the party ended
In jolly "hands around."

the mother endured untold agony as the father made sport before the children of what was to her most sacred and dear. Not one word passed her lips, however, as she would not lower him in their estimation. When they were in bed she took her New Testament and read the life of the Saviour to them, making no comment on what they had heard from their father, and the truth was the effectual antidote. Three of her boys she lived to hear preach Christ, and all her children followed her into the Church. She had religious life in her family.

Mother's Note.

Here is a not unfamiliar picture which many readers will recognize. "Did your mother write this excuse?" asked the teacher. "Yes'm," answers the boy. "Humph! It looks very like one of your own scrawls." "Mamma wrote it; but, please ma'am, she had sister in one arm crying with a bumped needles, and in her dress, pins, hooks, ties, iron and brass bars, clips, stitches, and what not; and on her bosom I have seen her wear a living lizard fastened with a thin chain. Her waist is laced tight by a corset, which makes her pant for breath. In her pride she has forgotten woman's part."

Keep Your Heart Pure.

Botanists have discovered a beautiful flower in the coal districts of Pennsylvania, where everything is very dingy, but the flower is unsullied. Its petals are as pure as if it were blooming in a daisy field. If you take up a handful of coal-dust, and throw it over the flower, it runs off and leaves the flower as stainless as before. It has an enamel which prevents the dust from clinging to it, and seems to have been created for just such a place. A gentleman writing of this flower, says: "I have often thought of this white flower. If we are covered by the enamel which Jesus will

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
BY
MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

Summary of the Story.

The previous chapters of the story describe the arrival at the magnificent home of Colonel Royal St. Clair of his niece Valeria Vernon, the daughter of his widowed sister. There had been a little unpleasantness about the marriage of this sister. She had insisted, much against the wishes of her family, on accepting the suit of Henry Vernon, who was of good birth and character—an earnest Christian indeed, but whose income was small and fluctuating. She had received a considerable sum of money from her father, but part of it had been lost in an imprudent investment, so that when her husband died, leaving her with a family of five children, it was necessary to practise rigid economy. Her brother, Col. St. Clair, had increased his patrimony by fortunate speculation and was immensely rich. When, therefore, his niece Valeria, in her seventeenth year, came to visit him, the difference between her uncle's sumptuous mansion and her mother's humble home in Virginia was very perceptible to the girl. Quite as marked was the contrast between Valeria and her cousin Annie, the daughter of Col. St. Clair, who is about the same age as Valeria, but who, having lived in fashionable society and traveled in Europe, is much more experienced in the ways of the world. Annie, with her brother Roy, give their cousin a cordial welcome and arrange a lawn party to introduce her to their friends. There Valeria meets Dr. Gordon, who tells her that fashionable life is empty and unsatisfactory from beginning to end, and warns her against injuring her constitution and starving her soul by becoming a woman of fashion. Valeria learns from her cousin that she has rejected offers of marriage from several young men and listens to the programme of her future, as she has mapped it out. It is to be full of pleasure and enjoyment and Annie ridicules the objection which Valeria raises that it seems to be a useless life.

CHAPTER VII.

"Society," an empty thing.

SCARCELY had the girls arisen from their afternoon nap, when a servant entered, bearing upon a silver waiter two dainty cards and upon them the names—
"Miss Arabella Stewart, Miss Willie Manning."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Annie with a frown, "I wish they had staid at home. Here they have come in time to stop our drive and it is such a lovely afternoon too, and it is so seldom we have such an opportunity as this."

She smoothed down the frown, and as she and Val entered the parlor, she exclaimed rapturously:

"Oh, Belle, Willie, I am too happy to see you both. How sweet in you to call so soon!"

"We feared, Annie," said Miss Belle, "that you and Miss Vernon might be going out to take a drive, as the carriage is standing at the gate."

"That makes no difference in the world. A drive is an every day occurrence, while, you see, your visits like those of other angels, are few and far between."

Then they drew chairs up closer and began quite an animated conversation.

"How perfectly splendid it was last night," said Miss Belle, and Miss Willie lisped in echo:

"Perfectly thplendid!"

"Now it was too utterly good in you, Annie," continued No. 1, "to give us so much pleasure and in your lovely cousin in being the occasion of it. Mr. Roy knows how to get things up in tip top fashion, you see."

Then No. 2 lisped on the other side:

"How did you enjoy last evening, Mith Vernon?"

"Very much, indeed," replied Val, "I was never at a Lawn Party before."

"Were you never? I think they are perfectly thplendid! It with tho thweet in A nie, and everything with arranged tho ththely. I had two ethorth to the table, and I think it ith tho nthie to have two ethorth, perfectly thplendid!"

Val could only reply, simple-hearted child that she was:

"One is about as many as I can manage. I don't think I should ever want two."

"Oh, I manage thplendidly. They inthpire me. The more the letter I think. I gueth you haven't been out in ththiethy tho long ath I have, ith perfectly thplendid! I thaw you talking to Dr. Gordon, how were you pleathed with him?"

"He struck me as a man of intelligence, one very independent in his opinions and practices, a man decidedly practical, who thinks for himself, attends quietly but thoroughly to his own business, and is a perfect, Christian gentleman."

"Ah!"

And lisping beauty placed her eyeglass to her eye and gave Val a close scrutiny. A sentence from the other side caught her ear, and she dropped her eyeglass, and turned her head to listen. It was No. 1 speaking and the words were:

"I felt completely sold. Why, she was horribly dressed, gets that Mrs. Saunders to make her dresses, because she is cheap, and then passes herself off as my friend. The idea! It just disgusts me! I thought she was somebody, but I tell you now, she's a mere nobody. I'll vow she'll never speak to me again or she'll soon know what's good for her ladyship. I'll look more icily at her from this time on, world without end."

"Tho will I," lisped No. 2.

"Girls," said Annie with an amused smile, "you will horrify my Virginia cousin. I think so many insights into society are not good for her. You all know that I never wear an American ball dress, for it does seem to me that I can tell the very sweep and hang of a Parisian-made dress, as well as artistic eyes can discern a veritable Turner; but common sense is common sense, and now, is it kind in us to denounce our friends, because they are independent enough to wear what they please? Now, I may not admire the dress, but I do admire the independence, for if there is one trait in a noble character that I admire more than another, it is this. It takes a brave girl in our circle to wear a home-made dress. Men care nothing for such things; indeed, they admire most that woman who refuses to spend fabulous prices on articles of dress, which will change with the season. Here is my little cousin, pretty as a rosebud, who looks very sweet in her simple toilet, and, without any doubt, she awakens more admiration than we do, who are such devotees of fashion."

"Annie, my dear cousin," said Val, "I thank you for the compliment you have paid me, and, since you speak of my wardrobe, you must let me add that not only are all my dresses American made, but every one was fashioned by these very hands."

She opened her little pink palms, very innocent and unoffending, but very tender and sweet, then she closed them, crossed her arms, and awaited the shock of battle. Three pair of eyes looked at her, one with a smile, the other two with looks bordering closely upon scorn, but without noticing the remarks, No. 1 said:

"Annie St. Clair, you surprise me! You are a changed girl. How long have you been converted to Utilitarianism? I'm astounded!"

"Tho am I," lisped No. 2.

"No, I am not changed, girls. I am the same I ever was. I always hope to be a leader in the fashionable world, and I follow our capricious mistress with blind idolatry. I love dress, and money is nothing when I want to buy. Papa lavishes it upon me and flatters me; mamma smiles proudly upon her extravagant child, and Roy don't care a cent; and so I keep on, and so I expect to keep on. I was born with taste; I inherit it from somewhere I don't know where; but, to confess the truth, my eyes see more true beauty in simplicity than in all our turbellows and fashionable colors. To me there is as much expression in dress as there is in one's face, and there is certainly great artistic beauty in those dresses when complexion, form and figure are considered, and when harmony of color is studied. This requires taste and judgment rather than money. When the world changes, and it is the fashion for 'beauty' to be 'unadorned,' then I'll follow, but not till then. That is the plattform upon which I stand."

"Well," exclaimed No. 1, throwing up her eyes and hands, "I am certainly relieved. I was beginning to fear you were a fit subject for the lunatic asylum."

"Tho wath I," was the lisping echo.

Since the afternoon was far spent, and the young ladies had "several more calls to make," they took their leave, first with a cool "good evening, shall be happy to see you," to Val and a gushing kiss to Annie, with entreaties to "come soon," and then they swept out of the parlor and were gone.

At the next house a consultation was held over the Virginia girl who made her own dresses, and it was universally resolved that she was poor and coarse, and they would have voted her out of society at once had she not been at the St. Clairs.

CHAPTER VIII.

A long dream, and the awakening.

Ever since Val's arrival, letters had constantly passed between herself and her mother. Now that winter had fully set in, balls and theatres were frequent, but Val hid herself behind her mourning and this was considered sufficient excuse for not attending. She insisted that Annie should not remain at home on her account, so she went to all. Val enjoyed herself at home, sometimes with Roy, who often pleaded some excuse and remained, or, not unfrequently, some gentleman called by whom her non-attendance was understood.

A letter to her mother will explain the whole situation of affairs.

"DEAR MOTHER,—I have now been here a little over ten weeks, yet they have been so full of pleasure they seem hardly days, and yet they appear years when I think of you, my dear mother, and my darlings at home. Everybody is still as kind and attentive as they possibly can be, nothing has been said or done to make me feel my poverty, or, that I have always been accustomed to simple life. Everything is beautiful, the grounds fairy-like, and the house a blaze of brilliancy. Uncle shows his love by lavishing presents upon me, has just ordered a lovely grey silk for me since I shall soon put on half mourning. Aunt Rosa, always delicate, remains most of the time on her lounge reading some yellow backed literature, but she always greets me with a smile and kind word. Annie, dear Annie, is so particular lest some one may wound my feelings. She knows that I am different from herself and companions, but she is attentive, kind and sweet. How can she help being a little mite selfish and wrapped up in her own pretty self, and the admiration universally accorded her by women as well as men! She has refused several apparently fine offers of marriage since I have been here, and it is a subject which she treats merrily, and really thinks it a matter of no regret. There is a favored one I can plainly see. She accepts his attentions evidently with great pleasure, and a beautiful color suffuses her cheek at the mention of his name, yet it is the one least frequently upon her lips. He drinks,—but who does not in this fashionable circle! They all look upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its color in the cup, and they do more, they quaff it to the dregs. Annie's lover sometimes drinks to excess, for I myself have seen his eye flashing wildly, his step unsteady."

"One night, she looked surprisingly lovely at a select party here. Her arms were bare to her shoulders, for Uncle admires her most, when her arm, perfect in its fair, round beauty is fully displayed. I watched her as she reached her arm across the table, poured out a sparkling goblet and handed it to her lover with a sweet smile. He took it, smiled in return, bowed and drank. A fit of shuddering seized me, and it was sometime before I could control my shaken nerves. It seemed to me that I could divine her future, and read on to the sad, sad end. The next day I was so oppressed by this picture, and the seemingly prophetic vision which followed, that I sought an opportunity, and from my full heart, said:

"Dear Annie, do not be offended with me, but my dear cousin, do not marry Clarence Deveraux. He is handsome, polished, rich, is a gentleman with plenty of idle leisure at his command, has a fine education and his family fully equals yours, but Annie, dear Annie, he will not make you happy. He drinks, your husband will be a drunkard! I can't let you marry him, I must save you."

"She stopped me, turned and said slowly and steadily:

"Val, dear child, you cannot save me. I have promised to be the wife of Clarence Deveraux, and I am happy in the thought. I love him with an undivided heart, more than I ever dreamed I could ever love a human creature, and he loves me so well that my demanding heart is fully satisfied. I once thought to sell myself for gold and a lordly establishment. Perjured vows, you think. Pshaw! that is poetry, a little bit of sickly sentimentalism that I cannot tolerate. Nothing could ever induce me to marry beneath me, so I thought to marry for position in society, and I thought I would reward the man who took me, with the little heart I had to give, seared and yellow by that time perhaps. Now my cup of happiness is full. Val, you poor, little, innocent dove, frightened at even your own sweet cooing, don't cast a shadow of regret, at this my decision. Life looks very beautiful to me through the rosy veil of love. You cannot save me. I don't want to be saved. To be saved from marrying Clarence, would be to lose my happiness."

"But, Annie, dear Annie, he drinks!"

"Certainly he does. Ha! ha! ha! That's nothing. Now, I cannot endure those men who actually get drunk, and have to be carried home from gay saloons in express wagons in the still hours of night. There's Mrs. Prince, they say she goes down to Tintoret's and leads the Major home herself very frequently, while he can yet walk. This, of course, does not enter into my calculation. Oh, no, indeed. I am willing, perfectly willing, for Clarence to indulge in wine and champagne; they're fashionable. I drink them myself without scruple, and always expect to keep them on my side-board, or papa's, which is the same thing. No, no, as far as Clarence is concerned, I shall never object to his doing one thing that will give him pleasure. I love him too much for that."

"Do you feel sure he can say, 'thus far will I go and no further?'" You know, dear Annie, that there is but one step between the fashionable drinker and the drunkard."

"Oh, that he will never be."

"What security have you?"

"Her words were slow and measured as she replied:

"The security of his love. He loves me too much to drink in this style; he loves me too much to bring upon me the degradation of being a drunkard's wife the mortification of seeing him reel with an uncertain step. I'll trust him. I'll trust the love of Clarence Deveraux."

"I said no more,—what more could I say. Her decision is unalterable. She loves him blindly, and, poor girl, tears spring into my eyes as I look into her near future."

"And now, my dear mother, my dream is over. I am awake, fully awake. I must leave this place and this gay life and go back to my blessed, quiet, true home. How dear it seems, dearer than ever, dearer than I dreamed it could ever be! Lite here is aimless, a vain, endless search for happiness amidst satiety. If one could get down to the depths of every worldly heart, there would be found, I verily believe, an unresatisfied thirst, that the waters of earth can never quench. Surely, surely we were made for something better than to mere gaudy butterflies, flitting from flower to flower, sipping life's sweets! Oh, I am weary of it all! Life is real, life is earnest. I see it now as I never saw it before. Sometimes I think that you sent me here to learn this lesson, knowing my intense thirst for the pleasures of life. You know how used to sigh, when I read how Solomon planted him vineyards, made him orchard gathered the silver and gold, got men singers and women singers and the delights of the sons of men as musical instruments of all sorts, and how he looked, and beheld that all was vanity and vexation of spirit and then how I would murmur and say, 'I could only prove it for myself, could I these vanities, so called, in my own crucible and test them.' Dear mother, I have done it. I am fully satisfied. If this was the lesson you were willing for me to con here to learn, then rest assured, the lesson is learned, committed down in the very depths of my heart, and it will never, never be forgotten. Give me my home with the love of my mother and little ones, the come poverty, labor and fatigue, what care."

"I am coming. I shall use the first pretext to leave, for I have been away too long already. Good-by, for a short time. With fondest love, VAL."

You Have Stolen my Soul."

Angular Superstition of a Buddhist Priest in China—A Supernatural Picture.

An artist, who was recently traveling in China, relates a unique incident which illustrates the superstition so prevalent among all classes in that country: Crowds of people assembled as we arrived at the inn just before sunset, and, among others I spotted a fine head of an old Buddhist priest. After a long talk and a few strings of "cash," which passed from my pockets into his hands, I was able to induce him to sit for his picture, and I dashed off a sketch in oils before he had time to change his mind. Unfortunately, the large crowd that had gathered around, especially the women folks, seemed to scold him and talk angrily at him for his illness in sitting, owing to the strange notion that prevails in China and, in fact, early all over the East, that if an image is reproduced a soul has to be given to it, and that the person portrayed has to be the supplier of it at his own expense. The venerable old Buddhist priest who was nursing his "cash" on his lap while being immortalized on a wooden panel, and had a curious wrinkle in his eye, as if he knew better, rested bravely for some time and sat like a statue, but finally had to give in.

"You will die," cried an old woman at me; "I saw your soul coming out of you and go into the picture. I did really, I saw with my own eyes!"

"So did I," cried a hundred other voices a chorus. By the time the priest had got up, they had half convinced him that at least half his soul had really gone out of him; but he did the soul gone or not, he would go and take the cash for safe keeping to his home, and complain and ask for the restitution of his lost property afterwards. He was a sensible man. So was I, and knowing that was coming, the moment he had gone I went into the room and packed the sketch, then took another clean panel and cleared it with the scrapings of my palette. Twenty minutes had not elapsed when he was back again, of course without the "cash," holding his stomach and complaining of internal agonies.

"I am going to die," he cried the moment I saw me, "you have taken away half my soul! I wish it back, as I feel bad now about it."

"All right," said I, "I shall go in the room and destroy the image I did of you; will you then be satisfied?"

"Yes."

Here the other panel, smeared with palette scrapings, was produced and disfigured with a knife, and never in my life have I seen an expression of relief to equal that of the priest. He had not felt half his soul so much going out of him, but he certainly had it coming back again. He could swear it. He was now perfectly well again!

1,000 MILES OF GOLD.

Mr. J. F. Marks, a scientific engineer and surveyor, reports that the new Coolgardie gold fields in Australia are the richest ever known. If his reports should be verified, the fields will prove a second Ophir, even richer, if possible, than the famous mines in which King Solomon extracted his fabulous wealth. The new gold fields are 150 miles long and, in some parts, over 3 miles broad. Six men made the first gold find, the oldest of the group being over seventy, the youngest a stripling of twenty-one. In six weeks they got $80,000 worth of gold out of a hole three feet deep, and with the most primitive appliances: at now that they have sunk a shaft and struck the reef at the fifty-foot level, as rich as was on the surface, a "perfect blaze of gold" they may be said to have $1,000,000 worth of gold in sight. Men wheeled their golds in wheelbarrows through the 115 miles of bush that intervene between the gold find and the nearest railway terminus. See even packed all their belongings in barrels and rolled them. There are now 9,000 people at Coolgardie, who are mainly occupied in prospecting on their hands and knees in all directions.

FINDING HEAVEN.

The true way of godliness is to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. It is related that a minister one day preached on heaven. Next morning he was going down town, and met one of his old wealthy members.

The brother stopped the preacher and said: "Pastor, you preached a good sermon about heaven. You told me all about heaven, but you never told me where heaven is."

"Ah," said the pastor, "I am glad of an opportunity this morning. I have just come from the hilltop yonder. In that cottage there is a member of your church. She is in bed with fever, her two little children are sick in the other bed, and she hasn't a bit of coal or a stick of wood, nor flour, nor sugar, nor any bread. If you will go down town and buy five dollars' worth of things—nice provisions—and send them up to her, and then go up there and say, 'My sister, I have brought you these nice provisions in the name of our Lord and Saviour,' then ask for a Bible and read the twenty-third Psalm, and then get down on your knees and pray—if you don't see heaven before you get all through, I'll pay the bill."

A PRIEST'S TESTIMONY.

Christian work in Spain has been conducted for many years by Major Macinlay, who has had to encounter bitter opposition from the priests. Not all the priests, however, are of the same mind. The Major relates a story in evidence of the fact. He says: "A fisherman and his wife, who had heard and believed the Gospel, were returning from market in a large railroad carriage with a number of other fishermen, when a Roman Catholic priest entered and took his seat. The rough fishermen, thinking to set by the ears their godly companions and the priest, began asking the man and his wife all sorts of questions about sin and salvation. The wife, who was the better speaker, answered the inquiries by reading passages from her Bible. When the questions began to flag, thinking it a good opportunity, she preached the Gospel to the little company. Presently the priest rose to leave the train at an intermediate station. Before alighting he lifted his hat, and, turning to the astonished fisherman, said: 'What the senora has said is true.' Subsequent inquiries failed to bring the workers into touch with this priest; but he who led him to give this simple testimony is able and willing to lead him into all truth."

ONE WOMAN'S WORK IN CHINA.

Miss Jessie Ackerman, President of the Australian W. C. T. U., went to China as one of the "Round the World" missionaries. Speaking of her experience there, she writes: "A call came to me to go to the interior of China, and for my own protection I adopted the costume of the country, the garment of four thousand years. I felt like a chapter of ancient history as I stepped into the house-boat. Seven Chinese oarsmen, a cook, a native Christian and a Bible-woman made my escort. Thus I journeyed for many weeks, my only food being boiled rice, going into the villages, speaking to the women in their homes, and the men in the streets and rice-fields. The dire effects of opium were to be seen everywhere. Amid the babel of voices that come to us from Chiua, I bring the gentle voice of woman, lifted in solemn protest against this curse. They said to me that as opium had ruined so many of their fathers and husbands, it would be a mercy to send the British soldiers to kill the women and children, if they were left helpless and hopeless. The money earned by Chinese women at the ploughs, was spent by their husbands for opium.

THE MOODY GOSPEL FUND.

During the week many encouraging letters have been received from friends, containing contributions for the Fund for extending the work of the Bible Institute in Chicago. It is a movement that lies very close to the hearts of Christian people everywhere, and the love of souls inspires them to extend practical aid to Mr. Moody in his great task of training missionaries for Gospel work among the unevangelized masses.

The Moody Gospel Fund is now over $1,000. Contributions during the past week were as follows:

A Great Convention.

Representatives of the Church of the Disciples to Meet at Richmond, Va.

CN interesting convention will hold its sessions in Richmond, Va., this week. It is the forty-fifth annual meeting of the representatives of the Church of the Disciples of Christ, who assemble every year to receive the reports of various societies connected with the church and to deliberate on the general condition and work of the denomination. They will have reason for congratulation and thankfulness, for the public records show that the church is making extraordinary progress. The report of the census bureau shows that it has increased in numbers at the rate of eighty-seven per cent; a rate of progress attained by no other church in the United States.

We are indebted to Rev. S. T. Willis, pastor of the Second Church of the Disciples in New York for a sketch of the work of the church at home and abroad which will be reviewed at the convention this week. From this it appears that the first two days of the convention will be occupied with the report of The Christian Woman's Board of Missions, which is carrying on aggressive work in this and other lands, besides having established and maintained a flourishing Biblical Department in the University of Michigan. Mrs. O. A. Burgess, of Indiana, will preside over this body. The next two days will be devoted to the General Christian Missionary Society. Several matters of interest are expected to come before this body. Two years ago a committee on "Unification of Work" was appointed. One year ago it submitted a provisional constitution for the union of all the branches of Missionary work, which will be acted upon. It suggests that this Association be called "The American Christian Missionary Society," as legal successor to the General and Foreign Missionary Societies. It provides for four departments of work: 1. Foreign Missions; 2. Home Missions; 3. Church Extension; 4. Negro Education; with a separate board of nine members in each department. It is also expected that the standing committee on Christian Union will make interesting and, it is to be hoped, encouraging reports of their conferences with a like committee from the Southern Baptist Association. During the present year this board has appropriated funds toward the establishment of the Disciples' Divinity House in connection with the Chicago University, which has met with severe criticism from many of the leading educators of the church. If a settlement of this matter is effected at all, it is likely to be through much tribulation. The resolution, "that we favor constitutional and statutory prohibition in State and Nation, and pledge ourselves to do whatever we can, as citizens and Christians, to sweep this iniquitous liquor business from our land," adopted by the last session, will indicate the attitude of this great body toward the momentous issue before the American Christian public.

Christian Endeavor will be another important subject discussed. The Disciples rank fourth among the churches in the number of local Christian Endeavor Societies, and are enthusiastic supporters of this popular movement among the young people. Dr. J. Z. Tyler, of Cleveland, Ohio, is National Superintendent of this department. His duties are: 1. to gather statistics and encourage the Christian Endeavor movement in the churches; and 2. to aid the Missionary Secretaries in disseminating missionary intelligence and in gathering missionary funds. He is expected to make an excellent report.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will sit in convention on Oct. 24th and 25th. Dr. Chas. Louis Loose, president of the Foreign Board, who is also the venerable president of Kentucky University, will preside over the deliberations. President Loose is likely to be re-elected to the same position; this being the custom of the Foreign Society. This convention represents work in six foreign countries, viz: India, which has twelve missionaries and four native helpers; Japan, with eight missionaries and twenty-three native helpers; China, with thirteen missionaries and six native helpers, Turkey, with three missionaries and eleven native helpers, Scandinavia, with two missionaries and eight evangelists, and England with five missionaries. The society is carrying on hospital work in several places and zenana work in India. Archibald McLean, Secretary of the Board will make his usual annual report, which always strikes a key note and generates abounding enthusiasm for the evangelization of the world. The Boards of Negro Education and Evangelization and Church Extension will also make reports through their secretaries.

The Disciples have an interesting history; the movement popularly known, in many parts of the country, as Current Restoration began to develop under the labors of Alexander Campbell and his coadjutors about 1810 in Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Virginia and Kentucky. These zealous men were convinced that the main cause of the deplorable divisions in Christendom was the man-made creed of the churches, and that these divisions would be removed if men would take the Bible alone as the only authority in faith and practice binding upon Christians. They began to preach with the motto, "Where the Bible speaks, we speak; where the Bible is silent, we are silent." They taught that faith in the heart that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, was the primitive Christian creed, and that the model of Christian life is the life of our Lord. As they believed that baptism by immersion on profession of faith was Scriptural, they adopted that mode, and might have become a part of the Baptist church but for their rejection of creed and their readiness to participate at the Lord's table with Christians who had not been immersed. These peculiarities separated them, and in 1827 churches were organized under the name of the Disciples of Christ, which rapidly increased in number until now they have nearly a million communicants.

A MATABELE CONVERT.

The conquest of Matabeleland about which there was so much severe criticism is already proving helpful to missionary effort. A missionary who is at home on furlough says:

A young negro from Matabeleland—one of Lobengula's subjects—listened very attentively to the Gospel message. Presently he came to the night-school to learn English. Meanwhile he brought his weekly money to Mr. Morris to take charge of for him. This went on for many long months. At length the young scholar, now an intelligent and devoted Christian, claimed his savings, which amounted to $250, and bade his faithful teacher farewell. He was going to Cape Colony to train for Gospel work at his own charge.

What an object lesson for young people of our own privileged country. A savage lad, valuing the Gospel so highly as for its sake to endure this self-denial in order to become a teacher of his own people!

AN EXPERIMENT IN NURSING.

YOU mustn't be so rough with him!" Jinny cried, swallowing hastily a large mouthful of dried beef, thereby nearly choking himself, as he went to the child's assistance. "You don't seem to know anything 'bout babies at all. They've got to be handled pretty careful, an' you must keep 'em right side up, else there'll be trouble."

While he was trying to talk at the same time that he gave evidence of being partially strangled, Jinny had succeeded in placing the little fellow in a proper position on the floor, and quelled his anger with a fresh supply of sweets, saying as he ate him a lump of molasses candy thick-coated with chocolate:—

"If I've got to feed him up this way all the time, it won't be long before I'll be broke, cause candy's awfully expensive."

"Why don't you try somethin' else? I've heard that a piece of beef, I've heard that as mighty good for babies."

"But 'sposen he swallows it, an' gets choked?"

"Tie one end of a string to the meat, an' the other to a stool. He couldn't get the whole thing down."

This seemed to be a very good suggestion, and Jinny acted upon it at once; but not without many protests from the child, who objected vehemently, in his peculiar way of eaking, against the substitution of the beef for the sweets.

"There now! You see I may not know w'to handle them kind of fellers; but I n keep 'em quiet!" Ben said triumphantly as the child amused himself by picking at the meat with both teeth and fingers. He had hardly uttered the words when my sprang up in alarm.

"He's swallowin' the string! Hold on to that stool!"

Ben seized the article of furniture, and my caught up the baby.

Since each moved in an opposite direction the meat was extracted from his mouth, and the little stranger set up a most vigorous howl which would have given serious offence to Master Jarvis, had he been there to hear it.

"If that's the way you know how to take care of babies you'd better let this one be, or he'll be killed!" Jinny said sharply, as he placed the child in one corner, much as if believing it necessary to move him a certain distance from the vicious Ben.

"If he knew how to talk decent, you'd threaten to thump th' head off him if he swallowed the string, an' then the plan w'd work all right; but so long's he don't do anything except jabber, I don't s'pose it would do any good to scold him. I've you given him any water to-day?"

"I'll bet that's what he's after!" Jinny said as the child struggled to rise to his feet. "I forgot all 'bout that! Hand me the string, will you?"

There was a pail with a wooden cover in the corner of the room, where Uncle Tom kept his supply of this necessary commodity, and thanks to the efforts of both boys, fully half a pint was poured down the little stranger's throat, despite his best attempts to prevent such an operation.

The half-consumed molasses-and-chocolate stick quieted him, however, and Jinny was at liberty to finish his supper.

pursued, and woke to the certainty that he heard a great trampling of the horses, then saw that there was a faint tinge of dawn in the east, and that the great star he had been watching was lower in the sky. Philetus had taught him to call that planet Jupiter. Would he begin all over again with Philetus?

There was a step near. He durst not move till he heard the low murmur. "Art thou there, and ready?"

"Most ready, O Leo!"

"All are sound asleep at last. Didst thou leave the gate open?"

"No—is it so?"

"Wide open, and the horses gone."

"It must have been left open when all went to try to get a share of the feast," said Attalus, for it was generally secured with a thong of leather or a nail. "I think Whitefoot and Longmane would come at my whistle; or could we not escape best on foot?"

"Hardly safe: the ground is not broken enough if the horses are caught by others. Try what thou canst do."

The lad whistled in a low, peculiar note, and the dark outlines of two of the horses which had not strayed far away could be seen trotting up. There were fond of Attalus and were easily secured, with a little coaxing, and he had their saddles and bridles hanging up in the shed.

"Hast thou arms?" asked Leo.

"I am never trusted with them, not even a boar spear."

"I will fetch some," said Leo.

Attalus held his two steeds, caressing their necks softly, and bidding them bear him well to home and joy, while Leo ran lightly toward the house, where he took up a buckler and a spear. With all his care the spear point rang against the axe, and Hunderik's sleepy voice called out, "Who goes there?"

"Leo, thy servant," was the answer. "I am going to call Attalus to turn out the young colts. Morning is coming and he is a heavy sleeper."

"Do as you will," returned the Frank, and went to sleep again.

Leo left the hut. He had already provided himself with a shield and a spear, and a bag of food which he had left with Attalus and the horses. The boy sprang into the saddle as he saw his friend coming in the twilight, Leo handed him the weapons, and off they started, as the sky reddened in the east, and they saw before them the wide brown heath. Attalus could hardly check a shout of ecstasy as he felt Whitefoot bound under him, and the free morning breeze blew cheerily in his face. Two years a captive, and now his face was set toward home!

A MISSIONARY'S PARABLE.

A missionary in India answered with a parable a Mohammedan objector who interrupted him in preaching. The Mohammedan wanted the missionary to explain the doctrine of the Trinity, and came again and again to the services to put his question. Finally the missionary submitted the dispute to his audience. "Suppose," he said, "a fatal disease is devastating the kingdom. The king has a specific which is a sure cure, and he calls a number of physicians, gives them the specific and bids them go out with it and heal the sick. There is one physician who effects few cures, and the king sends for him and inquires how it is. The physician answers that a learned man wanted information about the king's person and private life, and he has been satisfying him. But the king says, 'Meanwhile my subjects are dying. I sent you out to administer the specific, not to gratify the curiosity of learned men.' And the physician is punished, and deserves to be. Now," said the missionary, "my King has sent me out to preach the Gospel, that dying men might be saved, and I am not going to neglect that to argue about the Trinity." The audience applauded, and the missionary proceeded to preach the Gospel.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood." Benlah Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption and the Lungs and Decidive, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

DR. TALMAGE BELTS THE GLOBE.

Editor of "The Christian Herald" at the Last Stages of His Round-the-World Journey—A Life-Long Wish Realized—Some of the Places Visited.

AFTER nearly five months of ceaseless travel by land and sea, across mountain and river, and by rail, steamer, horse, mule and camel, traversing a score or more different countries and becoming acquainted with their people and customs, Rev. Talmage has now turned his face homeward and will soon again set his feet on his native soil. This round-the-world journey had long been a cherished dream of his, and now that it has become a substantial reality, he has been brought face to face with many thousands who, though living on the other side of the globe, had already be-perienced at Honolulu were repeated by these generous-hearted Pacific islanders. From Samoa to Tasmania is a long sea-run, but one golden morning in June brought Hobart Town in sight, with the headlands of that strange and weird country discovered by the old Dutch navigator, Tasman.

New Zealand was the next stopping-place on the journey. Here the traveler found, in the prosperous cities of Auckland, Christchurch and Dunedin, right royal welcome from clergy, laity and public officials, and he was the special guest of Lord Bishop Cowie. He then crossed the stormy little strait between New Zealand and the islandnally intended to make his tour one of sight-seeing and recreation, accumulating stores of health and knowledge for future use; but he found everywhere vast gatherings awaiting his arrival and arrangements made upon such a scale of publicity as rendered seclusion impossible. In church, town hall, lyceum, and opera-house, from platform, porch, balcony, and sidewalk, he preached the Gospel to these antipodean multitudes.

In several cities, notably in Melbourne and Sydney, the assemblages were so great as to be almost unmanageable. As an illustration, we may mention that being invited to preach in the Melbourne Town Hall on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 19, he found it physically impossible to reach the hall through the dense mass of people who had surrounded its approaches, the building itself being packed almost to suffocation.

then entered the building to find a similar state of affairs inside.

But his observations of Australia were not confined to the cities. He went out among the great sheep and cattle ranches, and among the farmers; he "roughed it" among the miners at Ballarat and Geelong. The photograph presented in this issue shows Dr. Talmage and a party of gold miners at Gympic, Queensland, where he paid a visit of inspection to the famous North Smithfield mine, the richest ore-producing diggings in that part of the world. The photograph shows Dr. Talmage in miner's dress, just as he has emerged from the mouth of the shaft. He holds a piece of quartz in his hand worth $2,000. By his side is his son, and on his extreme right is the Rev. W. Chipman. On Dr. Talmage's left hand is Rev. J. G. Marten, the fifth in the group being Mr. James Woodrow, a merchant, and the last on the extreme left Philip Fitzpatrick, part owner and manager of the mine. What Dr. Talmage saw there, and also what he observed in the silver, and copper mines, he will doubtless record hereafter in his own graphic and familiar style.

From Australia our traveler again embarked on a long ocean voyage—his next objective point being Ceylon. At Colombo and Kandy he visited the ancient temples, witnessed the ceremonies of the Buddhists and Hindus, and probably ascended Adam's Peak, just as he had climbed the famous peak overlooking Kil-eau's crater in Hawaii, months before. On reaching India, Calcutta, Madras, the "sacred city" of Benares, Allahabad, Delhi, Lucknow, Agra, and Cawnpore, with their memories of mutiny and massacre, were each visited in turn, and concerning these cities, he will doubtless have much to tell that is of surpassing interest. On Saturday, October 6th, he embarked at Bombay for home.

where he received a most cordial greeting from President Dole, the chief official of the new republic and also from the united churches and the people generally. He had a pleasant chat with the ex-Queen, Liliuokalani. After a brief stay in that beautiful island of fruits and flowers, he proceeded to Samoa and at Apia, the seaport capital, the scene of welcome and entertainment ex-

The TABERNACLE PULPIT

OCTOBER THOUGHTS.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Jeremiah 8: 7, "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed time; and the turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord."

WHEN God would set fast a beautiful thought, he plants it in a tree. When he would put it afloat, he fashions it into a fish. When he would have it glide the air, he moulds it into a bird. My text speaks of four birds of beautiful instinct—the stork, of such strong affection that it is allowed familiarly to come, in Holland and Germany, and build its nest over the doorway; the sweet-dispositioned turtle-dove, mingling in color white, and black, and brown, and ashen, and chestnut; the crane, with voice like the clang of a trumpet; the swallow, swift as a dart shot out of the bow of heaven, falling, mounting, skimming, sailing—four birds started by the prophet twenty-five centuries ago, yet flying on through the ages, with rousing truth under glossy wing and in the clutch of stout claw. I suppose it may have been this very season of the year—autumn—and the prophet out-of-doors, thinking of the impenitence of the people of his day, hears a great cry overhead.

Now, you know it is no easy thing for one with ordinary delicacy of eye-sight to look into the deep blue of noonday heaven; but the prophet looks up, and there are flocks of storks, and turtle-doves, and cranes, and swallows, drawn out in long lines for flight southward. As is their habit, the cranes had arranged themselves in two lines making an angle, a wedge splitting the air with wild velocity; the old crane, with commanding call bidding them onward; while the towns, and the cities, and the continents slid under them. The prophet, almost blinded from looking into the dazzling heavens, stoops down and begins to think how much superior the birds are in sagacity about their safety than men about theirs; and he puts his hand upon the pen, and begins to write: "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord."

If you were in the field to-day, in the clump of trees at the corner of the field, you would see a convention of birds, noisy as the American Congress the last night before adjournment, or as the English Parliament when some unfortunate member proposes more economy in the Queen's household—a convention of birds all talking at once, moving and passing resolutions on the subject of migration; some proposing to go to-morrow, some moving that they go to-day, but all unanimous in the fact that they must go soon, for they have marching orders from the Lord written on the first white sheet of the frost, and in the pictorial of the changing leaves. There is not a belted kingfisher, or a chaffinch, or a fire-crested wren, or a plover, or a red-legged partridge but expects to spend the winter at the South, for the apartments have already been ordered for them in South America, or in Africa; and after thousands of miles of flight, they will stop in the very tree where they spent last January. Farewell, bright plumage! Until spring weather, away! Fly on, great band of heavenly musicians! Strew the continents with music, and whether from Ceylon isle or Carolinian swamps, or Brazilian groves men see your wings, or hear your voice, may they yet bethink themselves of the solemn words of the text: "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord."

I propose so far as God may help me, in this sermon, carrying out the idea of the text, to show that the birds of the air have more sagacity than men. And I begin by particularizing and saying that they mingle music with their work. The most serious undertaking of a bird's life is this annual flight southward. Naturalists tell us that they arrive thin and weary, and plumage ruffled, and yet they go singing all the way: the ground, the lower line of the music, the sky, the upper line of the music, themselves the notes scattered up and down between. I suppose their song gives elasticity to their wing, and helps on with the journey, dwindling a thousand miles into four hundred. Would God that we were as wise as they in mingling Christian song with our every-day work! I believe there is such a thing as taking the pitch of Christian devotion in the morning, and keeping it all the day. I think we might take some of the dullest, heaviest, most disagreeable work of our life, and set it to the tune of "Antioch" or "Mount Pisgah."

It is a good sign when you hear a workman whistle. It is a better sign when you hear him hum a roundelay. It is a still better sign when you hear him sing the words of Isaac Watts or Charles Wesley. A violin chorde and strung, if something accidentally strike it, makes music, and I suppose there is such a thing as having our hearts so attuned by divine grace, that even the rough collisions of life will make a heavenly vibration. I do not believe that the power of Christian song has yet been fully tried. I believe that if you could roll the "Old Hundred" doxology through the street, it would put an end to any panic! I believe that the discords, and the sorrows, and the sins of the world are to be swept out by heaven-born hallelujahs. Some one asked Haydn, the celebrated musician, why he always composed such cheerful music. "Why," he said, "I can't do otherwise. When I think of God, my soul is so full of joy that the notes leap and dance from my pen." I wish we might all exult melodiously before the Lord. With God for our Father, and Christ for our Saviour, and heaven for our home, and angels for future companions, and eternity for a lifetime, we should strike all the notes of joy. Going through the wilderness of this world, let us remember that we are on the way to the summery clime of heaven, and from the migratory populations flying through this autumnal air learn always to keep singing.

Children of the heavenly King,
As ye journey, sweetly sing:

Sing your Saviour's worthy praise,
Glorious in his works and ways.
Ye are travelling home to God,
In the way your fathers trod;
They are happy now, and we Soon their happiness shall see.

The Church of God never will be a triumphant church until it becomes a singing church.

I go further, and remark that the birds of the air are wiser than we, in the fact that in their migration they fly very high. During the summer, when they are in the fields, they often come within reach of the gun; but when they start for the annual flight southward, they take their places mid-heaven, and go straight as a mark. The longest rifle that was ever brought to shoulder cannot reach them. Would to God that we were as wise as the stork and crane in our flight heavenward! We fly so low that we are within easy range of the world, the flesh, and the devil. We go out and we conquer our temptations by the grace of God, and lie down. On the morrow, those temptations rally themselves and attack us, and by the grace of God we defeat them again; but, staying all the time in the old encampment, we have the same old battles to fight over. Why not whip out our temptations, and then forward march, making one raid through the enemy's country, stopping not until we break ranks after the last victory. Do, my brethren, let us have some novelty of combat, at any rate, by changing, by going on, by making advancement, trading off our stale prayers about sins we ought to have quit long ago, going on toward a higher state of Christian character, and routing out sins that we have never thought of yet. The fact is, if the Church of God—if we, as individuals, made rapid advancement in the Christian life, these stereotyped prayers we have been making for ten or fifteen years would be as inappropriate to us as the shoes, and the hats, and the coats we wore ten or fifteen years ago. Oh for a higher flight in the Christian life, the stork and the crane in their migration teaching us the lesson!

Dear Lord, and shall we ever live,
At this poor dying rate—
Our love so faint, so cold to thee,
And thine to us so great?

Again, I remark that the birds of the air are wiser than we, because they know when to start. If you should go out now and shout, "Stop, storks and cranes, don't be in a hurry!" they would say, "No, we cannot stop; last night we heard the roaring in the woods bidding us away, and the shrill flute of the north wind has sounded the retreat. We must go. We must go." So they gather themselves into companies, and turning not aside for storm or mountain top, or shock of musketry, over land and sea, straight as an arrow to the mark they go. And if you come out this morning with a sack of corn and throw it in the fields and try to get them to stop, they are so far up they would hardly see it. They are on their way south. You could not stop them. Oh, that we were as wise about the best time to start for God and heaven! We say, "Wait until it is a little later in the season of mercy. Wait until some of these green leaves of hope are all dried up and have been scattered. Wait until next year." After awhile we start, and it is too late, and we perish in the way when God's wrath is kindled but a little. Oh that we were as wise as the crane and the stork, flying away, flying away from the tempest!

Some of you have felt the pinching frost of sin. You feel it to-day. You are not happy. I look into your faces, and I know you are not happy. There are voices within your soul that will not be silenced, telling you that you are sinners, and that without the pardon of God you are undone forever. What are you going to do, my friends, with the accumulated transgressions of this lifetime! Will you stand still and let the avalanche tumble over you? Oh that you would go away into the warm heart of God's mercy. The Southern grove, redolent with magnolia and cactus, never waited for Northern flocks as God waited for you, saying, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love. Come unto me all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Another frost is bidding you away—the frost of sorrow. Where do you go now? "Oh," you say, "I have moved." Why did you move? You say, "I do want as large a house now as formerly." Why do you not want as large a house now? You say, "My family is not so large." Where have they gone to? Eternity! Your mind goes back through that last sickness and through the almost supernatural effort to keep life, and through those prayers that seemed unavailing, and through that which received no response because they were lifeless, and I hear the bells tolling; I hear the hearts breaking—while I speak hear them break. A heart! Another heart! Alone! alone! alone! This world, when in your girlhood and boyhood was so shine, is cold now, and oh! weary do you fly around this world as though you would like to stay, when the wind and frost and the blackening clouds would you away into the heart of an all-conquering God. Oh, I have noticed again: again what a botch this world makes of when it tries to comfort a soul in trouble. It says, "Don't cry!" How can we be crying when the heart's treasures are scattered, and father is gone, and mother gone, and companions are gone, and child is gone, and everything seems gone. It is no comfort to tell a man not to cry. The world comes up and says, "Oh, I only the body of your loved one that you have put in the ground!" But there is comfort in that. That body is precious. Shall we never put our hand in that hand again, and shall we never see that sweet face again? Away with your heartlessness, world! But come, Jesus! and tell us when the tears fall they fall into God's bottle; that the dear bodies of our loved ones shall rise radiant in the resurrection; that all the breakings down here shall be lifted up there, and "they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall sun light on them nor any heat, for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe all tears from their eyes."

You may have noticed that when the chaffinch or the stork or the crane starts its migration, it calls all those of its kind come too. The tree-tops are full of clucking and whistle and carol and the long roll. The bird does not start off alone. It gathers all of its kind. Oh that you might as wise in this migration to heaven, that you might gather all your families, your friends with you! I would that Hannah might take Samuel by the hand, Abraham might take Isaac, and Hagar might take Ishmael. I ask you if those who sat at your breakfast-table this morning will sit with you in heaven? I ask you what influences you are trying to bring upon them, what example you are setting them. Are you calling them to go with you? Ay, ay, have you started yourself?

Start for heaven and take your children with you. Come thou and all thy household into the ark. Tell your little ones that there are realms of balm and sweetness for those who fly in the right direction. Swifter than eagle's stroke, put out for heaven. Like the crane or the stork, stop not a moment until you find the right place for stopping. Seated to-day in Christian service, will you be seated in the same glorious service when the heavens have passed away with a great noise, and the elements have melted with fervent heat, and the deemed are gathered around the throne of Jesus?

The Saviour calls,
Ye wanderers come,
Oh, ye benighted souls
Why longer roam?
The Spirit calls to-day,
Yield to his power:
Oh, grieve him not away,
'Tis mercy's hour.

CHINA'S POWER BROKEN.

War with Japan, having Destroyed her Ancient Supremacy, may yet be the means of her Spiritual Awakening.

A CITY GATE OF PEKIN.

CHINA, the great Asiatic power of modern times, and one of the oldest nations on the globe, is once more the seat of war, the conflict begun a few weeks ago by Japan in Korea having now extended to the borders of the Chinese Empire. With its vast population of over 300,000,000, its great internal commerce and resources, and its traditional antagonism to modern ideas and modern progress, China has succeeded hitherto in keeping its own territory practically intact and also in retaining its suzerain influence over certain smaller countries contiguous to its boundaries. But the present war with Japan, a much smaller but more progressive nation, has shown the huge, unwieldy Mongol empire to be almost defenceless against modern weapons and systems of warfare. Defeated successively by land and sea, her poorly trained and badly equipped army and navy have been scattered in confusion, and the powerful fleets of Japan are now threatening Peking, the port nearest to the Chinese capital. There is a general expectation that unless the European Powers intervene in the interest of peace, Peking will soon be invested by a Japanese army and the Miado's representatives will be able to dictate terms of peace within the shadow of the Imperial Palace of the Emperor of China.

There are numerous important possibilities in the outcome of the present war. England, France, Russia and Germany are watching the course of events with a view to extending their territorial possessions, should Japan ultimately triumph. It is possible, too, that the Manchukuo dynasty, which has long ruled China, may be expelled and that a new and progressive empire may arise from its ruins.

Since the engagement at Pyeng-Yang and the great naval battle between the fleets off the mouth of the Yalu river, both of which resulted disastrously to the Chinese, no formidable encounter has occurred, though there have been skirmishes at Yalu and elsewhere. The Japanese now actually control the Yellow Sea and also the Gulf of Pe-Chili, which is to Peking what the Bosphorus is to Constantinople. This was foreshadowed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the outbreak of hostilities, the Japanese army and navy, though greatly inferior in numbers, have demonstrated the superiority of European training and methods. Li-Hung-Chang, the greatest of Chinese generals, has been disgraced for incompetency and Admiral Ting, the commander of its navies is now seeking to avoid any further conflict with the powerful warships of Japan. All the energies of China are now bent on fortifying the defences of Peking in expectation of an attack. Amazed at the impotency of his generals and stung to action by the reverses of his armies, the Emperor has energetically undertaken to personally direct the management of the campaign. It is stated that on a recent occasion he paid a visit incognito to Tientsin, the purpose of inspecting its defences and ascertaining the feeling of its people.

Emperor Kuang Hsu, whose portrait, together with that of the Empress, is published in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, succeeded Emperor Tung Chih in the imperial throne nineteen years ago. He is the ninth monarch of the Tsing ("great pure") or Manchukuo dynasty, a line of foreigners who, aided by native rebels, succeeded in overthrowing the powerful Ming dynasty, which held imperial power in China from 1368 to 1644. Kuang Hsu is now in his twenty-fifth year, and his minority reign was far from being a peaceful one. He is said to favor negotiations with Japan with a view to ending the war, but in the present belligerent temper of the Japanese, this may not be accomplished without European intervention. Present probabilities indicate that nothing less than the payment of a large war indemnity, the cession of Formosa, and the acknowledgment of Korean independence will satisfy the victorious nation.

Foreigners in China, and particularly Christian missionaries, have been placed in positions of peculiar peril during the war. Anti-foreign sentiment has been fanned into a flame by the native priesthood and the literati of the country and at many points in the interior, the missionaries and their wives and children have been compelled to leave their stations and seek safety at the seaport towns, where foreign gunboats are stationed. United States Minister Denby at Peking, has advised all foreigners to leave the city in expectation of a Japanese attack. Nearly all the foreign powers have strengthened their fleets in Chinese waters for the purpose of affording protection to their subjects, as the native government confesses its inability to extend the necessary protection. Among the missionary societies, the China Inland Mission, has by far the largest number of workers in the field, having some 611 missionaries in all, with 366 native helpers, 4,234 communicants and 134 organized churches throughout the different provinces of the Empire. During 1893, 61 new workers entered China to labor for this great mission. The American Board, London Missionary Society, English and American, Baptist and Presbyterian Societies, Wesleyan Methodists, Church of Scotland, Scandinavians, Friends, and other denominations are all well represented in the field by bands of earnest workers, their united spheres of operations extending from Mongolia on the north to the borders of Annam and Burmah on the south, and from Yunan death. At Wuhu, Rev. Mr. Argent, another brave Christian, was murdered, a customs official named Green being also a victim of the same infuriated populace who were urged to the crime by the inflammatory proclamations of the literati against foreigners. More recently, two lady missionaries who were assisting a sick native on the roadside, were attacked and one sustained mortal injuries. These are only a few of the long list of consecrated men and women who have won the martyr's crown in China. To recount the indignities that have been heaped upon Christian missionaries, the sacrifices they have made, the dangers they have bravely faced and the fate they have unflinchingly met in the performance of their sacred mission in that land of gross superstition and cruelty, would fill many pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They have literally watered the field ful death of Mrs. Mary Platt, a devoted Christian teacher, among the Indians of Southern California. Mrs. Platt, who for five years has been teacher of the government Indian School at Petchanga, Cal., is believed to have been cruelly murdered. Mr. Wm. H. Weiland, a missionary of Banning, Cal., has forwarded to this journal interesting details of the career of Mrs. Platt. He writes:

"Readers of Indian history will call to mind how the Indians were driven by the white man from the rich lands in the Temecula Valley into the barren, worthless brush-land among the foot-hills. A band of those outcast Indians gradually formed a village called Petchanga, some five miles from Temecula. But their opportunity for making a proper living was gone, their ambition was gone, and Petchanga fell into the hands of the lowest class of whites—the whiskey element of Temecula. Five years ago Mrs. Mary Platt, a widow lady from San Diego, Cal., and about forty years of age, was sent to reopen the government school for Indians at Petchanga. No school had been held there for some time. Shortly before Mrs. Platt's arrival, when on a missionary journey, I came to Petchanga, and was directed to the vacant school room as the only suitable place in which to sleep. There was scarcely an entire pane of glass in the whole building. The locks on the doors were broken, and entire panels were missing out of the doors. "Returning that same way some days later, I found Mrs. Platt at work, teaching, in that wretched school-room. Upon her arrival the Indians told her plainly that they did not care for school, and that she might as well go home again. But nothing could turn Mrs. Platt from her path of duty. The school then started was carried on successfully by her until she fell at her post of duty.

"Being an earnest Christian, she also labored for the spiritual well-being of the Indians, who are nominal members of the Catholic Church, but totally neglected, and in gross ignorance and superstition. Seeing that the Indians suffered greatly from debauchery and prostitution at the hands of unprincipled white men, she set about breaking up the wicked practices then in vogue. Thus she placed herself in direct antagonism to the worst elements amongst whites and Indians. Upon one occasion the chief, the chief of the tribe, knowing of some plot against the teacher, quietly took his place on her front porch and kept guard while she slept. On July 4, 1891, her school house was burned to the ground, not through accident, but undoubtedly at the hands of an incendiary. The following autumn, Mrs. Platt was on hand, as determined as ever.

"During the night of Sept. 20th, 1894, Mrs. Platt was foully murdered at her post of duty, and the school-house burned to the ground to conceal the crime. Careful investigation has failed to reveal the criminal, though the details of the murder point rather to the brain of a fiendish white-man than that of the sluggish Indian. She fell a martyr to the cause of truth and right. Noble and lofty was the purpose of her life, unflinching in her courage, unquestioning her dependence upon Him who has promised: Rev. 2:10, 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.'

to the seaboard. There are now probably 1,500 missionaries of all Protestant denominations in China, inclusive of a number of trained medical workers. The chief obstacles encountered in the preaching of the Gospel have been the native dislike of foreigners, the strenuous opposition of the cultured Chinese, the ancient superstition of the lower classes, Shintoism or ancestor-worship and the almost universally prevalent opium habit. Almost every rising has been preceded by the appearance of inflammatory placards, issued by the literati, attacking the missionaries and declaring that they were in that country for the purpose of injuring the native population. These placards charged that they were scheming to mutilate the people by taking out their eyes, to be used in the preparation of some secret medical nostrum. Our readers will remember the anti-European riots in China two years ago, when the mission stations at Ichang, Chinkiang, Wuhu and Hankow were in the gravest danger, that at Ichang being attacked by a fanatical populace. At Wuchang, two members of the Swedish Mission, Rev. O. F. Wikholm and Rev. A.D. Johansson were martyred by a frenzied mob, which stoned them to with their blood, and by their pure teaching and noble example, new spiritual life has been given to China, and many thousands of her darkened millions have been brought into the light of the Gospel of Jesus. At the present time there is still a large portion of the population who have never heard the Gospel.

One of the most successful and devoted of American missionaries in China was the Rev. John Talmage, eldest brother of the editor of this journal, who labored for many years at Amoy. He compiled several Chinese dictionaries and grammars, which have ever since been invaluable to English and American missionaries there. His two daughters are now doing missionary work in that city, in connection with the Reformed Dutch Church.

What the outcome of the war will be as far as missions are concerned is a problem yet to be solved. The Lord is moving mysteriously with this ancient land of idols, and it would seem that its day of enlightenment is not far distant. With the barriers of seclusion beaten down and the empire opened to intercourse with the world, the opportunities for successful missionary labor will be multiplied a thousand-fold.

JESUS, LORD OF THE SABBATH.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 4. Mark 2:23-28; 3:1-5.
Golden Text Mark 2:28. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

BEFORE man fell God instituted the Sabbath; it is something of Eden continued to fallen and redeemed man. "God rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it, because that in it he rested from all his work which God had created and made." (Gen. 2:23.) In the first instance, "the Sabbath was made for man" (Mark 2:27), but it was, at the same time, a witness for God, a testimony to the perfection of his work and its glorious completeness. In the early days of unfallen man, had not been separated; that which was for God was for man also; his delights were with the sons of men even in the days of creation. And that which was for man was for God also. It was no strain to the creatures whom God had formed in his image, after his likeness, to give up a seventh part of their time for him; it responded to the very need of the creature which was created thus, "for of him and unto him and through him are all things." But an evidence of the fall exists in the breast of every man, in the very fact that, by nature, he regards his interests and God's as being diametrically opposed. Thus it came to pass that when, after the awful judgment of the flood upon the world of the ungodly, men again fell into idolatry and grievous sin, and God chose Abraham and his seed to be witness for him, he must needs make the keeping of the Sabbath to be a law. In the first place it was a gift. "The Lord hath given you the Sabbath." "Moreover also I gave them my Sabbath, to be a sign between me and them that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." But, oh, how humbling it is to find that this very people to whom as a people in covenant with him the Sabbath had been given, just as to unfallen man at the first, must needs be exhorted to keep the Sabbath holy! "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor him, not doing thine own ways nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord." Among the early disciples of our Lord the first day of the week took the place of the Jewish Sabbath, the seventh day. But it was not a day for man's pleasure, for the speaking of his words and the doing of his ways; it was

The Interests of God and Man

"The Lord's Day."

He and no other is Lord also of the Sabbath day. The heathen have no Sabbath, and, in measure as a people professedly Christian depart from God, they cease to honor the Lord's day. Wherever superstition and rationalism abound, there is not only a disregard for the Sabbath day, but the enemy of God and man has so far perverted God's holy institution as to succeed in making the Lord's day that day of all the week in which self and self-interest is most sought after. In Roman Catholic and Rationalistic countries, Sunday is the day of the week on which balls, theatrical amusements, picnics, parties of pleasure, elections, reviews and political meetings are mostly held. Going in direct opposition to the Word of God, they do their own pleasure on his holy day; they do not "call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable," but they call the Sabbath their day, their opportunity, and they dishonor him, doing their own ways, finding their own pleasure, and speaking their own words. They deny to Christ the Lordship of his own day, and even where they abstain from their ordinary work, they think of nothing higher than recreation, after having sometimes attended and sometimes not, one short service of worship to God. All the week long they work for themselves, all the Sunday through they amuse or rest themselves. "All of self and none of Thee!" The truest rest that that man can have is rest from himself, just those very things which God speaks of in connection with the Sabbath: rest from doing our own ways, finding our own pleasures, speaking our own words.

It was one of the sins for which God most reproved his people Israel, that they polluted his Sabbaths, profaned his Sabbaths, hid their eyes from his Sabbaths. He had had his own purposes for his own glory in the institution of the Sabbath. The keeping of one day in every week to be holy unto the Lord would necessarily be known among all the heathen with whom his people should have to do in the way of commerce, etc.; it would be a silent but strong witness to them of the power of Jehovah over the habits and lives of his people; a witness that he was a living reality to them.

Oh, how many there are of God's children who do not know how to keep Sabbath, whose lives are one continued strain, and fret, and worry. In a missionary conference held lately at Arima, Japan, an old missionary said: "It is not the hard work which tires and hurts missionaries; it is the fret and worry which wears them out."

A missionary above all other people, needs to know how to keep Sabbath, how to believe God and trust in him about every detail, and at all times, to enter into rest, and to cease from his own works as God did from his. Moses knew how to endure "as seeing him who is invisible," and with his God he endured the manners of a stiff-necked people forty years in the wilderness, and under the strongest provocations from the people, he remained unprovoked so long as his eye was upon his God; he believed, he entered into rest, he ceased from his own works. When the people murmured, he did not try to do something himself or to say something in the way of reproof to the people; in the true Sabbath life of trusting God made room for God to work.

The Pharisees

in the time of our Lord, were very strict about Sabbath observance, but it was in the letter which killeth, not in the Spirit which giveth life. Like all else in their religion they did this work also to be seen of men, and to obtain glory from men, while the true spirit of the Sabbath was lacking in them. As Jesus was going through the corn-fields one Sabbath day, his disciples began to pluck and eat the ears of corn, the criticising Pharisees were at hand always on their jealous watch to catch Jesus tripping in some way, that they might have cause to accuse him. Thinking they had their long desired opportunity they say to Jesus: "Behold why do they on the Sabbath which is not lawful?" And Jesus who met them as he had met the great enemy, with the Word of God, reminded them how when their revered King David fled from Saul, he had obtained from Abiathar, the high priest, the hallowed shew bread "which is for the priests alone;" and he took occasion to say to them "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath," so that "the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath."

But Jesus never said that man was Lord of the Sabbath; he has never said that travelling, business, buying and selling are lawful on his holy day. The Pharisees and formalists would make the sanctification of the Sabbath day a heavy burden in numberless external restrictions, while the true spirit of abstaining from their own ways, from seeking of their own pleasures, from speaking of their own words, was altogether wanting. Oh, how like this is to human nature which will do what suits its convenience, and then take credit for it as though it were self-renunciation.

It was the Sabbath day, and Jesus entered into the synagogue: "And there was a man there, which had a withered hand." What should Jesus do? Just fresh from the rebuke of the Pharisees, would it be consistent with his character as the Lamb of God led to the slaughter, which openeth not her mouth, if he were just at this moment to heal the man's hand? On the other hand, as Lord of the Sabbath, should he not assert his Lordship and boldly exercise his right? What is right to do in perplexing circumstances as these? Jesus was not perplexed, he walked in the light of his Father's countenance and received continual direction; the springs of his life, day by day, were from above.

"THAT WHICH IS NOT LAWFUL"

their tithe the value of a tenth of some herb worth the fraction of a cent. They were horrified at the thought of a blind man using his staff to grope his way to the synagogue on the Sabbath. It was a burden. He must not snuff a candle on the Sabbath or put fuel on the fire; that would be labor. So with these trivialities the Rabbis had made the Sabbath a burden. Jesus came to set men free of such nonsensical restrictions. He taught that God wanted the love and reverence and worship of the heart and not the mere outward observance of puerile rules and ordinances. The priests and scribes perceived that such teaching would inevitably lead to a conflict on the subject of Sabbath observance and they tried to force an issue on that point. When Jesus walked on the Sabbath the Pharisees were with him, doubtless to watch whether he walked more than the two thousand paces which were the limit of a Sabbath-day's journey and it was probably by their arrangement that the man with the withered hand was in the synagogue. The case was shrewdly selected. Their law allowed medical treatment on the Sabbath when life was in danger, but the man's withered hand did not endanger his life. So if Jesus healed him, as he would be sure to do, he could not shelter himself under that law. But Jesus swept away all their refinements and subtle distinctions as so much rubbish. He showed them that David, whom they revered, disregarded the law when there was a human need, and he was indignant at their inhuman brutality in attempting to make their technicality an obstacle to the healing of the cripple. The Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath, he told them and we are indebted to him for the liberty that signifies. Real religion lies far deeper than external acts. Love to God and love to man in the heart is more in God's sight than a close literal observance of rites.

That which is not lawful. A missionary who has been laboring in Turkey says that Sunday observance in some districts entails a heavy loss. An Armenian convert was employed in a place where Sunday work was a fixed rule. The man pleaded with his employers but they were obdurate. Finally they said in a manner which indicated their idea that they were closing the subject, that the man was unreasonable in expecting them to pay a week's wages for six days' work. The convert took up the idea and offered to surrender one-seventh of his weekly salary rather than do that which he regarded as a sin. The employer accepted his offer and the man kept his place. At first he was stigmatized as a fool but after some months he was pointed out as a hero who held principle above wealth.

The Sabbath was made for man. The editor of a prominent English newspaper took an active interest in the movement for the opening of museums and picture-galleries on Sundays. In speeches at public meetings and in articles in his newspaper he pleaded pathetically the cause of the workingmen who, he said, could not see the treasures of art because they were locked up on the only day that they had at liberty. When the movement was well forward, I prepared a petition to Parliament asking for the Sunday opening and sent it into the composing-room of his own journal to be signed. "Judge of my surprise," he said, "when the foreman came to me and said, 'Do you press for the signing of this petition? For unless you do, the men here rather not sign it!'" I answered, "What is the world do you mean? It is for their benefit we want the museums and picture-galleries open on Sunday!" The foreman assented. He said, "The men understand that, but they think that would not be the end of it. They believe that before long the world shops, offices and all other places would be open as well as the museums. So unless you insist, they will not sign." So the petition was never signed. The men evidently were aware that the desecration of the Lord's Day had ended in other cities in the working seven days for a week's pay.

Whether he would heal him on the Sabbath. A physician was vexed by the numerous calls that were made upon him on Sunday by people who might as well consult him on other days. Business men would go to him and send for him on that day to avoid loss of time on working days, so that Sunday became for him the busiest day of the week. Hoping to correct this, he issued notice that Sunday was his day for consultation, and he would make no charge for service on that day. He thought that his patients would then have too much respect to apply to him for free treatment and that the poor were not likely to seek unless they really needed him. But the plan did not answer. His Sunday work increased, so he decided to reverse the scheme. He issued another notice that his fee on Sunday would be double that of other days. This had the desired effect. So very plain a hint ought not to have been required. Everyone who values Sunday rest should be careful to avoid, as far as possible, doing anything that robs another of that rest.

Lord also of the Sabbath. Christ wishes it to be understood that in sweeping away the ridiculous trivialities which in his time made the Sabbath a vexation and a burden he did not abolish the observance. It was to be the Lord's Day still, but a day of delight not a day of deprivation and gloom. It is a notable fact that the decline of spirituality and godliness which leads to criminality nearly always begins in forgetting that it is the Lord's Day and in using it for personal pleasure or business. In the prison at Auburn, N. Y., a personal record of prisoners was kept for many years and there is record of 1232 convicts which tears on the question. Of these, 447, or more than one third belonged to various occupations which precluded the observance of the Lord's Day. The natural inference is that as they had to work on God's day they had come to forget him; conscience had been hardened and they broke other laws. Only 26 of the entire number of 1232 had been trained to the observance of Sunday. The State prison at Massachusetts has a similar record. Of one hundred men confined there, eighty-nine had lived in habitual violation of the Lord's Day.

The Sabbath was made for man. At regular meeting of the New Haven, Conn. Medical Association, composed of twenty-five physicians among whom were the professors of the Medical College, the subject of Sunday observance was considered in relation to health and longevity. After a comparison of the results of the observation of the physicians it was unanimously agreed that in their opinion "Men who labor only six days in the week will be more healthy and live longer, other things being equal, than those who labor seven days. Also that they are able to do more work and do it in a better manner."

MILES UPON MILES OF RUINS.

Rev. Dr. Schauffler's Vivid Description of the Constantinople Earthquake—The Worst European Calamity in Two Hundred Years.

EVERY passing week brings to light more of the horrors of the great Constantinople earthquakes. News just received from the Orient show that in the despatches and letters already published, half the story of disaster and suffering has not been told. Only now, in communications from American missionaries to their friends in this country, are the real facts coming to light, and these show the calamity to have been far more terrible and appalling than any that Europe has confronted in many years.

Rev. Dr. A. F. Schauffler of the New York City Mission and Tract Society, who lately returned from a tour in the East and who has received letters from missionary friends in Turkey, made a statement to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD concerning the present condition of the earthquake sufferers which should go far toward winning for them the sympathy of the civilized world. "Not in two hundred years," said he, "has there been so much unavoidable poverty in Constantinople as now, and this is through any iniquity on the part of the government. From the Seven Towers to the Adrianople Gate, the devastation was terrific. One hundred and sixty-four mosques and many khans have been irreparably and totally ruined. Thousands of poor people are affected, because their business has been destroyed. Most of the houses are wooden structures and will stand a tremendous wreck, but the force of the earthquake is such that even large numbers of these wooden houses have been rendered uninhabitable and their former occupants are without places to live in.

"In the Great Bazaar, fifteen hundred shops were totally ruined. This Bazaar, which is the chief place of business in the city, is as long as Broadway; its buildings are of stone, and when the shock came, the one simply came down in heaps, killing a great many people, and ruining and burying the contents of the stores. Hardly a shop was spared. The people whose dwellings were destroyed are still living in tents. 'I have been in Constantinople when it was visited by earthquake shocks on former occasions,' continued Dr. Schauffler, 'but this was something totally different from anything experienced there in modern times. On the Bosphorus it seems to have hardly touched anything; one beautiful mosque alone is reported to have slid from top to bottom. I have felt many earthquakes, but never one that took a clean line through the most thickly populated part of the city, as this one did, knocking it into orders. It came up the Sea of Marmora and destroyed nearly everything. At once the Isle of the Newport of fashionable Turkish society—hardly a house escaped being hopelessly damaged.'

Dr. Schauffler considers that the condition of the sufferers is one that appeals to the charity of all Christian people, both in Europe and America, and that they are deserving of the utmost generosity. He has received letters from Rev. Dr. Washburn, president of the Roberts College in Constantinople, and Rev. H. O. Dwight, Secretary of the American Board in that city, which represent the condition of the people as being wretched in the extreme. Dr. Washburn writes that the suffering this winter will unquestionably be very great—greater than at any time known to the present generation, except after the Russo-Turkish war, when tens of thousands of refugees came to Constantinople from all parts of the Turkish dominions. Both Dr. Dwight and Dr. Washburn have been taking an active part in the relief work, and sums of money sent to their care by American donors, have been expended under their own personal supervision.

Many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have already sent their offerings to this journal, to be forwarded to Minister Merrill, and we trust that thousands of others will follow their example, and extend a helping hand to these afflicted ones in this hour of sorest need. All Europe has been stirred, as never before, by the distress in Constantinople; for it is a condition of affairs unparalleled in any European city in modern times. No nation is insured against calamity or misfortune, and the same spirit that inspires us to seek help from above in our hour of trouble, should lead us to welcome the agents of Divine beneficence to others. The price of a loaf of bread, given "In His Name," may thus become an evangel of peace and good-will between Christian and Moslem. It may momentarily relieve some poor Armenian, Greek or Jewish household. To whomsoever it may go, if it take with it the prayer of the giver, it cannot fail to be blessed.

Revivals Led by a Jewess.

Mrs. Baeyertz's Gospel Tour Round the World—Conversions in Three Continents

ONE of the most astonishing religious movements of our day is the success that has attended the meetings held by Mrs. Baeyertz in Australia, New Zealand, Canada and Great Britain. Wherever she has gone the people have crowded to hear her, and the number of persons who have been led by her preaching to seek Christ has surprised and delighted the hearts of pastors and churches. Entering a town unheralded and unknown as she did at San Francisco, Toronto and other places, her quiet, simple talks to women lead to larger meetings; men's meetings are demanded and soon the whole neighborhood is moved and hundreds who go out of curiosity are anxiously inquiring their way to God. During her stay in America, after leaving California, Canada secured the whole of her time with the exception of a brief visit to Boston, Mass., but she has promised on her return to visit the large cities of the Middle and Southern States. In Ireland, England and Scotland the meetings have all been of the same character, and in Glasgow, where she now is, there have been the best results of all. Even ministers, who are opposed to women preaching under any circumstances, are reconsidering their attitude in view of the good Mrs. Baeyertz is evidently doing and are adopting the view of the Right Rev. Bishop of Nelson, New Zealand, who said of Mrs. Baeyertz, "I could not, if I had the power, dissuade her from what cordially receives the Divine blessing."

Mrs. Baeyertz is the daughter of Jewish parents of the most orthodox school, and was reared in the strictest adherence to Jewish creed and practice. She was born in England, where her family occupied a prominent place in the Jewish community. She was just emerging from girlhood to womanhood when her health broke down, and it was decided that she should take a voyage to Australia, where a married sister was then living. There she plunged into social gaiety with all the ardor of a young and impulsive nature. Her associates were for the greater part either Jewish or irreligious people, yet the one man who won her heart belonged to neither class, but was an earnest Christian. Her meeting with him was what is usually called accidental; but to those who believe in God's providence, there is nothing of accident in such matters. There were difficulties on both sides to the marriage, but it finally took place, and Mrs. Baeyertz being solemnly cast off by her family and people, became formally a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Her husband prayed and labored for her conversion, but was not permitted to witness it. She loved him intensely, even passionately, but she cared little or nothing about religion. It was not until the end of six years of happy life, when her husband was suddenly stricken down and died, that her thoughts turned to God. Even then, her chief desire was that in some way she might join her husband when the time came for her to die. With that object, she sought spiritual counsel, and for the first time prayed with real sincerity. Her husband had never been able to induce her to read the New Testament, but now she read it eagerly, anxiously. She wanted to rejoin her husband, not to find Christ; but as she read the Gospel of John, her heart was filled with a new love. She found in Christ the beauty of character in its full glory, which had been but imperfectly reflected in that of her husband. The graces of disposition and conduct which she had so much admired in him, were those he had acquired in the imitation of Christ. She had been living in the light of a candle of the Lord; now she had come into the light of the Sun of Righteousness. She bowed her head in adoration and gave her heart to Christ.

Soon afterwards, during a visit at Geelong the busy seaport of Victoria, Mrs. Baeyertz went to the hospital to see a sick woman and there found many to whom she pointed the way to Christ. The happiness she derived from her visits to the hospital led her to visit the prisons and poor-house and she was welcomed everywhere. Later, on the invitation of Rev. H. B. Macartney she went to Melbourne to aid him in his work among the Jews, but they found that she was an apostate from Judaism and they would not listen to her. She found a sphere of work, however, among the factory girls of the city and a large number of them were converted through her talks. Several invitations came to her from ministers to speak in their churches but these she declined as her womanly modesty caused her to shrink from addressing mixed audiences. One minister, however, induced her to address his Sunday School and there for the first time she faced a crowded assemblage, for the church was full of people who had come to hear the young Jewess. A few weeks later at Ballarat she gave a series of Bible readings in a theatre which were the means of great good. Similar meetings were held at Adelaide and then she went to New Zealand where she labored with wonderful blessing for nine months. Thence she came to America and in San Francisco at a mission she held in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association fifty persons made profession of faith as the result of her work. Invitations from Canada called her there and at Quebec, Ottawa, Toronto, London, Montreal and other cities in the Dominion Mrs. Baeyertz spoke with great effect. At the end of a season's hard, but blessed labor, she sailed for Ireland. She was warmly welcomed at Queenstown, Cork, Belfast and Dublin, and held successful meetings in each city. Cordial invitations reached her from London and there her Bible-readings at the West End were blessed to the conversion of many prominent society ladies. In Scotland her labors have been equally successful and she is still winning souls there. Her methods are not sensational but there is intense earnestness and tenderness in her manner and words which win their way to the heart wherever she speaks. God is marvelously blessing her and making her a blessing.

HEAVENLY GARDENS.

IF our world after the storms of six thousand years have ravaged it and the fires of six thousand years have swept across it and the insects of six thousand years have assailed it and the frosts of six thousand years have nipped it and the droughts of six thousand years have blasted it, has yet this resplendence of blossom, what then, must that world be where neither storm nor frost nor drought nor any hostile force hath invaded? Why, it must be an everlasting land of blooms. Indeed, the Bible says so. The trees there bear twelve manner of fruit and every month of the year, so that while there is perpetual fruit there must also be perpetual blossom. That all colors will be there, and these colors in harmonious arrangement, we have suggested by the wall of heaven. That wall is a rainbow cut into precious stones. The blue of the beryl, the red of the jacinth, the yellow of the jasper, the green of the emerald, the gold of the chrysolite. Heaven is the coronation of all exquisite colors, a great orchard of beauty, an infinite garden of divine floriculture. I do not know but that there may be a material heaven as well as a spiritual heaven. As the orchids that once grew only in lordly estates on the other side of the sea have been transplanted in abundance on our shores, and the chrysanthemums of Japan are now growing in many lands, and the dahlias of Africa now breathe the air of all continents, so it may be that the richest flowers of earth will become the denizens of heaven. I shall not be at all chagrined if, waking up from the last sleep, I found in the better land hyacinths and camellias and violets and pansies. We are distinctly told that the celestial inhabitants wave palms of victory; then they must have palm trees. Christ calls himself the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley; then it would not be inappropriate to have in that land the rose and lily. That God loves beautiful growths in nature I am sure.

It is a matter of congratulation that flowers, whether on the arm of the tree branch or rising from the ground, are becoming more and more popular with our American people. In addition to the private gardens and orchards we have in America to-day nearly thirteen thousand acres devoted to the raising of flowers and over eighteen thousand persons engaged in this industry and $28,201,806 are annually expended in floral purchase. There are 4,650 florists in this country. 40,056,253 rose bushes were sold in the United States in one year, and over 101,000,000 other plants. The nation is giving attention to this important and beautiful industry. I hail all the signs of the coming of that millennial time when "the deserts shall bloom as the rose, and instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree." I rejoice in the window gardening that has long adorned many of the towns and cities of England, and is gradually taking possession of some of the homes of our American cities. Where there is necessarily so much of stone and brick and asphaltum about our city residences, hang from the windows the flowers that shall come down to meet the vines that climb up the walls. Plant flowers wherever and whenever you can plant them. Put them by the pillow of the sick. Strew them on the graves of the dead. Sweet prophecies of the resurrection. And when we can no more open our eyes on the beautiful things of earth may we waken to the paradise of God.

PARKS AND HEALTH.

THIS world is dark enough for most people. Push back the somber curtains wherever you can. Electricity is as much the work of God as is the noon-day sun and was intended for practical use. That subtle fluid was not made merely through the thunder storm to burn barns and kill men, but to make the night as bright as the day. As to the question of economics, that is the most economical for a city which gives the most health and favors the best morals and cheers the most despondency. Scatter the gloom of the park after sunset, and make it not only a playground by day, but a playground by night. So you substantially double the acreage of your park, and instead of the 500 acres you have 1,000 acres, because you make the present acreage by twice that extent. Who can tell the financial and moral value of the 120 acres of Birkenhead Park to Liverpool, of the 207 acres of the Eden Park to Cincinnati, of the 1,000 acres of Golden Gate Park to San Francisco, of the 277 acres of Tower Grove Park to St. Louis, of the 600 acres of Druid Park to Baltimore, of the 2,900 acres of Fairmount Park to Philadelphia, of the 1,752 acres of Phenix Park to Dublin, of the 2,500 acres of the Bois de Boulogne to Paris, or of Hyde Park and Regents' Park and Greenwich Park and Kensington Gardens and Clapham Common to London? May all our American and European cities be crowned with these garlands of loveliness. They will help keep back epidemics. They will make after us a hardier race of men and women. They will exalt all your youth by the presence of God as he walks in these gardens in the cool of the day. They will give our weary populations a longing for heaven, which is a park on a grander scale—a Fontainebleau eternal. City officials who identify themselves with the establishment or improvement of such work will make for themselves an honored name. The public fountain which Lady Burdett Coutts erected in Victoria Park, at a cost of $25,000 will bring every weary man who there slakes his thirst for the next hundred years under obligation. What we do for ourselves is forgotten. What we do for others will keep us in remembrance.

A BEAUTIFUL HABIT.

IT is a beautiful habit in human nature to speak well of the dead, omitting their faults and extolling their virtues. However vehemently and perhaps justly men are denounced for their principles or their behavior while they are in the battle of life, when they become exanimate anathema ceases. See how all the pens, all the types, all the tongues that were full of attack for a great man dead become lenient if not positively appreciative. I think this beautiful. As long as a man is alive he can answer back. But if when his lips are closed for the last silence you assail him the war is unequal. It is ignominious for one to attack the lifeless. It is the dead lion of the table kicked by an ass. Whatever a man's faults, when he has passed off cease your excoriation. Only swine will root up a graveyard. None of us believe in the transmigration of souls or that the spirit of man passes into the brute creation; but if the doctrine were true the last bird that I would want to become is the carrion crow. When a man passes the confines of this life he passes beyond our ken. This world has nothing more to do with him. He is in a realm where only God can deal with him. I think we all admire this habit of speaking well of the departed or speaking nothing at all. Indeed, would it not be a good thing to build an annex to that habit and speak well of the living or speak nothing at all.

"But," some one asks, "ought we not expose wrong-doers?" That, no doubt, ought to be done; but let some one else do it. Carcasses ought to be removed from the fields, but let the summer flies and the buzzards attend to that post mortem industry. There are enough people in every land who will attend to that part of social life. Indeed, the doctrine of transmigration of souls which I just now wrote lightly of is not so much of an absurdity after all. There are people who display such obnoxious and devouring spirit while living that their souls might appropriately after death go into wasps and jackals and blood suckers and crocodiles of immense swallow, while other people, from their dispositions here, would more appropriately after death put on the plumage of the morning lark or become the gazelle or the roe on the mountains of Bether.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Mrs. S. V. Austin, Norwood, Wright Co., Mo., asks some readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to send her old primers and first, second and third readers for the poor children in her section and also second-hand clothing.

J. M. Bullis, Pittsburg, Pa. Is it harmful to drink water or milk with meals where meats and other solids are eaten?

In moderate quantities, it assists assimilation; in inordinate quantities it weakens the gastric juice and retards digestion.

A. M. W., Springfield, Mo. Is it right for a Christian to play at drawings, or take chances on stock or other articles that are brought before the public for disposal?

If by drawings you mean lottery, then we say unhesitatingly that lottery is gambling and gambling is a sin. All games of chance, whether conducted by grab-bag, revolving wheel or dice, are to be classed in the same category.

Orto Jeffrey, Hinsdale, N. Y. I am making an effort to get some boxes of clothing gathered for the sufferers in the far west, Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, etc., where crops have been an utter failure. Can you name some headquarters or some person to whom such goods might be sent for distribution?

Send your contributions to Elder Wm. Hackett Litchfield, Neb., who is in the relief work there and will see that they are faithfully distributed.

R. P. G., St. Louis, Mo., and others. Please inform me through the MAIL-BAG if I can still procure a Teachers' Bible (Premium offer No. 2 in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Dec. 6, 1891), and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, by sending three dollars?

Yes; we are again offering these beautiful International Teachers' Bibles at premium with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Two dollars secures a ruby type International Teachers' Bible or $3 one in emerald type, together with the paper for one year.

Old Subscriber. If a man has broken all the commandments but believes in the Bible and is sorry for his sins, can he be saved?

He can be saved, because there is no limit to God's mercy. But believing in the Bible and being sorry is not sufficient to secure his salvation. He must go in prayer to God, beseeching him for Christ's sake to pardon him, implicitly believing in Christ as his all-sufficient Saviour. No man, whatever his sin, who thus in full sincerity trusts to Christ, will be sent away unforgiven. Then, he must live as a pardoned man ought to live. He must entreat God to renew his heart, to give him the Holy Spirit that he may hate sin and resolutely turn from it. If he is sincere throughout, he will be so thankful for God's pardon, that he will fear to offend him again and will desire holiness as the highest attainable good.

Reader, Froelich, Ia. 1. What are the different modes of capital punishment in the following countries: England, France, Turkey, China and Japan? 2. Why was the Declaration of Independence of Hawaii read in Washington on the 4th of July? 3. Who chooses the postmasters of the State?

1. In the first named country, hanging; in the others, decapitation in various forms, by guillotine, axe or sword. 2. As a timely official recognition by our government of the birth of a new Republic, whose relations to our own were peculiarly cordial, which had sought to be annexed to us and which had framed its administrative machinery after our own model. 3. The President has the absolute appointment without confirmation by Congress of all below certain salary; he also appoints those of the higher grades, subject to the confirmation of the Senate.

P. C. C. writes, replying to "Student," "The Mail-Bag" of Oct. 3.

There could have been no pre-Adamic race, shortly before the creation of man, the "early" without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep" (Gen. 1-2). I take it that what meant is Gen. 6:2: "That the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose," is that men who feared God, married or took wives from among women who did not serve God, because they were attractive, and as a consequence, doubtless the children grew up corrupt and wicked.

If "E. K. B., Kansas," whose letter was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Sept. 1 will send his address in full to Mrs. N. R. Smith Arnonia, Kan., she will send him something read on the "coming of our King."

J. W. Rensen, Norwalk, Ct. There are many references to song in the Scriptures. Would you kindly indicate in the MAIL-BAG the most notable passages in which songs of deliverance, triumph, thanksgiving, sorrow or praise are mentioned.

The famous songs of the Old Testament, besides the Psalms and certain metrical passages in Job, are: Lamech's Song, Gen. 4:24; Noah's Song, Gen. 9:25-27; Moses' a Miriam's Song, Ex. 15:1-19, 21; War Song, etc., Num. 21:14, 15, 17, 18, 27-30; Moses' Prophetic Song, Deut. 32:1-43; Song Deborah and Barak, Judg. 5:2-21; Samson Riddle Song, Judg. 15:16; Hannah's Magnificat, I Sam. 2:1-10; David's Song of the Book II. Sam. 1:19-27; David's Song over Abner, Sam. 3:33, 34; David's Thanksgiving, Chron. 16:8-36; Hezekiah's Song, Isa. 38:120; Jonah's Prayer Song, Jonah 2:2-9; Habakkuk's Prayer Song, Hab. 3:2-19; and the original songs in the New Testament: Luke 46-55; Luke 1:68-80; Luke 2:14; Luke 29-33.

Mrs. M. Wright, South Nest, Westmoreland Co., I. Seeing Mrs. M. C. F. A.'s letter in reference Mrs. Jamal's school for native girls in Jerusalem I was glad that someone had taken an interest in it. I don't feel able to give $12 a year but I give $6, or 50c. per month. Cannot we form company and raise the necessary amount? Those who can't give $1 per month give 50c. a if not 50c. give 25c. Let each send in name a amount they can give and when the amount raised, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can make known through THE MAIL-BAG. The money can be contributed in two payments each year. I think that this would suit the givers better than one payment. You can enter my name for 5 per month.

Our correspondent's plan is a most practical one and opens a way whereby a club or band of Christian people, acting together, could, at mere nominal expense, support a very useful evangelistic and educational work among the poor, untaught Syrian girls of Jerusalem.

J. K., Lanark, Ill. 1. Are persons who are converted at the mourners' bench more pious and aggressive than persons converted in other places? Did Dr. Talmage adopt the method of Trine immersion when he baptized the candidate in Jordan? 2. Is Trine immersion recognized by the church universal as the proper mode of baptism?

1. There are no statistics to show and we not see how there could be. We should, that the place and manner of a conversion have less to do with a man's subsequent conduct and service than his natural disposition and his willingness or unwillingness to sub himself to the influences of the Holy Spirit. No. 3. No; in the large majority of church baptism by sprinkling is the recognized mode. In some of these churches, however, if a candidate desires to be baptized by immersion, a minister is at liberty to use that mode. I Talmage had a baptism in his Tabernacle and baptized by immersion when the candidate wished to be so baptized.

A VILLAGE IN TIBET.

It is a singular fact that the two travelers who of late years have succeeded in penetrating Tibet should be women. No country in the world is so hermetically sealed to the exploration of Western people as this strange land. The prejudices of the Tibetan government, encouraged by China, have rendered any attempt to explore the country an enterprise of great risk, almost certain to end in death. On Nov. 8, 1893, the story was told in this journal of the effort of Miss R. Taylor, an English missionary to carry the Gospel into Tibet. She passed through the southern part of the country in Darjeeling in Northern India to Ta-tien Fu in China. But she was in constant peril of death from the treachery of people who tried to poison her, and of the brigands who attacked her party on the mountain passes. On her return, she collected a party of missionaries to go to Tibet, but on attempting to conduct them into the country she was stopped. She is now on the frontier unable to proceed farther. She is striving to win to Christ such Tibetan travelers who cross the frontier into India for trading purposes, and by making friends with them to prepare the way for missionary labor when the prohibition is removed. Less perils and altogether more pleasant has been the experience of another lady who has recently returned into Tibet. This traveler is Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, whose book describing her journey has just been published by the Fleming H. Revell Company of New York. Her route was prudently confined to the district of Tibet contiguous to British India, which is known as Lesser Tibet. To enter the country she had to climb mountains covered with snow, and go through passes 11,500 feet above the sea. In this region she found the people more friendly to travelers, as they have commercial relations with the people of India. They invited her into their houses and showed her their manner of life. She found them living in dense heathenism with strange superstitions. Ostensibly they are Buddhists, but their faith is a corrupted type of Buddhism, even of that they have little knowledge. At Leh, the capital of Lesser Tibet, Mrs. Bishop found two Moravian missionaries who had been living there twenty-five years, laboring patiently, but unsuccessfully to Christianize the people. At Khyang, more Moravian missionaries were met, some of whom had been there forty years without visiting his native land. He had made a few converts, but they were ostracized and persecuted by their fellow-countrymen. Both places are outside the vast region of Chinese Tibet, or Tibet proper, which is closed against the missionaries. There, hundreds of men and women are dying every day in ignorance of God and the way of Salvation. (Prov. 29: 18.)

A Perennial Orange-Tree.

An orange-tree which possesses the rare merit of bearing all the year round is described by "The Daily Times," of Tampa, Fla. It states that the tree is now to be seen in Tampa and that it is still bearing fruit. Last August the attention of a well-known authority on orange culture was called to it and after an examination, he pronounced it a variety of a tree which grows wild in the Apopka hammock and is not bitter like the common wild orange of the hammocks. The tree, he says, is without a doubt a cross—the sour orange with the sweet—and it has the power of holding the fruit on the tree for months after it is fully ripe. The original tree now has both green and ripe oranges, and they are picked ripe, juicy, and delicious any day in the year. The fruit is more even in size and thinner skinned than the old one, with less rag and but very few seeds. On the same tree, at the same time, are bloom and green and ripe fruit. As "The Times" says, a tree that bears fruit all the year round should be in every garden in Florida. Doubtless, it will be, if such a tree is really in existence. People generally will be a little sceptical on that point, as with less reason too many are as to the existence of that tree which the seer of Patmos saw growing in the New Jerusalem which yielded its fruit every month and its leaves were for the healing of the nations. (Rev. 22: 2.)

Reconciliation in Prison.

Brooklyn newspapers tell the story of a strange scene which was witnessed in the city prison a few days ago. During the evening a woman was arrested for being intoxicated and riotous in the streets. She was placed in a cell to await her appearance before the police-justice in the morning. About an hour later a man was brought in on a similar charge and placed the association of evil with evil. Its opportunity came when the pure and holy Son of God joined himself to human nature. (Phil. 2: 7.)

Within a Minute of Death.

A narrow escape from death is reported from the Indian Territory. A man named Silas Lewis, one of the Wilburton prisoners, had been condemned to death. October 6th was set as the day of execution. Accordingly at noon on that day he was brought out of the prison at Tushka Homma to be shot. All arrangements were perfected. The prisoner, heavily manacled, with arms folded, had taken his seat on the death-box, and the guards stood ready, with rifles placed to their shoulders, to send the missiles of death into the prisoner's breast, when a courier rode up, his horse foaming, and at a distance of a hundred yards hailed the Captain of the guard and ordered him to stop proceedings. He conveyed an order from Judge Holson respiting Lewis for thirty days, according to instructions of the Interior Department. Had the rider been one minute later, his order would have been useless. The condition of his horse showed how anxious he had been to arrive on time. Perhaps some who saw him riding in such haste may have wondered at his hurrying so much. So people often wonder at the urgency of ministers in their preaching; but they, like the messenger, know that theirs is an errand of life or ing the hill of Hissarlik which antiquaries believe to be the site of ancient Troy. Their principal task has been the laying bare of the entire fortified wall in the sixth layer of the ruins, and the removal of debris from the buildings discovered in the enceinte of the fortification. This object has been accomplished. In the portions brought to light the city walls are found to be in a remarkable state of preservation. Besides numerous doors, towers, and buildings in the inner citadel, a large number of store-rooms have been excavated in the sixth layer, and countless articles of pottery, have been found, while many graves belonging to the ancient Greek period have been laid bare. It is remarkable that these discoveries have been made at so late a day. They must be very gratifying to those ardent admirers of Homer's inimitable epic, who have been pained by the disposition of modern critics to treat the whole story as a myth. The fact may encourage Christians who are trembling for the safety of the Bible. Critical arguments, conclusive as they may appear are sometimes disproved by incontrovertible facts which have been hidden for centuries. (Habakkuk 2: 11.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Bible Depository at Shanghai, China, issued during the months of July and August the unusually large number of 133,525 volumes.

The Bishop of Lahore Reports that, of Eighteen native clergymen in his diocese, eight are converts of Mohammedanism.

Christians in India are Deploing the Death of Mrs. Sathianadhan, who has been eminent as a Christian writer and author. Many of her works have been translated into German, Danish, Tamil, and Telugu. She was the daughter of the Rev. Hari Prunt Khisty, one of the first Brahmin converts of the American Missionary Society.

The Board of Home Missions of the United Presbyterian Church reports that the heavy deficiencies of the past few years have reduced the reserve funds very low, so that money due to the missionaries on July 1, could not be paid in many cases until September.

The Lord Mayor of Belfast, Ireland, speaking recently at the funeral of Rev. James Martin, a venerable minister of that city, said he owed everything in life to his dead friend, who took an interest in him when he came into the city a friendless lad and saved him from moral shipwreck.

The Neglected Women of India have now the prospect of skilled medical treatment. There are sixty-five hospitals and dispensaries now affiliated to the Countess of Dufferin's fund for supplying medical aid to them, ten of these having been built and kept up by native princes. Last year 13,058 patients were received, besides 661,574 out-patients being relieved. Over 200 female students of medicine were enrolled last year.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has been relieved by the receipt of a cable message from Seoul, signed by Dr. O. R. Anson, who is in charge of the medical work of that station, announcing that the mission has again assumed control of the Royal Korean Hospital. The Board thinks that the dispatch indicates that affairs have quieted down at least in Seoul, and that the missionaries are no longer in danger.

A Resolution has been Passed by the Teachers' Association of Grace Lutheran Church, New York, and by the teachers and officials of the East Eighth Street Mission expressing "sincere appreciation and heartfelt thanks to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the entertainment of so many poor children at its Children's Home at Nyack, during the summer."

The Shelter for Persecuted Hebrew Converts at Avenue D, New York, which was mentioned in this journal on September 10th, in our article on Mr. Warszawiak's work among the Jews in New York, is closed. It was continued for three years, but when Mr. and Mrs. Cruikshank, who managed it, went to Jerusalem last June to labor among the Jews there, the home was given up.

Dr. George D. Dowkontt has Received an offer of a property suitable for the proposed medical Missionary College, in a charming situation, with twenty acres of land. The original cost of building and land was nearly $200,000 but it is offered for the college at $150,000 with the privilege of one-half or more of the purchase money remaining on mortgage. Dr. Dowkontt did not consider the offer as his fund toward the purchase of a site amounted to little more than $5,000. Put a friend of the movement has now offered a contribution of $25,000 if Dr. Dowkontt can raise the other $45,000 necessary to secure the property.

The American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions at its annual meeting at Madison, Wis., determined not to withdraw any of its missionaries from the field. That plan had been suggested by some members who were alarmed at the deficit of $16,000 which the financial report showed. It was also decided not to sell the securities of the Otis fund which are worth $80,000. The Board is perfectly solvent as the value of its securities and real estate is far in excess of its debt. Committees were appointed to serve in Chicago, Boston and New York to endeavor to increase the contributions of churches and individuals and it is hoped that sufficient money will be raised during the coming year not only to defray the current expenses but to reduce the debt. In some States one-half of the Congregational Churches contribute nothing to the Board.

in an adjoining cell. Both prisoners were excited and noisy, and their alternate hilarity and depression were voiced in loud tones all night. Toward morning, as they became sober, they quieted down, but the woman, realizing the disgrace of her position, begged to be released. Some tones of her voice seemed familiar to the man in the adjoining cell, and he called out to her an inquiry of who she was. He did not know the name when she gave it to him, but her first name gave him the clue to her identity. He was convinced that he had known her in her girlhood, and her answer to his next question proved that he was right. They had been engaged to be married, but more than twenty years ago they had quarrelled, and had not met again. Now, although separated by the wall of the cells, they became reconciled and agreed to be married when they should be released. The police-justice was informed the next morning of what had occurred and when they were arraigned before him, he forgave them and the two prisoners went away together to have the ceremony performed. To ordinary minds it would have seemed that the circumstances under which they met would have excited on both sides a repugnance to marriage; but on the contrary they seem to have removed the objection that existed before. Common vices, like common misfortunes, often draw people near to each other. But there is little hope of moral good in such unions. Probability lies in still lower degradation. The world would have had no chance of redemption from death and with them it is eternal life that is hanging in the balance. (II. Cor. 5: 20.)

A Millionaire's Monument.

A monument to cost half a million dollars is to be erected in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia. The will of a well-known business man who died recently while on a visit to Europe was presented for probate last week in Philadelphia. It provides that the entire estate of the testator valued at over a million dollars shall be put in trust for the benefit of his widow. At her death several legacies are to be paid from the principal and the remainder, which will be half a million, shall be expended in the erection of a monument to the testator. It is to include a bronze statue of himself and there are to be smaller statues of certain officers who served with him in Pennsylvania regiments in the war. Elaborate instructions are left as to the character, material, and size of the monument which is to be executed by the best sculptors and erected in Fairmount Park. The man must have set a high value on posthumous fame to devote so much money to securing it for himself. As a rule, it is not acquired by such means. The surest way to escape oblivion is that recommended by the Psalmist who says, "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance." (Ps. 112: 6.)

Helpful Discourses for the People.

The Inward Guidance and the Outward Going.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Pastor A. J. Gordon, D.D. Text: John 16: 13. "Howbeit when he the Spirit of truth is come, he shall guide you into all truth."

HE guidance here promised is evidently a very comprehensive one—a guidance "into all truth." Not only present truth and prophetic truth, but also practical truth, since all things which the spirit receives from the Father he is to make known unto us. From two cognate passages let us consider the inward and the outward direction of the Spirit.

I. The Inward Guidance. "He shall guide you into all truth." (John 16: 13). It is a beautiful saying from one of our poets, who, speaking of our birth, says: "Every soul leaves port under sealed orders: We cannot know whither we are going or what we are to do till the time comes for breaking the seal." But I can tell you something more beautiful than this. Every regenerated soul sets out on its voyage with an invisible Captain on board, who knows the nature of our sealed orders from the outset, and who will shape our entire voyage accordingly, if we will only let him. Only here comes the difficulty. We insist on taking command ourselves and directing our course according to our own wisdom. Hence the coast is lined with memorials of such as have "erred from the truth and made shipwreck of the faith."

Guiding or Guided?

—Here is the question. Whether we shall make our own plans and choose our own way and then ask the Holy Spirit to prosper us therein or whether we shall yield ourselves entirely to the Spirit to shape and guide our life according to the divine pattern. Yet God does not force us into his way; or constrain us into his truth by violent compulsion. What is the one indispensable condition of safely navigating a ship? It is that the needle of the compass shall be perfectly free to yield to the magnetic current. If the iron of the vessel should perchance present such attraction as to sway the needle somewhat from its true surrender to the pole, immediate danger would thereby accrue—danger of missing the channel and of running upon rocks.

It is exactly so with the Christian; only as his will is entirely surrendered to God's will can he be sure of realizing the true plan and purpose of his life.

"If any man is willing to do his will," says Jesus, "he shall know of the doctrine." Here you see is a shading of the meaning that is very instructive. Our common version says, "If any man will do his will." But that is a very great requirement. "How can I be sure," says one, "that I am doing God's will?" Yea more, how can I be sure that I even understand that will, to say nothing of doing it? "Nay, my child," says the gracious and tender Saviour, "I do not ask as much as that." The needle is not asked to steer the ship, but only to lie passive to the influence of the pole. And you are not asked to execute God's will but only to yield to it—not "if any man will to do his will," but "if any man is willing to do his will."

A Common Mistake.

Alas! that we have made the mistake of thinking not only that we must do God's will but that we must change God's will! We have arranged our plans and laid out our work and when all has been ready we have gone to work to induce God to give success to our undertaking. Well may the apostle ask the astonished question: "Do I now persuade men or God?" Is it the divine will that needs to be brought around, or the human? Does the weather vane change the wind, or does the wind change the weather vane? Nay, there is no time in our history, there is no crisis in our experience when God's will needs to be altered by a hair's breadth. Prayer is not designed to bend God to us, but to bend us to God. God's will is eternally and unchangeably right. Nay more; in all our work and service for him he has willed the true and best way before we have undertaken that service. "Fall in with God's plan concerning you." This is the right advice. Keep in such communion with him that you shall constantly be whether you know it or not. Yet how easily we deceive ourselves at this point. I yield myself to God's will as I yield to my horse and let him draw me over the road I am traveling. But I hold the reins all the while in my hands, to guide him whither I choose. Ah! that is what we do constantly—put bits in the mouth of God's will, hold the bridle in our hands, and let God have his way with us through our having our own way.

A self-willed willingness! "Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest," saith Peter. But when the Lord turned into the narrow way that led to the cross, Peter gave a jerk at the bridle, saying, "Far be it from thee, Lord, this shall not be unto thee," and thus it came out that Peter, instead of following the Lord, was presuming to drive his Lord. What wonder that Jesus burst out in passionate rebuke, "Get thee behind me, Satan!" The Lord will not take his orders from us. He who is Master of Assemblies won that distinction by being himself the servant. I see him now, a "Lamb in the midst of the throne," and I read, "The Lamb in the midst of the throne shall lead them," and I remember he is the same of whom it is written. He was led as a lamb to the slaughter." Submit, my brother, if you would be sovereign. Yield your will if you would have your will. The conflict, the discord, the strife of the world can never be healed till all bow to the One, and every "I will" falls on its knees and yields up its sceptre to "Thy will be done." Put the emphasis moreover on the word do. If any man is willing to do his will. It is one thing to be willing to do; it is another thing to be Willing to Will.

Many a Christian is willing to will God's will who has balked and turned back when it came to the doing of God's work. Let our willing and our working be yoked together, and let neither hold back when the one pulls. Hear how our Lord conjoins these two: "No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." What a graphic picture of divided service! Working for Christ, yet wishing for the world; the hand stretched forth in toil, but the heart all the while tugging at those hands to make them let go at the very first convenient opportunity. Working God's will, but not willing God's will. Concerning such, our Saviour's deliberate verdict is: "Not fit for the kingdom of God." So vital does the Saviour deem the inner consecration that he does not want unwilling servants in his kingdom. If one has the arms of a Samson for strength, and yet has the eyes of Lot's wife for looking back, he is rejected from the service of Jesus Christ.

Therefore I lay redoubled emphasis on consecration. I want hearts yielded to God, then will there be hands stretched forth to God. The heart is the man himself. If that heart be consecrated, it has eyes that will see the way of duty, even when no man has observed it. The second birth gives a second sight; the Spirit's indwelling gives a spiritual outlook that is rational and according to the acceptable will of God. I am so constantly impressed with this, that I am tempted to give up urging Christians to do this duty and that; to give here and give there. The ordering of the Christian life seems so much more direct and certain through the heart than through the hands. The Christian who is spiritual will be practical, and practical, too, according to God's plan and pattern, so he will not labor as one that beateth the air. So I urge upon you, not so much sanctification as the Spirit; not it, but Him; not the seeking of divine guidance, but the acceptance of the divine Guide. I press it pointedly to your hearts. "Have you received the Holy Ghost since you believed?" Oh! take aboard this invisible Pilot; give the rudder of your will into his hands. Let him open the sealed orders of Providence, by which you are to sail. Holy Spirit within us, hast thou been, as it were, asleep in the ship because of our drowsiness of unbelief? Awake, and take command; we resign to thee the captaincy of our lives, and gladly yield to thee. Guide us whithersoever thou wilt, for thou always guidest according to the will of God.

The Outward Going.

II. The outward going: "For as many as are led by the Spirit, they are the sons of God." (Rom. 8: 14.) The word sons should be specially noted. It marks the character of maturity and attainment in the Christian life. There are two words translated "sons" in the New Testament, the one meaning children, and the other sons. "As many as received him," says John, "to them gave he power to become the children of God." That is, simple faith in Jesus brings us in the family of God; and being begotten of God, we are the children of God. But, says the Apostle Paul, using the same word, "a child differeth nothing from a servant, but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father." The child belongs to the family and has a seat at the table with the parents, and that is a high honor, for he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than the man of this world. But, alas, how many Christians remain all their lives in the condition of sanctified babyhood, talking evermore in the dialect of infancy. Just as little children prattle about their birthday, and are always telling how old they are, you find many Christians who rarely open their mouth without dating back to their conversion, as though that were the end and all of their Christian lives—to be converted and saved, instead of going on unto perfection.

Signs of Maturity.

"But," says the apostle, "you are not simply children, but full-grown sons; and because you are sons, God hath sent forth his Spirit into your hearts crying, Abba Father." Little children have to be looked after by their nurses, lest they go astray. They have often to be forced to make them walk in the right way; yea, sometimes they are so stubborn and refractory that they have to be carried against their will, they meantime kicking and resisting at every step. Not so with the full-grown, obedient son. He moves according to an intelligent inward prompting in the way that he shall go. It is this idea which the apostle here brings out, "as many as are led by the Spirit, they are the sons of God." They do not need petty regulations and constant family discipline to make them obedient. They have the Spirit of God within them which gently and constantly inclines them to walk obediently. "I will guide thee with mine eye," says the Lord. Be ye not as the horse or the mule, which have no understanding, whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come nigh unto thee. The Lord's eye is to which his eye should turn as the needle. Shame on us that so many of us have to be jerked with the bit of adversity and jostled with the bridle of chastisement to make us go in God's way. Even wayward Peter rises up to condemn us at this point, for we read that when the Lord turned and looked on Peter, he went out and wept bitterly. Blessed be Simon Bar-Jonah, that, though he was a denier and a blasphemer for a moment, he was not like us, a horse or a mule all his life-time.

My brethren have you this mark of divine sonship, that you are daily led of the Spirit, so that your outward going is evermore the result of an inward guidance? Let me apply two or three practical tests. It is a most solemn and urgent duty of Christians to bear witness for Christ among the unsaved. But the Spirit must convict before you can convert. The impressions the Holy Ghost are double—upon preachers and upon hearers. The Spirit laid one hand on the eunuch as he sat reading Isaiah his chariot; and he laid another upon the Evangelist Philip and said, "Go near a join thyself to this chariot." The Spirit called Paul to go unto Macedonia, and Philippi the chief city thereof, he opened the heart of Lydia to attend unto the word which he spoke. This is the divine method—to bring the preacher and the preparer together. How much time it saves us? How much waste of effort it saves us? It can only be directed to our spiritual door and close in with him at once. Here many as are led by the Spirit they are sons of God.

They Get their Orders Daily

from Heaven; they work under the great superintendent of the church, who knows how to fit all the parts of his divine enterprise into each other. It is a high attainment—the very highest. And yet I have known Christians who have had just distinct orders from Heaven concerning their work as though an audible voice had come to them from the skies. "Go to Lancaster," was the inward voice which came to an intimate friend of mine as he awoke at night. So importunate was the call, so irresistible was the impression, that he rose very early in the morning and took the first train for that city. There he met in the street an old acquaintance under the terrible power of the devil, and bent on killing a man with whom he was angry. But a friend led this man to Christ after a severe struggle with the adversary, and saw him bow in prayer and confess the Saviour before the day closed. It was a marked and unusual interposition of the Holy Ghost, but it ought to be a constant one in the experience of Christians. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," says Jesus, speaking of the Holy Ghost. Yes, but the wind ways blows toward a vacuum. Let your heart be

Empty of Self-Confidence, and of self-will, and the Spirit can come in and bear you whither God would have you to go. My hearers, if the Lord's business is made your principal business, I assure you that you will repeatedly have divine guidance in your Christian life. It may be direct or indirect; it may be sensible or sensible, but you will have it. Christ does not call us to be his servants and then utterly neglect to give us any orders as to work. Ah! the trouble is that we have looked to him for our directions. Like wayward children we have chosen to work our own plans instead of asking him to show us his plans. Let us resolve to take the position of sons, who are also servants. Many gentlemen Christians are there in church and too few servant Christians. I make polite calls on God in the morning and pay him our compliments and then tire. We do not take our orders from him. "Lord what wilt thou have me do?" ring the visitors' bell at the door of Heaven but not the servants' bell. We make a little call on the Lord in the morning, let our card in the shape of a few set phrases of worship and adoration, glad when formality is over, then we hasten about our business, but from him. Let us be ashamed that this has been so true in our case. Let us be able say morning by morning: "Behold, as the eyes of servants are unto the hand of their masters; and as the eyes of a maiden are unto the hands of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the God our God." A servant attitude is the best prayer for the Spirit's guidance. If only with weak knees and tired hands we pray: "Lead me, O God!" we shall be little likely to be hindered in guidance in going there is the utmost certainty; of guidance in staying there neither need nor likelihood.

So essential is the inward impulse to outward service that God actually accepts the will for the deed. Hear his words, first there be a willing mind it is according to what a man hath, and not according to that which he hath not. God delights in spiritual spontaneity! I have pushed out from the open hand the impulse of the Holy Ghost is more to him than the dollar wrung from the reluctant grip by the dunning of the beggars. I am so much impressed with the importance which God attaches to the voluntariness that I am often tempted to olve never to beg a cent for God again, but rather to spend my energy in getting Christians spiritualized, assured that they will certainly become liberalized.

Only the Spirit shows the greatness of the salvation which we have received through Christ: and the greatness of our consequent obligation. As says the Psalmist: "When the Lord turned again our captivity, we were like them that dream. Then as our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing. Then said we, 'The Lord hath done great things for us whereof we are glad.' Oh brethren, if we know how great things the Lord hath done for us, what should we not be ready to do for him and this we can only know by the illumination of the Spirit.

We have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. This knowledge is power; that knowledge begets loving and fruitful actions.

"Oh, Holy Ghost, arise within us; give the heavenly impulse by which to work out our earthly calling!" this is my prayer to you, O, believers. For you that are not under my exhortation is, "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ for the remission of sins and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."

PREMIUM ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has succeeded in arranging for a remarkable series of premiums. First of all, of course, is the International Teacher's Bible, with all the Helps and Maps, set in type, Divinity circuit binding overlapping at the ends, with red under gold edges. This eminently serviceable and very pretty Bible is again offered, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at $2. When ordering please mention Premium Offer: B-Five.

Next in order comes that most beautiful Bible known as the International Emergent Teacher's Bible, London Clear Type Edition, leather bound and leather lined, with silk book mark and silk head bands silk sewed. There were times when a Bible like this would cost $8. To-day it can not be bought everywhere even at $5; but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers it, together with a year's subscription, at $3. This book will last a lifetime. When ordering, mention Premium Offer: B-Three.

We also continue to offer Dr. Talmage's most marvelous book "From Manger to Throne," which has proved of infinite value, to tens of thousands of people, presenting a new view of the life of our Saviour, magnificently illustrated, with many pictures based on photos brought from Palestine by Dr. Talmage, while journeying in the Holy Land with a view to gathering material for this, his latest and greatest work. As last year, so this year, we offer "From Manger to Throne" with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. Mention Premium Offer: B-Four.

Next to a Teachers' Bible, the "Gospel Hymns" sung by Moody and Sankey in the great evangelistic services throughout Africa and England, are dearest to many a Christian's heart. Never before has it been possible to secure these 739 Hymns, constituting the books usually known as Gospel Hymns 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 all in one volume, but the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, after a conference with the publishers of Gospel Hymns, has succeeded in obtaining a large edition of these marvellously soul-stirring hymns in combined form, without a duplicate and without an omission, printed from large type and set to music, and beautifully bound in maroon cloth, with red edges and gilt. A handsome hymnal has never been put on the market, and these "Six volumes of Sacred Song, complete in One," are offered to our subscribers with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. If, when you get the volume, you are not entirely pleased, send it back, and we will refund you money. Messrs. Moody and Sankey in recommending the volume say:

"Hymns in this book have been greatly blessed to many in our meetings as well as outside of the church. May they in this combined form continue to be the blessing of Him to whose honor and glory they have been sung in this and other lands.

This very desirable Premium contains 700 pages, each page measuring 5½ x 8 inches. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-Two. Finally, we offer Dr. Talmage's great HEART-BALM.

TELL me about the Master!

I am weary and worn to-night,
The day lies behind me in shadow,
And only the evening is light!
Light with a radiant glory
That lingers about the West,
My poor heart is weary, awestruck,
And longs, like a child, for rest.

Tell me about the Master!

Of the hills he in loneliness trod,
When the tears and the blood of his anguish
Dropped down on Judaea's sod.
For to me life's seventy mile-stones
But a sorrowful journey mark;
Rough lies the hill country before me,
The mountains behind me are dark.

Tell me about the Master!

Of the wrongs he freely forgave;
Of his love and tender compassion,
Of his love that was mighty to save;
For my heart is awestruck, awestruck,
Of the woes and temptations of life,
Of the error that stalks in the noonday,
Of falsehood and malice and strife.

Yet I know that whatever of sorrow

Or pain or temptation befall,

The infinite Master has suffered,

And knoweth and pitieth all.

So tell me the sweet old story,

That falls on each wound like a balm,

And my heart that was bruised and broken

Shall grow patient and strong and calm.

TIMES IN PARALLEL.

Points of Resemblance Between this Age and the Antediluvians.

BY REV. A. R. FAUSSET, M. A.

OUR Lord tells us, if we desire to know what the state of the world will be at his return we have a picture of it in the age just before the flood (Luke 17: 26)—"As it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark and the flood came, and destroyed them all."

Now the prominent feature in the picture drawn by the Lord of the antediluvian world is its intense worldliness. The absence of the connecting "and" marks the complete absorption of men in secular aims and pleasures, eating, drinking, marrying, as if this were their all, with no desire beyond. No interval was allowed for repose or meditation upon the concerns of eternity: it was one ceaseless round of bustle, business, and pleasure. "They know not the things which belonged unto their peace (Matthew 24: 39; like Jerusalem before its awful judgment—Luke 19: 42) until the flood came and took them all away."

Along with this practical unbelief there was not wanting what often accompanies it—open putting away of God from them, and professed disavowal of the debt of gratitude due to him: "Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden? which were cut down out of time (prematurely), whose foundation was overflown with a flood; which said unto God, Depart from us: and what can the Almighty do for them? Yet he filled their houses with good things" (Job 22: 15-18). This, and the corresponding picture of the heathen—"When they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful" (Romans 1: 21), has its exact counterpart in St. Paul's description of the men of the last days, "unthankful unholy" (II. Timothy 3: 2); relapsing into heathenism—a marked characteristic of our own age.

The sacred writer (Genesis 6: 4) adds another feature, "There were giants (nephilim, rather 'men of violence': literally, 'fellers') in those days;" and again (verse 13), "The earth was filled with violence through men." This feature, too, is to be reproduced in the "lawlessness" (English version) of the last days about to culminate in the revolution of "the lawless one."

Are not these characteristics beginning to mark our age? Selfish absorption in the pursuit of gain; ambition and pleasure; no pause, no rest allowed, so that the worldlings make themselves mere drudges; and the prevalent diseases are those of the nerve-system and the heart, entailing frequent sudden deaths: intense worldliness; impatience of Divine law; independence of God; the tyranny of the multitude; recklessness of the rights, properties, and lives of one's fellowmen?

All this, moreover, goes on side by side with worldly and intellectual culture; advancement in material civilization and science, whilst there is deterioration in moral purity. So it was in the days before the flood. Cain's descendants were distinguished for inventions, accomplishments, and the arts of civilization. Tubalcain, the "instructor of every artificer" ("hammering every kind of sharp-edged tool") invented weapons of brass and iron; Jubal, musical instruments (Genesis 4: 21), the harp and the pipe. Our age is music-mad; our churches are changed into sacred opera houses, our charity bazaars into vanity fairs and music saloons. The harp may beguile a Saul amidst his demon-possession for a time, but it will not prevent the evil spirit's return. Nebuchadnezzar's concert was the accompaniment of idolatry and persecution. So it will be again (Rev. 13: 4-18). The cries of the innocent sacrificed to Moloch used to be drowned with the sounds of music. How many stifle the voice of conscience and thoughts of seriousness with melodies which reach only the ear, and mistake pleasurable emotions awakened by church music for the religion of the heart. In Cain's race was found a "father of tent-dwellers," and a "father of musicians," but not a father of the faithful; one to instruct in brass and iron, but not in the good knowledge of the Lord. So our present "last days" are peculiarly noted for the innumerable applications of iron railways, iron houses, iron ships, and especially terrible iron instruments of warfare.

THE LORD'S DAY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Nov. 4. Mark. 2: 23-28.

WHEN we realize what the Lord's Day was given for, there will not be much difficulty in deciding how it should be observed. It is a singular and significant fact that people who call the Lord's Day the Sabbath and strive to make it a day of gloom, base their conduct on Old Testament legislation; yet the fourth Commandment prescribes no religious ordinances for the day. It simply enjoins a suspension of toil and leaves men to do what they please with their leisure. It was to be kept holy, not to be profaned by any worldly toil, but nothing was said about devoting it to worship. The later prophets had more to say about it, but the Commandment simply enjoined physical rest. The Lord's day does not commemorate God's resting from the work of creation and it is not intended to be used simply for rest. It commemorates the rising of Christ from the dead and it should be used for gaining and imparting that newness of life, of which his rising was a symbol. It is a privilege to leave for one day in seven the harassing, benumbing, worldly work and worldly care and devote the attention to spiritual things, to gaining further knowledge of Christ and his Gospel and thereby strengthening the soul in right principles. It is an opportunity also for service. In celebrating the resurrection of Christ, the triumphant culmination of his earthly career, the first thought is one of joy and the next one of grateful service. Love to Christ and love to men impels every true Christian to impart his treasure, which has transformed him into a new man, to some one near him who has it not. There is no law about this. Christ does not lay his followers under laws in this matter. He trusts to their love. He healed the sick on the Sabbath, restored the cripples, cast out devils. If the Christian follows his example, he will attend public worship, he will at least visit the sick, will try to restore those whom sinful habit and sinful association has crippled and will labor to deliver those whom Satan is holding and using in his service. "Is it right," people ask, "to write letters on Sunday?" "Is it right to do this or that on Sunday?" Let the conscience decide. If the heart is right, if there is the burning desire to work for Christ, to bring others into his kingdom that there ought to be, none of these questions will arise. The day will be all too short for the work and for the attainment of the knowledge and strength which are needed for daily conduct. The Christian has liberty as to his observance of the day, but he is under the compulsion of his higher nature which will prevent his misusing it.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR REPORT.

The quarterly report of Secretary J. Willis Baer of the Christian Endeavor Society, presented at the regular meeting of the Board of Trustees on Oct. 8, contains welcome news of the progress of President F. E. Clark, who, writing from Lucerne, announces himself "improving rapidly in health." The next annual convention is now definitely fixed for July 10-14 in Boston, Mass. The change from San Francisco was made with regret; but in the face of the attitude of the railroads, it would have been folly to adhere to the original programme. Mr. Baer announced remarkable progress in the number of societies. The total at the Cleveland Convention stood at 33,679; it is now 35,079, or an increase of 1,400 in three months.

As to the Good Citizenship movement, which has been the subject of much discussion, Mr. Baer says: "Christian Endeavorers everywhere have set themselves deliberately and earnestly to help forward the movement of Christian citizenship. On the whole, their efforts meet with the approval and commendation of pastors and churches and lovers of good government everywhere. Here and there, however, this movement has been criticised, and severely. Here and there individuals have sent out displayed. We must be able to distinguish between politics and partisanship, and, as Dr. Clark has said repeatedly, "Christian Endeavor must not be made the catspaw of the politicians of any party. He does a grievous injury to the cause who attempts to make of this movement a partisan propaganda. No United Society, no State union, no paper, no individual, has a right to say to what party any individual is to belong. To be a Christian Endeavorer does not mean that one is to be a Republican or a Democrat; but it does mean that he will be a good citizen, and that he will exert every ounce of influence which he possesses for the right."

THE C. C. C. LEADERS.

Our friends of the Young People's Baptist Union will be glad to have the three portraits which appear on this page. They are those of the leaders and guides of their studies for the year. The Christian Culture Courses are pre-eminently the distinctive feature of the Union, which makes it permanently useful as an educational force. Prof. Ira M. Price, Ph.D., of the University of Chicago, has the conduct of the Bible Readers' Course. This year the readings are in the prophecies and Prof. Price makes a suggestive selection from devotional literature appropriate to the subject. By reading one chapter a day, the whole Bible is covered in four years. Mrs. Sophie Bronson Titterington who has written much on Missions, has charge of the Conquest Missionary Course. No one knows better than she the scope of the subject and she knows exactly who has the special information bearing on particular fields. This year the topic is "Leaders and Triumphs" and about both Mrs. Titterington has an inexhaustible fund of knowledge. Dr. Henry C. Vedder, editor of the "Examiner," has undertaken the conduct of the Sacred Literature Course. The subjects this year are covered by the general title of "Struggles for Distinctive Principles," and include, beside the early historical struggles and struggles, the Baptist leaders on the European continent; the Leaders in England such as Bunyan, Carey and Spurgeon; and the heroes of the New World, Judson, Jeter, Fuller, Cone and their brethren. The Union is to be congratulated on having for its leader in this interesting course a scholar so able and accomplished as Dr. Vedder.

NEW JERSEY C. E. CONVENTION.

Seldom has the State of New Jersey had so enthusiastic a religious meeting as that of the State Christian Endeavor Convention which assembled at New Brunswick, Oct. 11 and 12. Fully fifteen hundred accredited delegates attended and at the evening sessions the audiences were estimated at three thousand. The convention was welcomed by Mayor Van Cleef for the city, President Austin Scott for Rutgers College and Seminary, the Rev. P. T. Pockman for the churches, and H. B. Zimmerman for the local union. Response was made by the Rev. Dr. J. C. French of Newark.

Miss Caroline Brookfield of Belvidere, Secretary of the State Society, reported: Number of societies, 907; total membership, 43,740; young people's societies, 639; junior

The Denominational rallies were marked features of the Convention, the churches in which they were held being well filled. No sign more significant than this could have been given of the deep seated union which Christian Endeavor has revealed between the denominations.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

There are now 16,023 chapters of the Epworth League in the Methodist Episcopal Church, an increase of 418 in the month ending Sept. 20th. Of the total number of chapters 2,800 are junior leagues.

The President and Secretary of the Epworth League in India and Malaysia, have sent a circular letter to all the Leagues in those countries, urging them to plan for grand missionary day celebration and collection for that cause.

The fourth annual State Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union of Kansas, was held at Wintfield, Wednesday Oct. 17, in connection with the regular Baptist State Convention. Over three hundred delegates were present.

The Young Men's Christian Association in the City of Mexico is devoting its efforts to stimulating the use and study of the Bible in the republic. A regular Sunday afternoon Bible meeting is held under the direction of Mr. R. B. Keys, auditor of the Mexican National Railroad, and General Secretary Gaston is taking an active interest in extending the work of the Scriptural Union in Mexico.

The open-air meetings of the Y. M. C. in the Grunewald, a great park near Berlin (started in 1889), have been held during the summer every Sunday. Attendance has been large until the recent rainy weather set in. Generally a good number of people remained to listen to the short Gospel address and the blessing was notable.

A Christian Endeavorer aboard the U. S. Steamer "Monongahela," writes: "Chaplain is an earnest worker and I have made arrangements with him to start a Bible class among the crew at night; he is very glad to help me to work on the good work for the Missionary Society."

as I am alone at present, but I will try, the good fight myself among the men; I know God will be with us to bless and save.

In the eighteen months during which Christian Endeavor Union at Oakland, Cal., has been carrying on work for men they have secured from sailors 166; 166 of the active members' pledge; of the men have attended meetings on board with Endeavorers, and the audiences meetings on shipboard have numbered 6. Sailors have been received in the home, the workers and two officers have been brought into church membership.

An interesting letter has been received telling how Christian Endeavor is penetrating into the heart of the Dark Continent. Dr. W. H. Leslie, a medical missionary at Banza Mantelke, is starting a promising society in the church, which is the scene of the labors of Henry Richards of the Congo hero.

Rev. Daniel Wilshire, writing from the Bahamas, says that Mrs. Wilshire has organized a Baptist Young People's Union in connection with the Nassau church. It began with only six members. "She persevered, and last year had to divide the work into junior and senior classes. God prospered it, and to-day seventy in the junior and forty in the Senior classes are enrolled. Last January it was thought well to extend it to the Adelaide and Gamble churches, and in July she sailed with Mrs. Eleuthera to form a branch at Governor Harbor, seventy miles distant. I believe the B. Y. P. U. will prove very helpful to us in our work."

Syrian Maids and Matrons.

One of the Needs of the Women of the East—Mrs. Jamal's Work Among the Young Girls in Jerusalem.

HERE is an ancient Moslem tradition which states that Abd-el-Kader once prophesied that "all the mosques in Damascus would yet be turned into Christian Churches." While Christianity has made remarkable progress in Syria during the last seventy-five years, the prediction is very far from being realized, and as long as Mohammedanism rules there, the dark spiritual ignorance will continue to prevail among the people. Especially is this true of the Syrian women of the poorer classes, whose neglected condition is now attracting the sympathetic attention of travelers from western lands while visiting Palestine. Moslem women are denied all participation in society; the women of the Bedouins have greater freedom but are almost equally ignorant; the Druse women and girls are more intelligent and many can read and write, and the women of the Christian sects in Syria are, as a rule, painfully neglected, ignorant and superstitious. Despite these drawbacks, the Syrians are a social people, neighborly, musical, free of indolence and feast-days, and they improve quickly by contact with people of higher intellectuality and greater refinement. They are essentially a home-loving race, with filial obedience and the traditional respect of a son for a father are marked traits in every Syrian household. But in a multitude of the poorer homes the mother is the universal toiler and burden-bearer and the girls are neglected drudges from their very childhood.

Marion Harland has given us, in her charming letters from Palestine, a pathetic insight into the domestic lives of these poor Syrian mothers and daughters. In the story of Lala, the Syrian girl of Jerusalem—whose father had never been known to utter an affectionate word, who was a household slave, untaught, unloved and unconsidered, and whose marriage meant only a change of condition without improvement—she has described a type of thousands of other girls who are now leading the same hopeless and purposeless life, their intellect unawakened and their spiritual natures totally undeveloped.

A number of our readers have written to us concerning the work that is now being conducted by Mrs. David Jamal, among the Syrian girls of the "Holy City," and expressing a warm interest in the progress of the Industrial Class. This estimable lady has for several years past been instructing classes of poor native girls in her own home, where, besides being taught plain sewing, knitting, crocheting, embroidery and housework, they are told the story of Jesus. Their teacher, a most sensible and educated woman, whose sole desire is to aid these poor girls to become helpful, self-reliant, capable housewives, has twice a week received from twelve to eighteen of them in her own rooms and devoted several hours to their training. This is a real mission, and a practical benevolence in the highest sense, since it is laying the foundation of future happiness in many humble Syrian homes.

Marion Harland has ably pleaded the cause of this unassuming Christian work, and it is pleasant to know that Mrs. Jamal has so many hearty sympathizers, whose approval of her plan has taken the form of a practical movement for its support. American women with daughters of their own, will feel their hearts go out very warmly to Mrs. Jamal and her work. To lift these poor Syrian girls from their inherited lot of ignorance and neglect to the plane of intelligent and useful Christian womanhood were surely a task worth the trying.

A Costly Birthday.

Although birthdays are not so generally kept here as in Europe, there are few fathers and mothers in America who do not mark such events in the household by the presentation of some trinket as a token of love and affection. At the birthdays of monarchs and princes abroad, large sums are frequently expended in fireworks, festivities and public display. Probably the most remarkable example of this character in Europe is found in Russia, where the birthdays of the Emperor and Empress are celebrated by a series of fetes that cost a fortune. But even these are insignificant contrasted with the fabulous cost of an imperial birthday in China. Lately the Chinese government has been making preparations for observing the sixtieth birthday of Tsi-Tshi, the empress dowager, and an enormous sum, equal to $25,000,000, is said to have been appropriated for this purpose.

Owing to the war, the royal lady wisely ordered that the proposed jubilee in her honor be abandoned, and the money applied to strengthen the defences of the country; but the Chinese, strange as it may seem under the circumstances, would brook no such economy, and appear determined to spend the money on fetes, fire-works, illuminations, processions, festivals and kite-flying. Tsi-Tshi is a woman of sense and discretion, however, and it is just possible that she may yet find some means of preventing this absurd programme.

A Boy Fakir's Queer Pets.

Every visitor to Simla (India) knows the Jakko Hill—about 1500 feet high—in the immediate neighborhood, and the monkey-temple on the top of it, writes a recent traveler in India. There lives an ascetic, fanatical fakir who supports himself and the monkeys on the offerings of the faithful, and who is treated by those creatures with the most profound respect. There are two troops or regiments of monkeys, each with its king, who is appointed to that position by the fakir. The king, alone, has the right to eat in the temple; the other monkeys remain outside, and the fakir himself brings a dish of tid-bits for their Kotval, or general. When they have done, they file respectfully before the fakir, who dismisses them with "Go, my children."

This fakir, who is bronzed by wind and weather, clothed only in a leopard-skin, and whose hair has not been cut or combed for twenty years, is a European. He is able to converse in perfect English, and his name is Charles William de Roussette. His father was a shop-keeper in Simla, and sent him as a boy to the best school there. But an ex-servant of the father had been very intimate with the fakir of Jakko, and on the latter's death had succeeded to his position. The young Roussette used to visit him frequently, and on his death, succeeded him.

Sweet Home Memories.

Too often we leave the expression of our love for our own dear ones until they are gone. We do not realize how very dear and near to us they are until they leave our homes for the Father's house. After they have gone only the most beautiful traits of their characters are remembered. Indeed, it is only after their companionship with us is over, that we truly see and know what their lives really were. So many little things in their everyday lives we took no note of, which, when the hands have been folded and the voice silenced, come to our remembrance as proofs of their unselfish, never-failing love for us. The weak points in their characters, the faults, which we magnified and judged unjustly, are forgotten, and we feel that we would give all we possess could we undo the wrong we did them oftentimes by passing unjust judgment.

NOW.

If you have a friend worth loving,
Love him—yes, and let him know
That you love him e'er life's evening
Tinge his brow with sunset glow.
Why should good words ne'er be said
Of a friend till he is dead?

If you hear a song that thrills you,
Sung by any child of song,
Praise it—do not let the singer
Wait deserved praises long.
Why should one who thrills your heart
Lack the joys you may impart?

If you hear a prayer that moves you
By its humble, pleading tone,
Join it—do not let the seeker
Bow before his God alone.
Why should not your brother share
The strength of two or three in prayer?

RUNAWAY CHILDREN.

Do not scold the runaways; do not send bitter messages after them, writes the Rev. E. I. D. Pepper of Philadelphia. Try to get them back, if not too late, if they have not gone too far away. If you see them, "afar off," with faces homeward, meet them half-way, fall on their necks, kiss them, give them the best the old home and the old farm can afford. Do not go growling around, ye elder brethren, because mother is overjoyed that her prodigal has come home safe and sound, though badly used up. Many a wanderer would have tramped on through his tears and troubles, if he had thought that the cold shoulder and cold victuals and bitter reproaches and rough repulses would have met him on his return.

See here, boy! If you must leave your mother, if you cannot learn wisdom by what other runaway boys have suffered, if you will not come back to your mother, do not say anything, do not do anything that is likely to injure her reputation. You, not she, may, after all, be wrong—wrong in spirit, if not in speech and behavior. You need not say more than you can possibly help, even if you think you must go away and stay away from your old home.

Perhaps you can think of a few good things to say about your old forsaken mother? What is that you are muttering now? "Well, I must say mother did give us good bread and butter—and some good things besides; I must acknowledge that my boyish pranks were very patiently borne with; I must confess that, when I brought the mud in from the outside world on my boots, she quietly swept it out again; I must confess that she hid my faults in her own bosom; I must confess that she suffered my manners (sometimes boorish enough) for many a long year. Ah, yes! She was a good old mother after all! Even now I can imagine I still feel the pressure of her loving arms around my neck. The Lord bless her and take care of her, if I do not! The Lord stay with her and protect her, if I have forsaken her!"

Don't Grumble at your Work.

What a happy world it would be if all discontent were eliminated. Many young people complain about their work, that it is menial and beneath persons of their talents and training, whereas all honorable work is ennobling. Ambitions are best realized by the faithful performance of the present duty, however humble it may be. The doing of a lowly service may be the test which the employer uses for bringing out the strength of his employees. Ordinarily, an employer will see to it that "he that is faithful in that which is least" has the opportunity to become "faithful also in much." We commend to our young friends these encouraging words of Canon Farrar: "A life spent in brushing clothes and washing crockery and sweeping floors—a life which the proud of the earth would have treated as the dust under their feet—a life spent at the clerk's desk, a life spent in the narrow shop, a life spent in the laborer's hut, may yet be a life so ennobled by God's loving mercy that for the sake of it a king might gladly yield his crown."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

CHAPTER IX.

A Marriage in High Life.

THE two daily newspapers of the city, always hungry for locals, culled the following one morning:
Morning Sun.

"Madam Rumor whispers that there will be a marriage in high life right in our midst before many days. Time will reveal the lovely bride and lucky groom."
Daily News.

"We learn, and with sincere regret too, that one of our most beautiful, accomplished and fashionable young ladies is soon to put on the yoke of bondage, this, the matrimonial. We say, we regret it, for we are a young man ourself, and in this instance cannot rejoice with those who rejoice, but can and do weep with those who weep."

Elegant cards of the newest design and most costly embossing and satin finish, were issued, and in ample time for the invited to secure new dresses for the occasion. The trousseau had been ordered from Paris, every article, even shoes and gloves. The amount paid for it would have caused eyes to open wide with wonder, only it was "Annie." Col. St. Clair said, so it was all right. To Deplus was consigned the arrangement of tables, and here too money was showered.

Twelve attendants were selected, and here also the plan was out of the ordinary line, for to each bridesmaid Annie gave a handsome present, and to each groomsmen Clarence made an elegant gift. Of course, Roy was first groomsmen, and since Clarence had no sister, it was decided that Val should act as first bridesmaid, but upon writing to Val they learned that it was impossible for her to be present.

Time took wings. Annie and Clarence were happy in each other's love. An extended tour was in contemplation and seemed to require much consultation. If Val thought the lawn party magical in its beauty what would she have thought, had she seen the grand preparation, for this, the most fashionable wedding the city had ever known! Brussels carpets were laid from the gate to the house, and this was a bower of loveliness, and, with the yard, was a blaze of light. One room was set apart for the bridal presents, and what a glittering room it was with gold and silver in startling array! Col. St. Clair's present to his child was a superb gold service, and to the groom a check for $200,000. Clarence's gift of diamonds costing $20,000, decked the fair bride. At one side, pushed far back, was a large, elegant Bible, and on the front page were the words:

"To Annie from Aunt Julia."
By its side was a tiny case, within, a gold thimble, and upon it the words: "From Val." Insignificant they looked here, but even amid the glitter, they whispered:

Life is real, life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal.

Who cared for life then? Not the transcendently beautiful bride as she leaned upon the arm of her handsome husband, and received the congratulations of friends.

"Surely it is embroidered with diamonds," said one lady looking through her eyeglass at Annie's dress. It might, or it might not have been, but it looked to be traced all over with flashes of light, which were crushed in gleaming satin, then half hid between fluff, creamy lace. Oh, it was a wonder, a marvel! How did Worth get it up! Fashionable life had never seen its equal, it was a new creation, born in the brain of the man milliner of Paris! Many eyes looked, many admired, many envied, many coveted, and the remainder, because they couldn't afford one like it, thought simplicity far better.

Annie was supremely happy. The day had been threatening, but in good time, the clouds had winged themselves away, and a full round moon looked down. Annie's rosy dream was realized. Her husband was all her heart desired, the preparations far exceeded her hopes, and her dress was the very perfection of taste and beauty.

"She is the leader of the town," exclaimed one.

"Aye! aye!" replied Judge Erskine, "and of beauty and of wealth."

"La creme de la creme," chimed in another.

"Clarence is a lucky dog, by Jove! He has drawn a prize far above his deserts."

"Aye! aye!" said the old Judge again, "Fortune favors the brave, not always the worthy."

Suddenly there was a suppressed scream—a hurrying to and fro of feet—a rush, and—

"What's the matter? What's the matter?" was upon every lip.

CHAPTER X.

"A still small voice."

"Col. St. Clair has fainted," said the Judge in a loud whisper. "Hu—sh! Keep quiet! Bring Dr. Ripley—hurry!"

"Oh, Clarence! let me go to Papa."

"My darling," said Clarence folding his arm around her, regardless of orange-bud and costly lace. "The doctor is there, you could do nothing. They are bleeding your father and you couldn't stand the sight."

"Oh, how terrible! and upon our wedding night! How's papa?" she asked as a gentleman passed hurriedly, but he made no answer. In alarm, she sprang up, saying, "I am going. Oh, I must go to papa!" And she rushed through the breathless crowd, out into the cool air, out under the full round moon, out on the back veranda, and there upon the marble pavement, lay Col. St. Clair—dead!

"Papa! Oh, Papa!" And she threw herself down upon the lifeless body and swooned.

It was a long hour before the house was still, and what a mockery seemed the scene. Death had crept in unawares, an uninvited guest. Mrs. St. Clair was in hysterics and Roy, in deep distress, was soothing her. Annie white and still unconscious, with her veil torn into shreds, her elegant dress blood-stained and dishevelled, orange-buds and blossoms here and there hanging by quivering stems, diamonds sparkling upon neck and arms—still in her superb attire Annie lay upon her bed, her husband bending over her, trying to call her back to life by tender epithets and burning kisses.

It was a tragic ending for a gay beginning—a sad wedding, the very saddest that was ever seen in that fashionable city. A funeral, instead of bridal festivities—married, but what a gloomy opening for a happy honeymoon!

The body lay in state. Wreaths from everywhere were placed upon the casket, which seemed to glitter with all the silver of the gift-room. Down in the vault it was placed, by the side of little children gone before. There we leave it.

"Annie must go to Europe," said Clarence to Mrs. St. Clair, a few days after the funeral, while yet the long mirrors were draped in black. Turning to Roy, he said:

"You will, of course, Roy, do as you think best, but my advice is to take your mother to the sea-side and let her mind be diverted, then let the servants remove every suggestion of death from the house, air it well, re-arrange the furniture, and make everything appear new. For my own part, I shall start with Annie for Europe. Betsy is already packing her trunk."

To Annie, the blow of her father's death was heavy. She loved him tenderly, and at once seemed to realize her loss. He was gone never to return; this she accepted, and, in accepting it, she wept the bitterest tears and spent whole nights in hopeless sorrow. The future, dim and dark, was to her an unread book, and she had never cared to turn its pages, but now and then the question would force itself, "Will I ever see that loved face again?" Then, with a shudder, she would push the thought from her.

"Annie grieves so, and her heart flutters so constantly, it alarms me," said Clarence to her physician. "It has been a terrible blow and I don't see why the old man couldn't have chosen a more propitious time to die in; a bridal and a funeral don't go very well. I was not consulted about this part of the programme, or I should have fixed it more to my liking."

The words were heartless and the very tone indifferent. He cared but little for his father-in-law's death. — why should he? True, he had in life presented him with a check on the Exchange Bank of the city for $200,000, but had he not by his death, given him a check for as much more? He loved, Annie, his beautiful, young wife, and never wearied of folding her in his arms and calling her by the tenderest names, and really by her grief, he was grieved. Of mothers-in-law he had a horror, had always vowed one should never rule his family, and, although he knew Mrs. St. Clair to be a woman of few words, quiet and unobtrusive, still he thought this a fitting occasion for asserting his authority and arraying himself in opposition to her wishes and judgment.

The house was soon deserted. Annie was in Europe trying to drown thought; her mother and Roy in their cottage at Long Branch, while servants were flying about enjoying the luxury of packing away Annie's bridal dresses, since mourning must take the place, and this, Clarence said, could be better purchased abroad.

* * * *

Six months had rolled away. Annie was in Venice longing for home, her mother and Roy in the lonely mansion, sad and alone. One day as they were skimming over the water in a gondola, Annie said:

"Clarence, I am weary of sight-seeing, even of beautiful Venice; let's go home."

"Just as you please, dear," Clarence replied. "I am ready to return whenever you are. Your health seems fully restored; it was for that we came, and, since my object has been accomplished, I am ready to return."

He looked very handsome as he smiled upon her, at least Annie thought so, and if the months of married life had been overshadowed, they had nevertheless been very happy.

"I am so glad poor papa did not die until after the ceremony was performed."

"How many times I have thought of that, Annie, and thanked the Fates who so ordered it. Custom would not have permitted us to have married for over a year. I am superstitious about a marriage in black."

"What a desolate creature I should have been without you all these weary months, Clarence! How I do wish papa could have lived! It was cruel to take him just at the beginning of our happiness!"

"How different our reception at home will be now to what it would have been."

"Yes, so different. It would have been a perfect round of receptions, first at our house, then at yours, Clarence, and then repeated at so many of our friends. Now, how different! Papa gone, a beautiful home still, but so desolate!"

For some moments there was silence, and then Clarence, in a cheerful voice, said:

"We must not spend time in grieving; we must be philosophers, take life as we find it, and become a little world to each other."

CHAPTER XI.

"Unto the Greek, foolishness."

November gales were scattering yellow leaves, and sweeping through leafless trees—the maple had unfurled her war-like banner, snowy petals were hugging each other in a tight embrace, and a taint hint of winter was in the air, when Clarence and Annie drove up to the St. Clair mansion. Roy met them at the gate, giving them a hearty welcome, endeavoring by his sunny manner to dispel the sombre clouds, which he knew were lowering on the horizon of Annie's heart. Her mother stood upon the veranda, pale yet smiling, and Annie rushed up and threw herself in tears upon her neck. As soon as she could speak, she said:

"Mamma, you do not look well; why did you not write me?"

"It is nothing serious, dear. We remained a little too long, I think, at the sea-side, for neither of us felt inclined to come back to the old life again. Do not feel troubled about me; I shall soon be well, now that you are here. You look very tired, Annie. Go up at once to your room. I told Betsy to brighten it up as well as she could with flowers."

Annie turned her face away, and with her husband went upstairs. She could not bear the sight of the flowers—Oh, why cannot death stay its icy hand! Why take those most dear from our embrace! Why not let us live on in this beautiful world forever! Such were Annie's thoughts. Often did she spend herself in tears. She hated tears; she never could bear to weep, but now her tears were her only outlet, and grief such as hers must have some outlet.

Roy had exerted himself since his return to change the house and grounds so that they would not be so suggestive of his father. Even his father's hat and cane had been removed from the hat-rack, and the dog had been sent away. His office had been transformed into a library. Instead of his desk covered with loose papers, with his easy chair near, now the walls were hidden by glass doors, and beautifully illustrated volumes shone through. The carpet had given place to a new one, and other furniture filled the room. Annie's heart rebelled at this, for she felt that every effort had been made to wipe out the very memory of her dear father, to forget him; but gradually she acquiesced, and at length acknowledged it to be best.

The St. Clair family were not members of any church, and had never been in the habit of frequenting any place of worship, though sometimes upon pleasant Sundays the young people would order the carriage and drive to one or other of the various churches of the city. Upon Sunday nights, however, Annie always remained at home, as this was the most fashionable time to receive the calls of her young gentlemen friends. Roy and she had never been permitted to attend Sabbath School, from a strange fear that they might learn evil, as he associated in classes with common people; yet they were allowed to go to any party of a fashionable neighbor and fear felt. The result was, they had grown up with but little knowledge of the Bible and less of prayer. Death had never entered their family within their remembrance, yet Annie had a great horror of it, and a pugnance to cemeteries. Roy professed to be a sceptic, and, under the influence of opiate, he quieted himself.

Now that her father was dead, and family in deep mourning, Annie was allowed by fashion to drown her thoughts and feelings in theatres and operas, so she found some pleasure in attending church. Not that her sorrow heart found comfort from the words of the minister of God, on the contrary, the comfort she obtained was rather the solace of diversion, the change from a desolate home to a large assembly of respectable people handsomely dressed, and then, too, it seemed to her the most proper thing for one afflicted to attend upon the house of God. Her attitude, as became a fine lady when church was that of a listener, and upon occasion she seemed to have listened to at least a part of the sermon, for, while at the altar, she said:

"I think Dr. Shelton a dreadful preacher, and I feel now that I shall never go to church again."

"Why, Annie?" asked Roy.

"Because he seems to take delight in talking of 'hell,' brings out the word so hard, it really seems to do him good. I think he ought to be more considerate of people's feelings."

"But, perhaps," said her mother, "he thinks it his duty to preach what he considers the plain truth."

"Yes," added Roy, "if he believed such a myth as hell, he ought to preach about it."

"Then," replied Annie, "I should think he might choose more polished language, for it is not a pleasant word at all, and one that refined ears should become accustomed to. The very name is so suggestive to me that I shudder when I pronounce it."

Roy, who was always glad to me light of religious things, now said with a laugh: "Annie, I see how it is, you are one of the good people say, 'under conviction' and it is becoming a serious matter."

"Do hush your nonsense, Roy. 'Under conviction' indeed, when I have done nothing to be convicted for! Dr. Shelton is a very eloquent divine, has no equal in my opinion in our city, and I have enjoyed his magnificent flights of fancy, but I will not listen to him again, unless he selects some more pleasant comforting topics to preach upon."

So church going proved of little pleasure to Annie, and soon she neglected the house of God altogether.

pel Victories Won through Mr. Moody's Bible Institute Workers.

S the winter approaches, the busiest season of the Bible Institute in Chicago opens. Mr. Moody, the famous evangelist, and his associates in the management of the Institute are now, more than before, deluged with letters of application from hundreds of godly young men and women who desire enter to the Institute and receive the necessary training for practical Christian work. It is to the Institute to take up such cases to extend its training work generally to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are now aiding Mr. Moody.

Uncalculable spiritual good has already been accomplished through the efforts of students who have been trained in the Bible Institute, and are now actively engaged in Christian work. Mr. James Smith, who entered the Institute in the fall of 1890, and after a course of study, engaged in general evangelistic work, is pastor of the Burr Mission, Chicago.

In September, Mr. Smith took charge of a tent which was pitched in the locality of his mission. Special efforts were made to reach the children, services being held for their benefit four afternoons each week. Mr. Smith was assisted in this work by his wife, who is a former student of the Bible Department of the Institute. Some interesting cases were dealt with. A hard case came one evening to the tent and the preacher gave his personal experience in the course of his sermon. He had been a drunkard before conversion, and was man was touched by the similarity of his own experience. He came the next night and heard the testimony of another convert. The following Sabbath evening he came to the tent early in order to speak to Mr. Smith. He had been a railroad engineer, but had lost his job through drink, and was sinking lower every day. "How done?" he asked. Mr. Smith told of Song of the washboard.

Endless rubbing—tiresome, ruinous, back-breaking; wear and tear on things rubbed; wear and tear on temper and health; wear and tear on everything—even the washboard itself.

It's all done away with, if you use Pearlline. There isn't any washboard; there isn't any rubbing on it; there's no wear and tear, and there's very little work. It's the only sensible way of washing—easy, economical, and, above all things, absolutely safe.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearlline, be honest—send it back. 415 JAMES PYLE, New York.

JUST A HINT.

Speaking of the efficacy of the Electropoise in curing dyspepsia, Rev. Wm. H. Boole, D.D., says, under date of July 11, 1894: "One fact I wish to emphasize. I no longer carry medicines around with me, for I have no use for them either 'before meals' or 'after meals' or 'one at bedtime'; not even a doze of 'pepsin.'"

LEPER HOME IN JERUSALEM.

This Moravian institution continues its pathetic and deeply interesting ministry. The present year commenced with twenty-eight patients—an increase of four. Sixteen of these were men, and twelve women. Two of the inmates have been in the Home twenty years. Some of the inmates are zealous Mohammedans who are treated with the same kindness as the Christians.

In the new report, Mr. Schubert, the director, says of his afflicted family: "I get on with them pretty well. Sometimes a decided word is required, but I could also give many an instance of childlike affection and gratitude. They cannot do heavy work, but are willing for light tasks when I call upon them. Now and then they set to without being asked; lately at the beginning of the rainy season, they all helped to carry in wood. The blind and the fingerless filled the baskets, and the others carried them in."

During last year death removed six of the poor lepers. One of these, a woman, who had been an inmate for nearly three years, was called Fatme. She gave little trouble, and was always cheerful and contented. In her last illness she suffered a good deal, until a stroke deprived her of consciousness. A few weeks before she died she begged to be carried into the chapel to the Christmastide service, in order that she might repeat her portion of Scripture in presence of the assembled guests.

A COSTLY BUDDHIST TEMPLE.

There is a new Buddhist temple in course of erection at Kyoto, begun thirteen years ago, and estimated to cost between five and six millions of dollars. This is being built by the Shin or "true" Buddhist sect. They are progressive, having appropriated and grafted some of the ethical teachings of Christianity upon their system. "This temple," writes Bishop Galloway, "and the theological school, if so it may be termed, are the only substantial evidences I have seen of a revived or sustained interest in old faiths. I was shown some immense black ropes—cables—and told that they are 100 feet long, and made of the hair of Japanese women, contributed for the purpose."

Good News—Wonderful Cures of Catarrh and Consumption.

Our readers who suffer from Lung Diseases, Catarrh, Bronchitis and Consumption, will be glad to hear of the wonderful cures made by the new treatment known in Europe as the Andral-Proca cure. Write to the New Medical Advance, 67 West 6th Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, and they will send this new treatment free for trial. State age and particulars of your disease.

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

FREE! 11 YEARS WITHOUT HEARING.

The following is worthy of careful perusal: I suffered intensely from Catarrh for eleven years; nose stopped up, continually dripping down in the throat, especially in the morning, accompanied by a dry hacking cough; I took cold on the least exposure, and had a continuous dull headache, a roaring, buzzing, cracking and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail and for eleven years I was almost entirely deaf, and was continually becoming worse. Every remedy I tried failed. Without much hope I commenced the use of the Home Etherizing Medication; the first application was simply wonderful. My hearing rapidly returned, and now I can hear a conversation without the least difficulty and I suffer no inconvenience in any way from the disease. A few months treatment has entirely cured my CATARRH.

CHINA'S THREE RELIGIONS.

Confucianism, Buddhism and Taoism, and their Many Millions of Followers—A Land of Countless Temples and Unnumbered Idols—The Magnificent Heathen Shrines of Peking—The Palace and the "Forbidden City"—Progress of Christianity.

GREATEST of the world's missionary fields, China, with her 350,000,000 population and her ancient civilization, stands to-day as the foremost among idolatrous nations. These distinct religions, each containing a kernel of spiritual truth, buried amid a mass of superstitions, unite in deluding her people and keeping them in bondage to a system of priest-craft more complex and formidable than was ever before devised by the ingenuity of man. Her cities, mountains, valleys and groves abound in temples dedicated to the worship of a legion of mythical deities, representing every agency of nature and almost every conceivable power. From a date long anterior to the Christian era, the struggle with heathenism continued; yet even as early as the first century, A.D., as tradition tells, China began to reach out for spiritual truth.

had found in Palestine the true "light of the world," China and the greater part of Asia might to-day have been Christian.

The state religion of China, which is based on the doctrines of Confucianism, recognizes the emperor as high priest, divinely ordained. For many generations past it has become more and more degraded, till now it is but little above the religion of some barbarian tribes. Formerly, a Supreme Being, Schanti, was recognized, and the words Tien (heaven) and Ti (earth) had special reference to the controlling Deity; but now the tablets of these two are placed on an equality with the royal ancestral tablets of the various dynasties, and the gods of the land and of the crops. Divine revelation and immortal life find no recognition anywhere in Confucianism; the conduct of the present life only is contemplated. His doctrines and the moral maxims he inculcated are to-day followed by the cultured classes in China; each family sacrifices to the household deities in its own dwelling, and the emperor alone is permitted to sacrifice to heaven. Taoism, the second religion of the country, introduces the belief in a multitude of spirits as influencing the destiny of man, and has thousands of idolatry. It has nearly a million priests, and many temples; one of the principal places of worship being the "Temple of Ten Thousand Buddhas," which is situated near the emperor's summer palace, west of Peking (shown in the photograph on this page). Some of the temples are superb structures and others mere wayside chapels.

China's three great religions are wedded together and exist harmoniously. All three may be found in one temple. Thus, the Confucians, who are the literary class, worship in the Buddhist temples, using the Taoist ritual. According to popular reckoning, the priests of Buddhism and Taoism are the only real Buddhists and Taoists, and the people do not consider that they themselves belong to those faiths, though they worship regularly in the temples, and look upon the priests as their ministers and contribute to the support of those religions. The average Chinaman does not consider himself a member of any church, for he has not passed a literary examination, which is the rite of Buddhism and Confucianism, and he does not eat the rice of the priesthood, which is the only sacrifice a Buddhist and Taoist knows. The three religions have entered into practical partnership; they are like the three legs of a tripod, which support what is really one united its deification of ancestors and its personification of nature. Next arose Taoism, with a multitude of heathenish beliefs. Buddhism came from India, with its shrines, images, candles and incense, its liveried monks and Sanscrit ritual, and the people found it adapted to their carnal minds and accepted it. Taoism adopted the state gods of the Confucians and the legends, and the prayers of the Buddhists, but retained its own innumerable galaxy of spirits and goblins. Confucianism is man-worship, Buddhism image-worship, Taoism spirit-worship, and the three sets of priests are often seen praying in the same temple. In the Buddhist temples are Taoist gods and in the Taoist temples Buddhist ages of hero-worship and demon-worship and the centuries that followed, acquired such strength that it became the dominant faith of the Chinese people. Had the empire, instead of halting in India, gone further westward until, reaching Syria, they temples everywhere, and an elaborate priesthood. Buddhism, the third religion, had its devotees in China since the first century, A. D., but has now sunk into mere structure—a strange, heterogeneous compound of polytheism, rationalism and gross superstition. For centuries, Confucianism stood alone, with its worship of Heaven, images. There are some gods common to all, one being the God of War, whom the Confucians call "The Great Military Sage," the Buddhists "The God of Protection," and the Taoists "The Minister of Heaven."

THE LOOKING-GLASS.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Exodus 38:8: "And he made the laver of brass, and the foot of it was of brass, of the looking-glasses of the women assembling."

When I often hear about the Gospel in John, and the Gospel in Luke, and the Gospel in Matthew; but there is just as surely a Gospel of Moses, and a Gospel of Jeremiah, and a Gospel of David. In other words, Christ is as certainly to be found in the Old Testament as in the New.

When the Israelites were marching through the wilderness, they carried their church with them. They called it the tabernacle. It was a pitched tent; very costly, very beautiful. The frame-work was made of forty-eight boards of acacia-wood set in sockets of silver. The curtains of the place were purple, and scarlet, and blue, and fine linen, and were hung with most artistic loops. The candlestick of that tabernacle had shaft, and branch, and bowl of solid gold, and the figures of cherubim that stood there had wings of gold; and there were lamps of gold, and snuffers of gold, and tongs of gold, and rings of gold; so that scepticism has sometimes asked, Where did all that precious material come from? It is not my place to furnish the precious stones, it is only to tell that they were there.

I wish now more especially to speak of the laver that was built in the midst of that ancient tabernacle. It was a great basin from which the priests washed their hands and feet. The water came down from the basin in spouts and passed away after the cleansing. This laver or basin was made out of the looking-glasses of the women who had frequented the tabernacle, and who had made these their contribution to the furniture. These looking glasses were not made of glass, but they were brazen. The brass was of a very superior quality, and polished until it reflected easily the features of those who looked into it. So that this laver of looking-glasses spoken of in my text did double work: it not only furnished the water in which the priests washed themselves, but it also, on its shining, polished surface, pointed out the spots of pollution on the face which needed ablution. Now, my Christian friends, as every thing in that ancient tabernacle was suggestive of religious truth, and for the most part positively symbolical of truth, I shall take that laver of looking-glasses spoken of in the text as all-suggestive of the Gospel, which first shows us our sins as in a mirror, and then washes them away by divine ablution.

Oh, happy day, happy day,
When Jesus washed my sins away!

I have to say that this is the only looking-glass in which a man can see himself as he is. There are some mirrors that flatter the features, and make you look better than you are. Then there are other mirrors that distort your features, and make you look worse than you are; but I want to tell you that this looking-glass of the Gospel shows a man just as he is. When the priests entered the ancient tabernacle, one glance at the burnished side of this laver showed them their need of cleansing; so this Gospel shows the soul its need of divine washing. "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." That is one showing. "All we, like sheep, have gone astray." That is another showing. "From the crown of the head to the sole of the foot there is no health in us." That is another showing. The world calls these, defects, imperfections, or eccentricities, or erratic behavior, or "wild oats," or "high living;" but the Gospel calls them sin, transgression, filth—the abominable thing that God hates. It was just one glance at that mirror that made Paul cry out, "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" and that made David cry out, "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean;" and that made Martin Luther cry out, "Oh, my sins, my sins!" I am not talking about bad habits. You and I do not need any Bible to tell us that bad habits are wrong, that blasphemy and evil-speaking are wrong. But I am talking of a sinful nature, the source of all bad thoughts, as well as of all bad actions. The Apostle Paul calls their roll in the first chapter of Romans. They are a regiment of death encamping around every heart, holding it in a tyranny from which nothing but the grace of God can deliver it.

If you could catch a glimpse of your natural heart before God, you would cry out in amazement and alarm. The very first thing this gospel does is to cut down our pride and self-sufficiency. If a man does not feel his lost and ruined condition before God, he does not want any gospel. I think the reason that there are so few conversions in this day is because the tendency of the preaching is to make men believe that they are pretty good anyhow—quite clever, only wanting a little fixing up—a few touches of divine grace, and then you will be all right; instead of proclaiming the broad, deep truth that Payson and Whitefield thundered to a race trembling on the verge of infinite and eternal disaster. "Now," says some one, "can this really be true? Have we all gone astray? Is there no good in us?" In Hampton Court I saw a room where the four walls were covered with looking-glasses; and it made no difference which way you looked, you saw yourself. And so it is in this gospel of Christ. If you once step within its full precincts, you will find your whole character reflected; every feature of moral deformity, every spot of moral taint. If I understand the Word of God, its first announcement is that we are lost. I care not, my brother, how magnificently you may have been born, or what may have been your heritage or ancestry, you are lost by reason of sin. "But," you say, "what is the use of all this—of showing a man's faults when he can't get rid of them?" None! "What was the use of that burnished surface to this laver of looking-glasses spoken of in the text, if it only showed the spots on the countenance and the need of washing, and there was nothing to wash with?" Glory be to God, I find that this laver of looking-glasses was filled with fresh water every morning, and the priest no sooner looked on its burnished side and saw his need of cleansing, than he washed and was clean—glorious type of the gospel of my Lord Jesus, that first shows a man his sin, and then washes it all away!

I want you to notice that this laver in which the priest washed—the laver of looking-glasses—was filled with fresh water every morning. The servants of the tabernacle brought the water in buckets and poured it into this laver. So it is with the gospel of Jesus Christ; it has a fresh salvation every day. It is not a stagnant pool filled with accumulated corruptions. It is living water, which is brought from the eternal rock to wash away the sins of yesterday—of one moment ago. "Oh," says some one, "I was a Christian twenty years ago!" That does not mean anything to me. What are you now? We are not talking, my brother, about pardon ten years ago, but about pardon now—a fresh salvation. Suppose a time of war should come, and I could show the Government that I had been loyal to it twelve years ago, would that excuse me from taking an oath of allegiance now? Suppose you ask me about my physical health, and I should say I was well fifteen years ago—that does not say how I am now. The gospel of Jesus Christ comes and demands present allegiance, present fealty, present moral health; and yet how many Christians there are seeking to live entirely in past experience, who seem to have no experience of present mercy and pardon! Do not spend so much of your time in hunting in the wardrobe for the old, worn-out shoes of Christian profession. Come this morning and take the glittering robe of Christ's righteousness from the Saviour's hand. You say you were plunged in the fountain of the Saviour's mercy a quarter of a century ago. That is nothing to me; I tell you to wash now in this laver of looking-glasses and have your soul made clean.

I notice also, in regard to this laver of looking-glasses spoken of in the text, that the priests always washed both hands and feet. The water came down in spouts, so that, without leaving any filth in the basin, the priests washed both hands and feet. So the gospel of Jesus Christ must touch the very extremities of our moral nature. A man cannot fence off a small part of his soul, and say, "Now, this is to be a garden in which I will have all the fruits and flowers of Christian character, while outside it shall be the devil's commons." No, no; it will be all garden or none. I sometimes hear people say, "He is a very good man except in politics." Then he is not a good man. A religion that will not take a man through an autumn election will not be worth anything to him in June, July and August. They say he is a useful sort of a man, but he overreaches in a bargain. I deny the statement. If he is a Christian anywhere, he will be in his business. It is very easy to be good in the prayer-meeting, with surroundings kindly and blessed, but not so easy to be a Christian behind the counter, when by one skillful twitch of the goods you can hide a flaw in the silk so that the customer cannot see it. It is very easy to be a Christian with a psalm-book in your hand and a Bible in your lap, but not so easy when you can go into a shop and falsely tell the merchant you can get those goods at a cheaper rate in another store, so that he will sell them to you cheaper than he can afford to sell them. The fact is, the religion of Christ is all-pervasive. If you rent a house, you expect full possession of it. You say, "Where are the keys of those rooms?" If I pay for this whole house, I want possession of those rooms." And the grace of God when it comes to a soul takes full possession of a man, or goes away and takes no possession. It will ransack every room in the heart, every room in the life, from cellar to attic, touching the very extremities of his nature.

I remark, further, that this laver of looking-glasses spoken of in the text was a very large laver. I always thought, from the fact that so many washed there, and also from the fact that Solomon afterward, when he copied that laver in the Temple, built it on a very large scale, that it was large; and so suggestive of the gospel of Jesus Christ and salvation by him—vast in its provisions. The whole world may come and wash in this laver and be clean.

When our civil war had passed, the Government of the United States made proclamation of pardon to the common soldier in the Confederate army, but not to the chief soldiers. The gospel of Christ does not act in that way. It says pardon for all, but especially for the chief of sinners. I do not now think of a single passage that says a small sinner may be saved, but I do think of passages that say a great sinner may be saved. If there be sinners faintly hued, just a little tinged, so faintly colored that you can hardly see them, there is no special pardon promised in the Bible for those sinners; but if they be glaring, like crimson, then they shall be as sinners. Now, my brother, I do not state this to put a premium upon great iniquity. I mean to say this to encourage that man, who he is, who feels he is so far gone from God that there is no mercy for him. I want to tell him there is a good chance. When Paul was a murderer; he assisted at the execution of Stephen; and yet Paul was saved. The dying thief did everything bad. The dying thief was saved. Richard Baxter swore dreadfully; but the great God met him, and Richard Baxter was saved. In Solomon's Temple there were ten lavers and one molten sea—this great reservoir in the midst of the temple filled with water—these lavers and this molten sea adorned with figures of palm-branches, and oxen, and lions, and cherubim. The fountain of God's mercy is a vaster molten sea than that. It is adorned not with palm-branches, but with the wood of the cross; not with cherubim, but with the wings of the Holy Ghost; and around that great rim all the race may come and wash in the molten sea. I was reading the story of Alexander the Great, who, when he was very thirsty and standing at the head of his army, had brought to him a cup of water. He looked off upon his host and said, "I will not drink this, my men are all thirsty;" and he dashed it to the ground. Blessed be God, there is enough water for all the hosts of heaven for captains and host. "Whosoever will may come and take of the water of life freely"—a laver broad as the earth, high as the heavens, and deep as hell.

But I notice also, in regard to this laver of looking-glasses spoken of in the text, that the washing in it was imperative and not optional. When the priests came to the tabernacle (you will find this in the fortieth chapter of Exodus), God tells them that they must wash in that laver or die. The priest might have said, "Can't I wash elsewhere? I washed in the laver at home, and now you want me to wash here." But he says, "No matter whether or not you were washed before. Wash in this laver or die." "But," says the priest, "there is water as clean as this—why won't that do?" "Wash here," says God, "or die." It is with the Gospel of Christ—it is imperative. There is only this alternative: repent your sins and perish, or wash them away and live. But says some one, "Why did not God have made more ways to heaven than one?" I do not know but he has made half a dozen. I know he has made but one. You say, "Are there not trees as luxuriant as that on Calvary—more luxuriant, for that had neither thorns nor blossoms; it was stripped and killed!" Yes, yes, there have been taller trees than that and more luxuriant; but the path to heaven is under that one tree—instead of quarreling because there are more ways, let us be thankful to God that there is one—one name given unto men by which we can be saved—one laver in which the whole world may wash. So you see what a radiant Gospel this is I preach. I do not know how a man can stand stolidly and resist it, for it is such an exhilarating thing. It is not a mere whim or caprice; it is life or death; it is heaven or hell. You must be before your child, and you have a pen in your hand. You put your hands before your back and say, "Which hand will I take? In one hand there is a treasure, in the other there is not." The child chooses. But God our Father does it that way with us. He spreads out the is, and says, "Now this shall be very

Pekin, the capital, has been an imperial city for nine centuries. It has had a most varied history, having at different times been captured by the "Tartars," by Genghis Khan, and by the Manchus. In the centre of the capital are the imperial grounds, and "the Purple or Forbidden City," the special retreat of royalty. On three sides of the city are altars to the sun, moon and earth. The palace grounds are marvels of Oriental beauty and the buildings (some of which are shown in an illustration accompanying this article), are substantial structures, somewhat ornate in exterior design, yet not to be compared with many of the temples. Within the palace, are halls of magnificent proportions and barbaric splendor. Most notable among the religious edifices are the "Temple of Heaven," in the outer or Chinese city, already mentioned the "Temple of Ten Thousand Buddhas," and the great Confucian temple called the "Kwotsze-keen," which contains the tablets of the great teacher, and his ten principal disciples. The "Temple of Heaven," is a large, pagoda-like edifice, with a vast base of white stone, above which rises a bell-shaped, circular building, which assumes a conical form toward the summit, the whole being capped by a great canopy, which makes it appear like a sugar-loaf surmounted by an umbrella. The temple contains tablets to the sun, moon, stars and the god of the year. Here the Emperor is wont to pay his devotions, and to pray for fair weather, success in war, or other good fortune. From the commanding height of this great temple, gard as an almost sacred personage, has naturally aroused the liveliest interest at Pekin. Should the city be attacked by Japanese, under Gen. Yamagata (whose portrait is also given), it is not at all probable that it can oppose any formidable defense. Yamagata is a commander unequalled in military tactics by any of the Chinese generals of the present day, and with his well-equipped and trained troops, supported by the formidable fleet which would operate against Tiensin simultaneously with his advance on the capital, he could hardly be successfully opposed by any force the Chinese could place in the field. It is within the range of probabilities, however, that European intervention may prevent the war from being prosecuted to the point of investing Pekin, and that terms of peace may be concluded in time to avert the total humiliation of China, the downfall of the reigning dynasty and the disruption of her ancient empire.

Christianity has encountered a multitude of obstacles in China, and its progress has been necessarily slow. Arnobius asserts that there was a small Christian sect there in the third century. Protestant missions were unknown until 1807, when the London Missionary Society sent out Rev. Robert Morrison to Canton to translate the Scriptures into Chinese. Other missionaries followed, but not a single conversion was recorded until seven years had elapsed.

Now, almost every Christian denomina- tion has well-established mission stations

one can overlook almost the entire city, which, with its countless temples, pagodas, shrines and palaces, and its teeming population, has only one Christian missionary chapel within its walls. Pekin is really a composite metropolis of three cities: Chinese, Tartar and Imperial. The Chinese city on the south is enclosed by separate walls and has a population of perhaps 300,000; the Tartar city on the north side has fully twice as many and its buildings are better and the Imperial quarter is detached from the Tartar quarter. Except when he goes out to pray in the temples, the young Emperor seldom ventures beyond the palace walls. His health is far from good, and he has neither the strength nor the inclination to take up public life vigorously. Much of his time—until the recent outbreak of hostilities with Japan, which seems to have infused some degree of energy into his life—has been spent within the palace enclosure, sailing on a small steam yacht upon the lake or watching the operation of a miniature railway.

Heretofore, the burden of the cares of state has largely devolved upon Prince Kung, the Emperor's uncle, who is President of the Tsungli-Yamen or Council, and is chief of the Admiralty as well. Yung is said to be an advocate of peace; but the Emperor, with unwonted energy, has adopted a warlike policy, even threatening to direct military operations in person. Such an attitude on the part of their ruler, whom the Chinese have been accustomed to reand the native adherents of Christianity are numbered by the tens of thousands. A review of the present condition of the Protestant missions in China was published in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD.

CHILD-WIFE REFUGEES.

Missionaries in Africa are often placed in a difficult and delicate position by the marriage customs of the country. Mr. Bunker, writing from Mount Selinda in East Central Africa to the "Missionary Herald," says: "We have had our first experience with girls running to us for protection from marriage customs by which they are bought and sold like so many goats. The first one that came was a girl about fourteen years old who has been married to a man about seventy, who made her the slave of himself and his old wife. It seems that she has run away many times before, but her father has sent her back to her husband. She is a bright girl and very anxious to learn. A friend of hers, even younger, ran away from a marriage which her friends contemplated between her and an old polygamist. She has now returned to her home and her husband has made up his mind that she would be a poor investment, for he has not consented to take her from her brother.

"It requires much wisdom to know what to do in these cases. We have not come to forcibly subvert the customs of the people, even though we do not approve of them, but to lead them to voluntarily choose bet-

THE TWELVE CHOSEN.

S.S. Lesson for Nov. 11. Mark 3:6-19. Golden Text John 15: 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

BEFORE the Lord Jesus, who already "knew all men and needed not that any should testify of man; for he knew what was in man," would venture to make a selection from among his disciples, "he went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God." The foundations of his church were to be laid, and built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets; and if, when the tabernacle was to be made "an earthly sanctuary," the glory of which was to be done away, Moses must needs continue forty days and forty nights in close communion with his God, much more must Christ himself receive from his Father the pattern of his church of "living stones," which should be "built up a spiritual house."

Before we go farther, let us not forget that there is another elect, chosen company, yet not of the number of the twelve apostles. They are "saints, and

"chosen in him before the foundation of the world" that they might be holy and without blemish before him in love, "fore-ordained unto adoption as sons, pre-ordained to be "a heritage" of God "unto the praise of his glory, his own possession." Are not these they whom the Father has given to his Son? But are not all true believers of this number? Some may ask. Let us apply the test of God's Word. All these are "saints and faithful in Christ Jesus." All these have kept the word of Christ, "and whoso keepeth his word, in him verily hath the love of God been perfected." Christ is "glorified in them," and they are not of the world even as he is not of the world. We have but to ask ourselves in the light of the Word of God through his Spirit: Am I a saint who is faithful in Christ Jesus? Does God count me such? Have I kept the Word of God that his love has been perfected in me? Is Jesus glorified in me? Am I "not of the world" in the same measure and deep reality in which Christ was not of the world? Does the world; do the things which perish, eating and drinking, the care of my health, of my reputation, of my comfort, my position, my property on earth, fill no more place in my life than these things did in the life of Christ? If so, there is a proof according to Scripture that I am one of those chosen ones who is given by the Father to the Son. But who of us can conscientiously pass such an examination? Who can say more than Peter did: "Lord, thou knowest all things. Thou knowest that I love thee." But, in view of such solemn Scriptures, let us not lightly and flippantly apply to ourselves the epithet of "chosen," which involves a life of such real and intense nearness to our God.

The result of that solemn night of prayer on the mountain in Galilee, was that our Lord, "when it was day," when the morning dawned, and when he himself had the morning light of clear direction from above "called his disciples and he chose from them twelve, whom he also named apostles" (Luke 6: 12). In the Gospel of Mark: "He goeth up into the mountain, and calleth unto him whom he himself would; and they went and he appointed twelve,

That They Might be with Him, and that he might send them forth to preach." To be with him is the first essential in an apostle, or in every Christian worker. Elijah needed no higher recommendation, no stronger proof of his vocation as a prophet than to be able to say: "The Lord God of Israel, before whom I stand." It was especially said of both the patriarch Joseph, the future ruler of Egypt, and of David, the future king of Israel, that the Lord "was with them."

Oh, how different is man's choice of instruments for the work of God from God's choice! Man seeks for intellectual qualifications, force of character, human experience, learning, etc., etc., while God's first requisite is a mind undisturbed by earth and earthly things, which shall be at leisure from itself to pay attention to God and to learn of him. The life of the Son of God was regulated at all times from above, by close intercourse with his Father. He sought for his twelve chosen ones such as would follow him in this manner of life, a life which should have all its sources and resources in God.

His chosen ones must be "with him" at one with him in his leadership, confiding absolutely in his wisdom, on his side of every question, with him in his conflicts with the enemy of souls, with him in his dealings with his critics, the Pharisees, scribes and elders; with him in his unworldly, self-renouncing life, which ran counter to the spirit of the age, and the prejudices of those who praise them who do well unto themselves. Christ's chosen are they who, whatever may be their external qualifications, are content to be always and in all things on his side. No Christian minister, or missionary, no Christian worker, whatever ordination or authorization he may have received from man, is really chosen of God, except he has learned to recognize this first part of the call of Christ. The minister or worker who, sleeping or waking, working or resting, in the pulpit or in the family, is "with him," will never be found doing or saying anything that is un-Christ-like. We cannot be with him and be misled. And such a worker, so living, is prepared by the very fact of Christ's presence with him or her, for whatever service he may call to. Workers who, in their time of rest, lower the standard of their lives, and relax for the time the nearness of their walk with God, will find themselves in great difficulty how to return again to the place where they can be at the Lord's disposal for any and every service, possible or apparently impossible, pleasing or unpleasing. When "with him" the questions of choice or of possibility do not enter in; with him all is possible: to one who walks with him, all is welcome. "That they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach." In his presence, by his authority; this is the secret of a truly, powerful, fruitful ministry.

"And to have authority to cast out devils." Even to the seventy, the Lord said: "Behold, I have given you authority to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy, and nothing shall in any wise hurt you" (Luke 10: 19). Satan is a conquered foe; conquered not by us, but by the Lord. As long as we are with him, we are with Satan's conqueror. His presence is our authority over all the power of the enemy. "Without Me, or apart from me, ye can do nothing." Immediately before his choice of the twelve, or immediately after, as we follow the chronology of the evangelists Mark or Luke, "a great multitude followed Jesus from Galilee, and from Judea, and from Jerusalem, and from Idumea, and beyond Jordan, and about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, hearing what great things he did, came unto him." He had healed many inasmuch that as many as had plagues pressed upon him that they might touch him. And the unclean spirits, whensoever they beheld him, fell down before him and cried, saying: "Thou art the Son of God." And he charged them that they should not make him known (R. V.). Thus we see his own authority over the kingdom of the enemy had been abundantly manifest; now he would associate his chosen ones with him in the same authority, but it must be always and essentially dependent on their being with him. On the eve of his crucifixion our Lord said to his disciples: "Henceforth I call you not servants, for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth; but I have called you friends for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you. Ye have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain; that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you." Oh, how solemn, how high is the election of our Lord! Chosen, not to assume a position of authority over others, not to be lords over God's heritage, but first and before all things, to bring forth fruit, to manifest in life and walk the fruits of the Spirit, the characteristics of Christ.

ON THE SHORE OF GALILEE.

ONE step, and the only important one Jesus ever made toward the organization of a church, he took at this time, which was about a year and a half after his public ministry commenced. He selected a company of intimate associates, who were to accompany him on his preaching tours and give all their time to him. This was a common practice of the teachers of the day in Greece, and Rome as well as in Palestine. They were practically a class of pupils who should learn of their Master and disseminate his doctrines and perpetuate them after his death. The attitude of the authorities in Christ's case made this arrangement an urgent one. They were evidently determined on silencing him, and if they could do it in no other way, they would find some pretext for putting him to death. Christ, therefore chooses twelve men from among his followers and regularly appoints them as his apostolic family. As we have seen, there were already six, who acknowledged themselves his disciples and had been with him on some of his tours, but their attendance seems to have been irregular, and there were intervals in which they resumed their secular occupations. Now Christ wishes them to abandon their business and devote themselves exclusively to him. These were Peter and his brother Andrew; John and his brother James; Philip; and Nathanael who was also known as Bartholomew, that is the son of Tholomew. To these, Christ now adds six others: Another James whom Luke calls Cleopas, and his brother, who is sometimes called Jude, sometimes Lebbeus, and sometimes Thaddeus; Matthew, who is also called Levi; Thomas, who had the surname of Didymus; Simon whom Mark describes as a Canaanite, but who appears to have been better known as Zelotes, or the Zealot, from his connection with a party uncompromisingly opposed to Roman rule; and Judas Iscariot or the man of Kerioth, who appears to have been the only one of the company who hailed from Judea the southern country. All the others were apparently Galileans. John and James are believed to have been related to Christ, as it is thought their mother, Salome, was Mary's sister. Jude and the other James were also in the family, if, as is contended, their father was Joseph's brother. It is impossible to understand the principle which guided Christ in his selection of these men from the larger company of his followers. They were not learned, nor influential, nor, if we may judge from the questions they put to their Master, were they men of much intelligence, or deep spirituality. John and Peter were the only two who attained much prominence, so far as the record shows. James, who is mentioned in the Acts, was not of the twelve. Paul, who did more for the propagation of Christianity than any of them, was included. The Philip mentioned in Acts was not Philip the Apostle. Clear that the instruments selected were the weakest and one of them Judas utterly bad. If Christianity had not divine it could not have made its way by their efforts.

Calleth whom he would. This call was a serious matter. It meant leaving the comforts of home, of a regular income and prospect of wealth to become a wanderer without any resources but such as Christ could give. Peter had a house and family. James and John had hired servants to work on them; Matthew held a lucrative position and was able to provide a great feast leave all and follow Christ seen change for the worse but they obeyed call. A famous Scotch minister in his good-by to his country parishioners was leaving them to go to Glasgow that he was sorry to go but he consented the invitation to the great city "from the Lord." One of his people "Maybe, may be but I'm thinking if hadn't been a larger salary there, the might ha' called a long time before ha' heard him."

To have power to heal. The work he done required special qualities and he chose the men best fitted for the work. He knew them and he was going to test them with large powers. There is an ancient Jewish tradition that when Moses was keeping the flocks of his father-in-law, a lamb wandered away. Moses longed to see it, saw it at a great distance and followed it. The lamb climbed the mountain, jumped over ditches, went along dangerous places, but ever the shepherd followed. It was a long and toilsome journey. Moses keeping the lamb in sight tried to follow it. At last the lamb stopped at a spring to slake its thirst. Moses let it drink and then seeing it hesitate about its course, he took it up on his shoulder and carried it back to the flock. Afterward when God called him to lead his people Moses was surprised that he should be chosen for the duty, God said that he could be trusted with the duty so safe as the shepherd who had brought back the lamb.

To be with him. Looking back now we can see that no greater privilege could have been offered to any human being than that of being with Christ; yet at that time people, doubtless, thought that these twelve men were making a sacrifice. When the great Philip Henry was a young man and before anyone had any idea how famous he would become, he became acquainted with Miss Matthews, who afterwards became his wife. Her family protested against his marriage when the minister made him an offer. They said that although he was an excellent preacher, a scholar and appeared a very worthy young man, he was quite a stranger. They did not even know where he came from. To which the girl answered: "I know whither he is going and I shall like to go with him."

Judas Iscariot who also betrayed him. In the early part of the reign of Peter the Great of Russia, the Czar had a friend named Lefort, whom he trusted implicitly and whom he found to be faithful and true in all his actions. When Lefort died the Czar's loneliness became unbearable. He grieved for his dead friend and seemed to have lost his right hand. Feeling the urgent necessity of some confidential man near him to supply Lefort's place, he thought him of Menshikoff, an officer who had served with him in the army when he was young. Menshikoff was sent for and installed in Lefort's place. He had ability, was genial, good-humored, skillful in diplomacy, but was without the integrity and fidelity which had made Lefort so valuable. Peter declared that he was ambitious and avaricious. Again and again his misdeeds compelled the Czar to distrust him, but as often the need of a friend the Czar to recall him and then Menshikoff had a new opportunity to betray his master. No kindness, nor confidence, nor reward did Peter spare in trying to lead Menshikoff to him. But he invariably betrayed his secrets. At last in despair he was dismissed and Peter said to Catherine the Czarina, that "Menshikoff was born in a cheat; and if he do not reform he will lose his head." He managed to keep his life, but he died in exile and disgrace.

THE De Credo blood is in fullest flow in the veins of the woman we know as Mrs. Sharpe, when the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is spoken of. She actually wept yesterday in confiding to me the

she feels at hearing so many and good people express doubts the authenticity of the Church's ions with respect to it. I said to-day to my doctor, regard should be paid to what Church has held for all these ies. It is bewildering to listen's talk of the improbability of and the impossibility of that g happened there. What do I about the discovery of a new all of the city which proves the Crucifixion could not have place where the saints of so ages have believed that it did? think what a crash to the faith of lic and Greek Christians if the should come to doubt all the things we are told of while in arling old Church. The free- ing of this so-called Christian e enough to curdle the blood in is heart. For my part I agree dear old Bishop Cheeseman, ges how much better it is to o what is sanctioned by the James and John. Perhaps I lose my temper when the fable is too grotesque. When the subject thus tortured has to do with the death and burial of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ,—uncovering his head in pronouncing the words—"I am dumb. Either the imposture is too blasphemous to be dealt with by human speech, or the faith of those who believe this to be the scene of the events I have referred to, is too holy to be spoken of lightly. When Mrs. Sharpe told me of her desire to pass an hour in devotion in the chapel below, I in which believers have worshipped for almost fifteen hundred years, it merits reverent mention. We try to keep this in mind, and the lesson unexpectedly learned from the usually hypercritical divine just now, as we are arrested every few paces to note this or that holy place.

The stone upon which the Saviour's body lay when anointed for the tomb is near the spot where the Maries stood while men performed the last, sad office, and further away, right under the immense dome of the church, is the so-called Holy Sepulchre. The chapel covering it is tawdry with red marble, gilding and poor paintings. Ever-burning lamps swing from cornice and pillar. We slip off our rubber-shoes before we are permitted to enter, lest common soil be carried into the sacred place. In the ante-chamber to the sepulchre we are shown a rough stone said to be a piece of that rolled from the door of the tomb by the angels; the place where they stood at the disciples' visit is also pointed out. Stooping low, we pass into a small recess—it cannot be called a room—all ablaze with red, yellow and green lights. There must be between forty and fifty of these lamps with shades of different colors, the Holy Sepulchre, after which the Patriarch awaiting in the chamber of the tomb and invisible to the crowd without, passed a lighted torch through the Fire-hole to a priest on the other side. His first care was to light a candle to be sent by a swift horseman to the Church in Bethlehem—and then the multitude pressed upon him, every one with a taper to be ignited at the sacred torch.

"And this is really done still!" we ejaculate.

"The dove does not appear, but the Holy Fire descends at the Greek Easter every year."

"And people still believe that the fire comes down from heaven?"

An English-speaking monk in passing, catches the words.

"And why not?" he interrogates, dryly, rather than fiercely. "All things are possible with God."

Discussion in the circumstances would be the height of indiscretion. Again, taking a hint from Dr. Sharpe's latest lesson, we pass on toward the stairs conducting to the subterranean Chapel of St. Helena. On the way, our notice is called to a dumpy column rising from the marble pavement. I say "column," for want of a fitter word, but it looks more like a raised register or radiator than a monument, and is said to cover the exact centre of the earth.

"Reference is made by those who believe this to Ezekiel, fifth chapter and fifth verse," (David is conscientiously prudent here) "This is Jerusalem; I have set it in the midst of the nations and the countries that are round about her."

"That says nothing of this particular spot. There was nothing here then to designate it, that we have ever heard of."

"Quite so, sir. This is also believed to mark the hole out of which the Almighty took the earth for making Adam."

"What do they think of that story?"

"In my opinion, Adam was never here, sir, but I am not a scholar."

I hearken to the culmination, seated upon a narrow marble bench let into the wall near the top of the steps leading to the Chapel of the Finding of the Cross. By leaning upon the sill of a small square window at a convenient distance above the bench I can look down into a dim cellar, like a tank, badly lighted by two candles set upon what I presently make out to be an altar.

Some where down there, Mrs. Sharpe is kneeling and wrestling in prayer for her husband's obstinate soul. Here, if we heed tradition, sat the aged Empress Helena in the year 326 A. D., and watched the excavations going on, at her order, in quest of the True Cross. She had dreamed, before setting out upon her pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where this precious relic would be found. Three crosses were dug out of the hole down into which I am gazing, and the Empress, the shrewd mother of a shrewder son, bethought herself of a test that should reveal the right relic. A Christian woman of rank lay on her death-bed in Jerusalem. The three exhumed crosses were borne into her room and by touching one of them she was healed. This is the one and only ground, so far as we have been able to discover, for the belief that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre rises above the place of Crucifixion, Etrial and Ascension of our Lord, unless we are to admit the evidence of a church historian of that day who ascribes the building of the church to Constantine.

When we consider the improbability that the crosses upon which died three Jewish peasants, criminals in the eye of the Roman authorities, would be preserved in any way after they had served their ignominious end; the greater improbability that they were buried near the sepulchre of the Nazarene; when we take into account the three centuries during which they thus lay concealed from the knowledge of mankind, and then the manner of the disinterment, one grows thoughtful and distrustful. The students of God's Word who, in trying to identify any locality in or near Jerusalem with the scene of our Lord's Crucifixion without the gate, have more than this one discrepancy to confirm them in the belief that this venerable church does not cover the spot.

raised no objections. I simply answered, "Very well, my dear. You will find me outside when you are ready." I more than suspect,—a queer caroty flush mantling the cheek-bones,—that the sweet soul is now engaged in prayer that my eyes may be opened to see the truth—as it is apparent to her."

With a deepening of respect for a good, if testy man, and more real liking than we had imagined we could ever feel for him in any circumstances, we enter the ancient edifice.

Those indefatigable church builders, the Crusaders, remodelled it in the twelfth century, but there was a sanctuary of some kind here in the fourth, a Church raised by Constantine in commemoration of the discovery by his mother Helena of what she assumed was the true Cross. As the house illuminating a marble altar, six feet long, three wide and two high, set out with the customary altar-furniture, gold vessels, artificial flowers and lace-trimmed altar cloth.

"This," pronounces David, in subdued accents, "is said by tradition to be the tomb of Christ our Lord."

We linger before it for a respectful minute, and at our movement to retire, he continues in the same key, "You will please back out!"

Outside the Chapel of the Angels we are stopped to look at the "Fire-hole." Perhaps we have heard of it before, but as we listen now, the singular tale seems new and incredible on the verge of the twentieth century. A part of the Easter ceremonies of the Greek Church four hundred years ago,—how much earlier we do not know—was the descent of a dove upon the Chapel of RIGHTEOUS POLITICS.

SOME men pride themselves on voting an entire ticket without reference to the qualifications of the nominees. As though a man should go to an apothecary store, and needing one medicine on the shelf, should order the druggist to give him some of all the medicines on that shelf. You tell him there are medicines on that shelf that will do him damage. "O," he says, "that's no difference. I pride myself on the fact when I take one medicine on a shelf I take the whole shelf—rhubarb, calomel, jalap, belladonna, strychnine and jujube paste!" Now, I think, in morals as well as in matters of health, we ought to choose between lozenges and strychnine. I must see who the men personally are. In any city it is no difficult thing to find out all about the candidates. There are people who will tell you all about the candidates, where they live and how they live, what are their morals, where they go to church if at all, what they wear, how much is their income, what they had for breakfast this morning; how much they pay for their boots; whether they pay their butcher's bill promptly; whether they are in debt for the last week's washing; what they drink for a regular beverage—tea, coffee or soda water. There is no place on this continent where it is not easy to find out all about the candidates. But do not take without discount what men of one party think of the nominees of the other party. Do not ask the friends of one candidate what they think of the other candidate. Never vote for a bad man whether he thinks as you do or not. You cannot depend on a bad man to do right. At the first temptation he will fly the track; he will sell out to the enemy; at the moment you are depending on him for a right vote, he will through a new pair of gold spectacles see his duty in the opposite direction. But when I say a good man I do not necessarily apply the religious test. There is many a man wise for the next world who is a fool for this. It is a sad state of things when your vote for a candidate is decided by the church he attends.

Integrity and adaptation are the two qualifications for office. Some men are born for Senatorial honors, and are not at home until they reach Senatorial position; while others have "post mortem" physiognomy. Showing peculiar qualifications for the office of coroner and really enjoying a funeral. The accidents of politics often hurl into office men unfitted for the position. No cruel man should be a jailer; no merciless man should be a sheriff; no man of ungovernable temper should be a policeman. No bribable man should be a legislator. No man unable to take in all the interests of a city should be a Mayor, or of the interests of a State, should be a Governor. Let me counsel, as far as possible, that you abstain from all base personalities. Do not use epithets you will be sorry for after the struggle is over. Do not style the opposing candidates knaves or blasphemers or sots. You gain no votes by abusiveness. Slanders react. My father said that it was political persecution that gave Andrew Jackson such an overwhelming majority. It is human nature to sympathize with the under dog in the fight. Let the contest be open and fair and honorable, though it be persistent. If you put down your robe of Christian character until after the November election, you may never get it on again. A religion that will not help a man to preserve his equipoise during the Autumnal elections is no religion at all.

THE TOILERS.

THERE is nothing so uppermost in my mind as the great struggle for a livelihood that I see going on about me and in all nations. I think of it every day. Here and there is an idler, or a disciple of fashion out on dress parade; but I say to myself, "What gives to these multitudes of people on the streets from seven o'clock in the morning until eleven at night, the earnest look and the weary step?" The majority of them are battling for a livelihood. You see only a man; but perhaps he represents in the contest a wife, a mother, a group of children. To pay his rent, to secure fuel, to clothe the dependents, to educate the household—these are the questions that wrinkle his brow and agitate his heart. Forward in the conflict. Oh, brave man! Not one on the street knows the struggle, but God and angels know, and they are with you in the fight. Those young girls that go over to work at day dawn, so that they may be prompt at their places of toil, severe economy evident in their apparel, supporting a mother at home, and keeping a younger brother at school.

Do not talk to me about Ida Lewis or Grace Darling. These struggling shop girls have a harder oar to pull and will get divine reward though they may receive no medal of earthly approval. It was a great day in England when the wounded heroes came home from the Russian war, and in presence of a vast multitude, Queen Victoria with her own hands distributed the medals marked Sebastopol, Inkermann and Balaklava. Then the band played, and the Englishmen shouted, "God save the Queen!" But it will be a grander day when the King of Heaven and Earth shall greet home the sons and daughters of toil who come up from the thousand battlefields for bread, and wounded and weary and sick and faint and exhausted, they shall be everlastingly discharged from their warfare; while Christ shall say: "Ye suffered with me on earth, now be glorified with me in heaven!"

BETTER SCHOOLS.

GOD speed all reformatory movements, school reform included. Let us rejoice at the advance already made. Compare the qualification of teachers now with those who presided over our school-boy days. It is a wonder that we know anything. We were gadded, and boxed and pulled by the ears, and stood in the corner on one foot, and kept in after school, and given extra lessons to learn. Some of the teachers no doubt were well qualified, but others, I remember, were cross and petulant and impatient and revengeful, and ignorant and filthy. I remember my old teacher used to open the school with prayer, putting one foot over on the chair, and his elbow on his knee, and his hands over his eyes, but his fingers wide open apart to see what went on, and seemed more anxious to note the effect of his prayer in the school-room than the effect of his prayer in heaven. Then the school-house was unshaded in summer weather, and was caught between the loose clapboards in the wintry blast. We all drank out of one tincup, and sat on benches without backs. I have not one pleasant memory of all my school days except that connected with the recess and vacation.

Let us rejoice that the educational opportunities of to-day are so far in advance of what they were in our childhood. Still, the largest room in the world is the room for improvement, and we owe the grand men and women who preside as teachers in our schools better apartments in which to train and develop the young. Children are sometimes thought to be dull when they are only asphyxiated. An overcrowded school-room is a warm invitation to scarlet fever and measles and diphtheria. Money put in school houses is money saved from penitentiaries. The best way to lessen our taxes is to pay more money for the intelligence of the people. There is a style of economy which is the worst extravagance. Good schools tend toward empty almshouses. Knowledge lifts. Ignorance depresses. It is no rare thing to find educated scoundrelism, but to the vast majority of the criminal classes the writing of their own names is a difficult enterprise. When society knows more it will behave better. The newspaper column which discusses the school question should be read through by every citizen, patriot and Christian.

L. M. Sherrow, Sing Sing, N. Y. Did Christ ever actually work at the trade of a carpenter?

The account Mark gives of Christ's visit to Nazareth would imply that he did. The people who were most likely to know, said, according to that Evangelist, "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary?" (Mark 6: 3.)

Reader. — A man having been in State's prison and desiring to begin life anew in a strange neighborhood and to live honestly in future, is afraid that his record will embarrass him. Is he justified in dropping his old name and taking a new one?

There is nothing wrong in his doing so, providing he gets the sanction of the courts, which is always cheerfully given. Otherwise he may be embarrassed by the change of name, and may under some circumstances be involved in perjury.

G. C. Requa, Kewanee, Ill. Can a person who is not a Christian read the Bible intelligently?

Certainly; many have done so and derived benefit from it. He would be likely to miss the deep spiritual meaning of many passages and there are some which the Christian enjoys and treasures, which would be almost incomprehensible to one who had no experience to shed light upon them. An intelligent man, however, could appreciate the greater part of the Bible and would admire its philosophy, poetry and literary beauty.

A. F. Moseback, Bethlehem, Pa. 1. Was Agrippa sincere or mocking when he told Paul Acts 26: 28 that he was almost persuaded to become a Christian? 2. Was not Joseph egotistical in foretelling his future greatness by his dreams?

1. The Revised Version makes an important change in the passage. It reads: "With little persuasion thou wouldst fain make me a Christian." That rendering is equivalent to saying that much more than Paul's argument would be necessary to make Agrippa a Christian. Paul's reply, however, seems to indicate that he thought Agrippa was moved, and was not mocking. 2. Joseph does not seem to have done any foretelling; he simply told his dreams and his brothers interpreted them, as it was easy to do. He was indiscreet in telling the dreams, and his father reproved him for it, but it must be remembered he was only seventeen years old at the time, and was probably elated by the dreams, for in that day a great deal of significance was attached to dreams.

H. M. Black, Salina, Kan. Has a star been seen, whose distance is so great that its light requires more than six thousand years to reach the earth?

The speed of light is reckoned to be 186,000 miles in a second so that it would travel more than sixteen thousand million miles in a single day. Multiply this by 365 and the result by six thousand and you have the distance in miles of any such star. Astronomers compute the distance of stars by measuring the parent change in their position in relation to earth and the sun at different times of the year, just as you might estimate the distance of a fixed object seen from a railroad train by time in which it is in the line of vision. Astronomers have been able to measure in way the distance of the nearer stars. The nearest measured, is one in the constellation the Centaur and if the measurement is correct, it would require three years and four months for its light to reach the earth. The most distant star visible to the naked eye is computed to be thirty-six times that distance. This light has been about 120 years in reaching earth. Beyond these are the vast number of stars far away to be seen by the naked eye, but visible through the telescope. It is obvious their distance is too great to be measured any approach to accuracy because they are so far away that the length of the earth's orbit is but as a point in comparison. These we can only suppose that their light have been, and probably has been, thousands of years in reaching us.

H. M. Waller, Williamsburg, Va. Is there a planation of the discrepancy between the nineteenth verses of Exodus 9? In the verse it is stated that all the cattle of Egypt and subsequently Pharaoh is advised to, cattle under cover?

The Hebrew word translated "all" is definite as the word, all. It is often used in sense of general, or the bulk. In this instance the writer of Exodus would have used the word if the slaughter was so great as to leave comparatively few cattle living. That is or planation. A second is that there may have been, and probably was, an interval of some months between the plagues, during which cattle in large numbers were imported. If so, and his people really lost all their by the murrain, they would lose no time in getting a fresh supply, which they could eas in a few weeks from the large flocks on the Goshen, whose cattle were not affected by murrain.

Rev. B. Y. Logan, Iamborn, Kan. 1. How is the body of the Pharaoh of the Exodus on exhibition, when he was drowned in the Red Sea? Was it fished up? If so, by whom? 2. Did Christ say to the man who addressed him as "Good Master," "there is none good but that is God?" 3. Why do you delay so long in answering questions addressed to the Mail Bag?

1. We have not heard that the body of Pharaoh of the Exodus is on exhibition. I do not think it is. It is, however, improbable that he was drowned in the Red Sea. The general belief is that he sent his army to fight and remained behind himself. If, as is usually supposed, that Pharaoh was Menephtah, there are inscriptions made by him recording his actions at a period subsequent to the Exodus. The passage in the Psalms describing him would be such an expression as would use about a king whose power was broken there. 2. That God was the source of goodness, and the goodness of men was really an emanation from him. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE LIBERATED SLAVES.

RECENT cable dispatches report an event which has started the whole of Egypt and has caused a sensation through Europe. It was the arrest of three Pashas, one of whom is President of the native slave Council, on the charge of being concerned in the purchase of six Soudanese women as slaves. There was no question of their guilt for three of the women were in the President's house, but every man was astonished at the boldness of men holding the highest offices in Egyptian government. As far back as a decree was issued by the Egyptian government prohibiting the purchase and importation of slaves from Egypt, and a Bureau was organized with an English officer at its head to enforce the decree. At that time slave-dealing was very prevalent in Egypt, and the Bureau succeeded in suppressing it as far as the general and ordinary trade was concerned. Last December the legislative Council passed a resolution and the abolition of the Bureau on the ground that slave-dealing in Egypt had ceased. The demand was ignored, because it was suspected that the native aristocracy, including the Khedive himself, were secretly engaged in the traffic. The action has now been verified. Abdul Bey, a confidential agent of the President of the Council, recently informed Schaefer, who is now the chief of the Slave Trade Bureau, that six women had been purchased in the Soudan and brought to Egypt in violation of the law. The President of the Council he said, had three of them and intended to sell them if he could find a purchaser and the other three were in the hands of other Pashas whom he named. Schaefer made no distinction on account of the high rank of the offenders, but simply seized them and the brokers and others implicated and put them on trial for breaking the law. The Pashas escaped punishment owing to the obsequiousness of the Egyptian court, but the minor offenders were sentenced to imprisonment with hard labor. The six women have been taken to Home for Liberated Slaves which has been established near Cairo and is supported by philanthropists in England. It may be hoped that the arrest will prove a salutary lesson to the Pashas and incidentally to the Khedive, who is probably the worst offender. They need to learn that the men make the laws and the men who are armed with the execution of the laws are not to be criminals or connive at crime. A curious coincidence that certain officers in our own land should be just now fully learning the same lesson. Even in this world the wrongdoer does not find that high position always protects him from punishment and in the next world it never does. (Rom. 2: 21-23.)

A Novel Dispossess Action.

The keeper of a furnished-room house in New York adopted a novel method of getting rid of objectionable tenants a few days ago. She had rented apartments to a man and his wife who afterwards she wished to get out of her house. She accordingly gave them notice to leave, but they ignored it. After several more emphatic and peremptory requests to them to vacate the premises, she fixed a day when as she told them they must go. The tenants, however, refused to leave their apartments, and as either the man or his wife was always in the rooms, it was impossible to lock the doors and keep them out. The housekeeper knew by experience something of the slow and uncertain action of the courts, so she would not take her lawyer's advice to get a dispossess order. Instead, she adopted a method of her own. She bought a quantity of sulphur and sprinkled it on a pan of live coals which she put in the room immediately under the room occupied by the undesirable tenants. In a short time the upper part of the house was filled with the fumes of the sulphur and the tenants were almost suffocated. They bore it as long as they could and then beat a retreat. The housekeeper then possessed herself of the rooms and refused to permit them to re-enter. She was elated by her success. She said sulphur fumes were a great purifier. The idea was suggested to her by a former experience when her house was purged by sulphur of the germs of an infectious disease. The principle of her method may be commended to newly converted persons who are often distressed by their minds and hearts being occupied by the evil thoughts which once they harbored. If they are as determined to be rid of them as the housekeeper was to be rid of her undesirable tenants, they will succeed. Satan, who suggests them, will never stay when his former home is pervaded by the purifying influence of the Holy Spirit, who is given to all who ask for it. (Luke 11: 22.)

A Runaway Schooner.

A press dispatch from Halifax, N. S., says that a schooner has gone off to sea from that port without a soul on board. She left Halifax with a valuable cargo under the command of Captain Hadly and a complete crew. In the gale of October 10, she was driven out of her course and struck on a rock off the coast of Canso. The captain, believing that it would be impossible to get her off, and that if he did get her off, that the hull was so badly injured that she would sink, left the ship, and, with his crew, landed at Canso in boats. The schooner was then being violently swayed to and fro by the force of the waves, and seemed likely to be beaten to pieces. But during the night, in one of her lurches, she came clear of the rock and floated into deep water. When morning came she was seen going out to sea with all sails set. A steamer was sent in chase of her, but the schooner had a long start and a high wind was blowing, which carried her swiftly to the open Atlantic. The steamer followed all day, but was unable to overtake her. When night fell the steamer gave up the chase and returned. The schooner was then going toward the mid-Atlantic, all her sails drawing and the foam dashing high at her prow. Her cargo will make her a rich prize for any one who can capture her and bring her in. Infinitely greater prizes are waiting for Christian workers, who may bring into the haven of God's mercy men and women equipped with fine talents and generous natures, who are wandering on life's ocean without divine guidance. (Daniel 12: 3.)

Diamonds in the Teeth.

Among the novel freaks of fashion is one that is traveling eastward from the Pacific coast. A lady who arrived in New York from San Francisco last week has recently disposed of her practice as a dentist in that city. She says that her speciality is fixing diamonds in the teeth of her patients, and that she has done an extensive business in that way in both San Francisco and Chicago. In many Western cities dentists are doing the same thing. The diamonds are set in decayed teeth instead of gold filling, and when artificial teeth are made, diamonds are inserted either in the crown or in the teeth. The dentist has been called on occasionally to drill a hole in a sound tooth to put a diamond in, when her patient was fond of the stones. The operation is a costly one, as the diamond must be of the purest water, and has to be skillfully fixed so as not to hurt the lips or cheek. At first the novelty was not attractive, but when a lady saw a diamond sparkling in the mouth of a friend or rival, she soon wanted one and did not rest till she secured one. Like many other modes of adding to personal attractions, this is restricted to the rich; but he died on the day following his admission to the hospital. The doctors there think he was slightly demented. It is easy to believe that, when we realize that he appears to have loved his money more than his life. There are, however, many people for whom the same excuse cannot be made, who commit the greater folly of loving their money more than eternal life. (Luke 12: 23.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Attention of Our Readers is Particularly directed to the Premium announcement in the first column of page 697 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, especially to the combination offers at the foot of the column.

Mr. D. L. Moody has Accepted the Invitation of the Churches of Lowell, Mass., to hold services in that city soon. The date is to be mutually agreed upon.

A Japan Missionary Says that all Forms of educational and evangelistic work temporarily suffer because of the war with China. Many forms of business are at a standstill, and churches find it difficult to collect money for their expenses.

The Semi-Annual Meeting of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church is to be held at Middletown, Conn., this day. They will fill out the calendar of the spring conferences, and will also decide upon a successor to the late Dr. Peck as Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society.

Rev. Charles L. Jackson, of Boston, is in charge of a series of united meetings in New Bedford, Mass. Fourteen churches are working together in the movement, and such a work of grace is going on as the city has never before witnessed. Mr. Jackson is assisted in the musical part of the exercises by Mr. Greenwood, who was formerly associated with B. Fay Mills.

During Five Years that the Chicago Auxiliary of the American Tract Society has been in operation, an immense amount of evangelizing work has been done by its agents. Last year, at a cost of $68,400, four colporteurs have made nearly 9,000 visits in Chicago alone, and through the literature they have put in circulation have reached a large army of Bohemians, Poles, Italians, Greeks, Germans, and Irish.

The Excitement in Spain over the consecration of Senor Calvera as Protestant Bishop of Madrid is in no way subsiding, and the intervention of the Papal Nuncio in the matter has now given rise to a political question in connection with it. The Papal Nuncio contends that it is illegal as well as sacrilegious.

A Sunday Creche has been established in connection with a Presbyterian Church in Cleveland, O. A few ladies accustomed to the management of infants attend every Sunday at a room adjacent to the church and take care of any children who may be brought while their mothers attend the service.

Sincere Sympathy will be felt by all Christian people with Rev. Ross Taylor, son of Bishop William Taylor, of Africa, in the terrible calamity which has befallen him. On Oct. 22 his house at Nyack caught fire and was totally destroyed. The flames made such headway before they were discovered that Mr. and Mrs. Taylor succeeded in escaping only by jumping through the second story windows. The saddest part of the affliction is that four of their children perished in the burning building. May the God of all Consolation be the Comforter of the bereaved parents in their sore trouble!

The Good Work Carried on During the Summer in the Wyoming and Lackawanna Valleys of Pennsylvania is still bearing fruit in addition to the churches. It commenced under the labors of Rev. Thomas Swan of West Pittston, and was carried on by Mr. Moody, Major Whittle and other evangelists.

Mr. Henry Varley's Many Friends in this country will be glad to learn that his meetings in Glasgow have been accompanied by a work of grace. Many Christians have flocked to the Waterloo Rooms for the afternoon Bible-readings, and listened eagerly to Mr. Varley. The evening meetings were very large, especially on Sundays.

The Literary World Has Suffered a Severe loss in the death of Prof. James A. Froude, an eminent historian. Mr. Froude died on Oct. 20, after a long illness. He was a most painstaking and industrious worker, sparing no effort to get original documents on which to construct his historical works. He was thus enabled to set in a new light several prominent names in history. He rendered the world a conspicuous service by his merciless exposure of the knavery and double dealing of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in the sixteenth century. One of Mr. Froude's best-known works is his biography of Carlyle, a whom he was a devoted friend. He used to say that Carlyle had saved him from infidelity.

A Farewell Service was Held Recently in the Judson Memorial Church, New York, to bid good-by to a number of missionaries who were setting out for their fields of labor. Among the missionaries present were Rev. C. E. Burdette and Mrs. Burdette, who have been laboring among the Assamese since 1883; Mrs. P. E. Moore, whose field is the Miskitoes of Assam, and whose appointment dates from 1880; Miss Reece, who is under appointment to Assam; Miss Darmstadt, whose destination is Nellore, and Miss C. E. Righter, missionary to Kinshua, China. With Mr. Burdette was a bright little Koro girl, who had been rescued from the savagery of her tribe by the missionaries and is being educated.

Rich, yet Starving.

An aged man was found a few days ago at Kingsbridge, N. Y., who had a little fortune in his pockets, yet was on the verge of death by starvation. He was in an empty outhouse on the high road and had evidently tramped a long distance. A policeman passing the hovel late at night heard his groans and, going in to investigate, saw the old man on the floor. His clothes were worn to rags and his boots were full of holes and were covered by a dilapidated pair of overshoes. He said that he had eaten nothing for several days, and being very weak and tired he had turned into the outhouse to rest, when he was seized with cramps. The policeman summoned an ambulance from Ferndham and the old man was conveyed to the hospital there. The doctors said he was suffering for lack of food and he revived after nourishment had been given to him. When he was undressed and put to bed there was general surprise at the contents of the pockets of his tattered garments. In one was a large amount in bills; in another, the title deeds to several pieces of property; and his other pockets were filled with dimes, nickles and pennies which he had evidently obtained by begging. With all this property upon his person he had gone without food and had so undermined his constitution by fasting, that

CONSTANTINOPLE'S DAY OF TERROR.

Rev. Albert H. Long of Roberts College Graphically Describes the Earthquake—The City Rose and Fell like a Sea and then Came the Crash, demolishing Hundreds of Dwellings and Bazars Possibly 500 Killed—Relieving the Destitute.

LETTERS from the stricken Turkish capital indicate that there is no abatement in the general distress and suffering caused by the recent earthquakes which laid a great portion of the city in ruins. The Constantinople newspapers devote a large amount of space in every issue to the progress of the relief work, and are profuse in their grateful acknowledgments of the timely help received from other lands. As the cold season is at hand, the problem of housing the thousands of destitute, now in tents, becomes urgent. The Relief Commission, together with the missionaries, the American College and various other agencies now at work, find it impossible to respond to all the calls for help and could not do so even if they had ten times the funds now at their disposal for that purpose.

One of the most thrilling accounts of the great earthquake yet received in this country, is that written by Rev. Albert H. Long, LL. D., of Roberts College, Constantinople, to a Boston journal. Dr. Roberts writes:

"The day was beautifully clear, the air balmy and unusually pure, with nothing whatever of that murkiness and that peculiar electrical condition attendant upon what is popularly termed 'earthquake weather.' No brighter day had been seen through the whole season. The gangs of workmen upon the buildings, the porters and dock laborers upon the quays, and all busy men wherever toiling in associated labor had stopped work, for, according to the custom of the country, the welcome call of 'paidos' had sounded forth from sturdy lungs calling 'from labor to refreshment.' Some had already finished their repast of bread and olives and had stretched their weary limbs under the shade of some archway or wall for a quiet sleep. The shopkeepers in the bazars were also either dozing or eating their frugal lunch in some retired corner. The muezzins from the lofty minarets of the mosque were still crying out to the four quarters of the heavens the call to prayer. 'Eight bells' had already struck some minutes before on the foreign shipping in the harbor. It was high noon. Local mean time showed twenty two minutes past twelve.

"Suddenly there was heard a peculiar Rumbling, Grating and Grinding Noise, compared by some to the sound of a railway train passing through a tunnel, by others to the sound of a steamboat blowing off steam under water; but after all a sound of such unique character as to make it always remembered when once heard. This terrifying noise was followed by a rising and sinking of the ground, such as one feels under foot upon the deck of a ship when riding the crest of a wave. Then came a terrible vibratory motion or shaking, as though some mighty vindictive force were shaking the earth as a terrier does a rat. Along with this came the crash of falling walls, the crumbling of chimneys, and the falling in of vaulted structures centuries old, clouds of dust, groans and cries from the wounded, piercing shrieks of women and children, and the roar of an insane crowd calling out in most of the languages of Europe and Asia and madly rushing for the few open spaces, for the bridges and for the steamboats moored alongside of them. The old and the feeble are trampled under foot; from fright; some become violently insane, and others are hysterically sobbing, laughing and crying.

Strong Men Fall Down Dead

"All this change was effected in less time than it takes to read this imperfect description of it. The actual shocks, three or four in succession, spread over about ten minutes, did not, perhaps, all taken together, occupy more than one minute. The exhibition of force, however, in these few seconds, is such as to cause the stoutest heart to quail. The minds of all are more or less dazed. Grateful thanksgiving for merciful preservation arises from many devout hearts, while anxious supplication is on many lips long unaccustomed to prayer. Muslim, Jew and Christian, Greek Orthodox, Armenian, Roman Catholic and Protestant.

All are Awe-Stricken

in presence of the invisible, resistless force. "The next thing was to find out who were missing and what was the extent of the damage done. Naturally enough, the panic prevented all exact estimate and caused the wildest and most extravagant exaggerations of the results of the catastrophe. It soon became apparent that the seismic movement, while extending throughout the whole city and the whole extent of the Bosphorus, diminished in intensity toward the north. The Prince's Islands in the sea of Marmora, suffered severely. A line drawn from those islands, striking Stamboul at the quarter called Koum Kapu, and passing the Hippodrome through the Grand Bazar and along the high ridge to the Adrianople Gate, would indicate the line of the greatest disturbance, but there is hardly a street in Stamboul or in Galata where there are no ruined buildings.

"The heaviest blow to the business of the city is undoubtedly in the destruction of a large portion of the Grand Bazar. The entrance to this bazaar is through massive gates from the principal streets. These are in charge of special porters, and are closed at night. Property of an enormous value is thus left in the confidential charge of these faithful guardians.

"When the fatal shock came and the stones from the vaulted domes and the glass from those roofs began to

from the mortar and plaster, one may imagine the panic which seized the thousands of people who at that time were within that structure. Fortunately the number of gates allowed of exit in different directions, but there are many places from which more than one hundred yards of distance would have to be traversed before a place of exit would be found. The loss of life must have been terrible; but its extent will probably never be known.

"The circumstances were very peculiar. The task before the authorities was an exceedingly difficult one. There were diamonds and jewels and objects of great value which had been abandoned by their owners, all lying open at the mercy of thieves.

Cries For Help Were Sounding

from the wounded and those imprisoned under the arches of the ruined structures. "One man gave me with apparent exactitude the number of lives lost as 134; another, with equal pretensions to accuracy gave me the number as 1,127. Perhaps the average of these two might not be far out of the way. Some of the dead bodies taken out had quantities of diamonds in their pockets, but they were their own; they were not stolen.

"This earthquake will stand in the history of the city as the fourteenth earthquake which the city has experienced since the first, which occurred during the reign of the Roman Emperor, Gratian, in the year 376 A. D., and which lasted nearly an entire year. During one month we have now had about forty shocks. The continued tension of nerve, the uncertainty and the feeling of utter helplessness, affect all classes of the community and Paralyze Almost All Business.

"The different European communities, business firms and banks are sending in handsome contributions for the relief of the destitute. The Sultan and his ministers have generously contributed to the same object."

Responses to the appeal of The American Relief Committee continue to come in from many different parts of the Union. It is specially desired that those who may be disposed to help in this most deserving work of humanity, should forward their contributions with as little delay as possible to

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which will acknowledge their receipt. Among the contributors to the Fund during the past week is Hon. Oscar S. Straus, ex-United States Minister to Turkey. The contributions are as follows:

Down the Alps to Death.

Andreas Seiler's Rashness Sacrificed His Own Life and That of His Guide.

HE history of pine adventure, full of dark and gloomy tragedies. In a recent work, "Alps Revisited," Edward Whyper reviews some of the difficulties of Alpine climbing in Switzerland, and recalls several of the more striking occurrences to travelers in recent years. Chief among those peaks that have mournful history of brave lives sacrificed to recklessness and the love of perilous adventure, is the Matterhorn. It has been the custom among Alpine mountaineers to tie themselves to each other with ropes, when ascending or descending steepest glaciers, or the most precipitous rocks. But even with the greatest care this precaution sometimes fails and travelers are hurled from crag to crag from slippery glacier to yawning crevasse there to meet a swift death, or at best to mangled and bleeding for hours until help arrives.

One of the most painful Alpine disasters occurred in the fall of last year, and is not intelligently explained for the first time Mr. Whyper. A party of five men started from the village of Breuil to ascend the Matterhorn, Andreas Seiler and O. Gysi being the tourists, and Johann F. ner, Joseph Taugwalder and Louis Moeser the guides. Biener, who was an experienced climber, was tied to Seiler by a rope. The rule, in ascending or descending difficult places, is that the guide or the most climber shall proceed a short distance, the others, who are tied to him, stand still until he has secured a firm foothold, a stout clutch on the rocks with his hook; then the others move up to him, by one, each in succession, being careful to fix feet or hook firmly before another moves a step, so that if one should slip the other will be able to hold him fast by the rope. The lives of all thus depend upon careful observance of this rule, and on the strength of the rope. Mr. Gysi, with Taugwalder and Moeser, were proceeding slowly, Biener and Seiler having gone ahead. Seiler was young, impetuous and inexperienced. He had been warned repeatedly to obey guide implicitly. He was tied to Biener but doubtless did not scrupulously observe the rule of not moving forward until guide had obtained a foothold, and the result of this neglect cost two lives. Most while the guide was still in motion, Seiler slipped, and Biener was unable to hold him. In an instant they were whirled into air and shot downwards with frightful locality. Mr. Gysi, the companion of Seiler with whom he had made the journey to Switzerland for the purpose of climbing the Matterhorn, relates the sequel:

"We pressed up close to the rock, listened, when the two shot past us, were all three close together, and Moeser could have touched them with his axe. I see them still—they were photographed in my mind. They were tied together. Biener passed close to us, his back downward, his head well bent up, as if he were preparing for a sudden shock. Biener flew out against the blue sky, and the rope stretched tightly between them." They fell on to the Glacier du Lion, and the bodies were recovered they were tied together. How the accident happened will never be known, as no one saw it slip. I am inclined to think that Seiler, climbing at the same time as Biener, instead of waiting until he had a foothold Seiler's haste and disobedience to orders which cost him and his companion lives, find a spiritual parallel in the caution of many persons who, trusting in their own strength and wisdom rather than in heed to Divine direction, find themselves drifting to eternal ruin, and not probably dragging others with them. They obeyed the voice of God and wall in all the ways He commanded, it would have been "well with them" (Jer. 7:2) but disobedience, and the mad ambition to substitute human for divine wisdom in affairs of life, as Seiler rashly substituted his inexperience for the better judgment of the guide, inevitably tend to destruction.

PREMIUM ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has succeeded in arranging for a remarkable series of premiums. First of all, of course, is the International Teacher's Bible, with all the Helps and Maps, set in by type. Divinity circuit binding overlying at the ends, with red under gold edges. This eminently serviceable and pretty Bible is again offered, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at $2. When ordering please mention Premium Offer: B-Five.

Next in order comes that most beautiful Bible known as the International Emergent Teacher's Bible, London Clear Type Edition, leather bound and leather lined, with silk book-mark and silk head-bands and silk sewed. There were times when a Bible like this would cost $8. To-day it cannot be bought everywhere even at $5; THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers it, together with a year's subscription, at $3. This book will last a lifetime. When ordering, mention Premium Offer: B-Three.

We also continue to offer Dr. Talmage's most marvelous book, "From Manger to Throne," which has proved of infinite value, to tens of thousands of people, presenting it does a new view of the life of our Saviour, magnificently illustrated, with many pictures based on photos brought from Palestine by Dr. Talmage, while journeying in the Holy Land with a view to gathering material for this, his latest and greatest work, "From Manger to Throne" with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. Mention Premium Offer: B-Four.

Next to a Teachers' Bible, the "Gospel Hymns" sung by Moody and Sankey in his great evangelistic services throughout America and England, are dearest to many a Christian's heart. Never before has it been possible to secure these 739 Hymns, constituting the books usually known as Gospel Hymns 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 all in one volume, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, having succeeded in obtaining a large edition of the marvelously soul-stirring hymns in combined form, without a duplicate and without an omission, printed from large type and set to music, and beautifully bound in cloth, with red edges and gilt. A doxology hymn has never been put on the market, and these "Six volumes of Sankey Song, complete in One," are offered to subscribers with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. If you are entirely pleased, send it back, and we will refund your money. Messrs. Moody and Sankey in commending the volume say:

"The hymns in this book have been greatly blessed and to many in our meetings as well as outside of the Church. May they in this combined form continue to give the blessing of Him to whose honor and glory they have been sung in this and other lands."

This very desirable Premium contains about 700 pages, each page measuring 5 1/2 inches. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-Two.

Finally, we offer Dr. Talmage's great book, "The Pathway of Life," a large edition of which has been specially prepared for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Talmage kindly consenting to waive all claims to royalty. This great book containing 544 pages, having for a frontispiece a picture of Dr. Talmage recently taken in Australia, embellished by 200 beautiful engravings, in an exceedingly handsome binding of cloth and gold, and sent out into the world to make it better and more useful and more serviceable, offered in connection with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $2. The book weighs three pounds and measures, when open, from tip to tip 9x15 inches. This book has been read with interest by Her Majesty Queen Victoria, ex-President Harrison, Major-Gen. O.O. 1. There is a land be-yond the stars, Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!
2. The cit-y of our God is there, Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!
3. We lift our eyes, by faith, and see, Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!

Be-yond the sun-set's crim-son bars,—Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!
Its jas-per walls with beau-ty fair, Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!
Where Christ Him-self the light shall be, Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!

A land of peace with-out al-loy; Of joy be-yond all earth-ly joy;
Its gates of pearl like sil-ver gleam, Its skies with fade-less sun-light beam,
There songs of praise glad hearts shall sing; The ra-diant air with mu-sic ring;

And naught its calm can e'er de-stroy,—Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!
And thro' it rolls life's scrys-tal stream, Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!
Each voice pro-claim our Sav-iour, King, Glo-ry Land, bright Glo-ry Land!

BRING IT TO JESUS.

BRING it all to Jesus,
My life, my hope, my care,
Whatever seems most precious
I bring, and leave it there.
My life that he may mould it,
My hopes, to be fulfilled
Just as he deems the wisest,
Though not as I had willed.

My care, for present welfare,
For future, and for friend;
I've tried in vain to bear it,
Now anxious fears shall end.
What though it cost a struggle?
He suffered much for me;
Shall I endure no sorrow
For him who died for me?

The way may be most lonely,
The pathway bleak and bare,
Yet, sometime, through God's mercy,
Though how, I'm not aware,—
The loss of life's fair treasures,
I mourn with bitter pain,
May, when I see more clearly Perchance, prove highest gain.

HOME-CALL.

IT matters not—the manner of our going;
Sooner or later comes the Master's call.
In summer's sunshine, or in winter's blow-ing,
The message comes to all.

Perchance our last farewell we may betaking
In calm communion with a loving heart;
Or in fierce winds and sudden waves high breaking
Our spirits may depart.

It matters not, if only we are ready,
Doing his will, accepted by his grace,
Bearing the banner of our great hope steady,
And standing in our place.

It matters not—the way of life's conclusion,
If by redeeming love we are possessed.
In deepest hush or wildest storm's con-fusion—
The Father knoweth best.

ANGELS UNAWARES.

IN the hours of morn and even,
In the noon and night,
Trooping down they come from heaven,
In a noiseless flight,
To guide, to guard, to warn, to cheer us,
'Mid our joys and cares,
All unseen are hovering near us,
Angels unawares.

O faint hearts! what consolation
For us here below,
That angelic ministration
Guides us where we go.
Every task that is before us
Some blest spirit shares;
Watchful eyes are ever o'er us,
Angels unawares.

TIMES IN PARALLEL.

Points of Resemblance Between this Age and the Antediluvians.

FURTHER points of resemblance between this age and that of the Antediluvian are found as we examine the ancient record. One of these is the relation of the sexes. The sacred chronicler makes space for but few of the characteristics of that early time those the most prominent; but among them he mentions the evil that was caused by the sensitiveness of men to the beauty of the women.

The names of their women indicate voluptuous beauty of person, not the graces of the inner man—Adah, "the adorned;" Zillah, "the shadow" of delight; Naamah, "the lovely" (Genesis 4: 9-22). The arts of civilization (which men fancy will elevate the world at last to moral perfection) and secular enjoyments advanced side by side with sensuality, violence, and God-defying arrogance. Lamech, the polygamist, relying on his son Tubalcain's recent invention of metal weapons, embodied in song (in Hebrew parallelism) his self-confident assurance of power to revenge himself, if assailed:

Adah and Zillah who as women feared for his life on their account [Gen. 12: 12, 13] in that lawless age hear my voice,
Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech;
For surely I slay a man for my wound i.e., if he wound me.
And a young man for my stripe i.e., if he inflict stripes on me.
For Cain is avenged sevenfold, but Lamech seven and seventy fold.

He evidently believed more in his own material powers than in the might of God; just as in the last days Antichrist shall deify material "force" whilst he sets God at nought (see Dan. 11: 36-38: "He shall honor the God of forces.") So in Job 12: 6, the Hebrew, "They make a god of their own hand.") The same godless vauntings of material forces characterize our age. Witness, as a sample, the following sneer at God's providence, "Providence only follows its usual rule of siding with the large battalions."

These words of Lamech were some of those "hard speeches which ungodly sinners spoke against him," and for which Enoch at the time foretold that "the Lord will come to convict and to execute judgment upon them" (Jude 14, 15). In our age there are similarly the "great words" of so-called scientific men who know not God, nor his word, nor themselves, in denying his providence and his creative and miraculous interpositions in the kingdoms of nature and of grace, and his personal coming again. The very words of the antediluvian cavillers against Jehovah (Job 22: 15-17), as though his service were profitless, and prayer to him an unmeaning soliloquy, are again being taken up in these last days, as foretold by Malachi 3: 13-15. One end of the coming of the Lord is to confute all such self-sufficient infidel reasoning. "Now we call the proud happy; yea, they that work wickedness are set up"—but—"Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts. But unto you that fear my name, shall the Sun of righteousness arise."

Our Lord, in characterizing the people before the flood, mentions their "marrying and giving in marriage," evidently referring to their marrying merely to gratify the flesh, instead of "in the Lord." They whose calling was to be "the salt of the earth" lost their spiritual "savor" by marriages with those whose recommendation was that "they were fair," not godly. They "saw" with the lust of the eye, and then "took all which they chose" by the lust of the flesh and fancy, not faith. Then, at this point, it was that universal corruption set in, the prelude of universal destruction.

"The salt" having "lost its savor" is "cast out and trodden under foot by men." The Church having lost its spirituality by conformity to the world is, by retribution in kind, given up to the world to trample upon and cast out. A last testimony was given by Enoch and Noah; and when it was rejected, then both corrupted Church and world are judged by God. In our days the Church is apostatizing by breaking down the barriers between her and the world. Therefore universal corruption must ensue, and consequently Divine judgment.

PREACHING CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Nov. 11. II. Timothy 4: 1-10.

EVERY man may be a preacher of Christ, though he may never speak from the pulpit. No sermon is so powerful as that of an earnest consistent Christian life. If a vote of Christian men and women were taken, it would be found that they are indebted more to the influence of a godly mother and father than to all the sermons they have heard or read. Character tells more than words. A man or woman who is really living for God and is intent on serving Christ and winning souls for him, is the centre of potent force. The family, the circle of friends, the whole neighborhood, is affected by the presence and life of such a person and so Christ is preached. But we must not under-rate the importance of the pulpit. It is a divinely appointed office. "It has pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." Some preachers, however, seemed to have misread the passage, for they have given themselves to foolish preaching, which is quite a different thing. In the passage selected for the topic, Paul predicts this plague of the pulpit, from which we are now suffering. Popular preaching is little likely to be honest, Gospel truth; and the converse is true for such preaching is not popular. Whether, as in the authorized version, the preachers have itching ears greedy for praise and craving adulation; or whether, as in the Revised Version, it is the people who have itching ears, craving fine meaningless phrases and oratorical display, the result is equally deplorable. No mission could be more useful than that of showing how Christianity should affect nineteenth century life, but of that the pulpit has generally little to say. Much is said of Jewish customs and of a dispensation that has happily passed away, but of the duties of Christian life, except that of liberal giving, the pulpit says little. Yet the Gospel has not lost its power. Wherever a preacher resists the temptation to declaim and please his hearers by sensational utterances, and is content to forget himself in presenting his Master, conversions take place and Christian people are eager to work for Christ. There are churches to-day which are centres of spiritual life, which could not be extinguished without a whole city suffering. In these churches there is Gospel preaching, aggressive movement, Christian activity, far-reaching philanthropy, and an influence goes from pulpit to pew and from the pew to the office and the store and the tenement house, elevating and brightening lives of toil and drudgery. Thus Christ is preached and the people bless him for what is done in his name. They see Christ in his people.

FOUR STATE PRESIDENTS.

On this page we publish four portraits which will interest all members of Christian Endeavor Societies. They are portraits of the Presidents of the Unions in the four States of Vermont, Maine, Illinois and Rhode Island. All four are laymen and are conspicuous for their energy and administrative capacity. It is one of the advantages of young people's societies that they afford an opportunity for such men to use their gifts in the service of Christ with benefit to the Church and the rising generation.

Mr. Henry H. Spooner, who is President of the Illinois Christian Endeavor Union, is a native of Connecticut, but has lived in Chicago since attaining his majority. He entered the service of a well-known hardware firm in that city and was promoted from time to time until he is now a member of the firm. He has been active in Christian Endeavor work from the beginning of the movement and in 1880 became President of the Society connected with the Congregational Church of Ridgeland, in which suburb of Chicago he made his home. Two years ago the Chicago Christian Endeavor Union elected him its President and his success in that office has now led to his election as President of the Union of the whole State.

Mr. Edward G. Osgood, who is President of the Vermont Union, is the youngest of the group, being only twenty-nine years old. He is a native of North Andover, Mass., but has lived in Vermont since his sixth year. He early distinguished himself by his mechanical genius and and was chairman of the County Union and Vice-President of the State Union. On the resignation of the President last year he was the unanimous choice of the Christian Endeavorers of the State for the Presidential office.

The fourth member of the group is Mr. Oscar J. Morse, President of the Rhode Island Christian Endeavor Union. Mr. Morse is an influential business man and a member of the Society of Friends. He was born at Union Village, R. I., in 1857, and gained his education in the schools there and at the Friends' School at Providence. He took an active interest in the young people's society of the Friends which was at first called The Young Friends' Christian Fellowship Union and was the first president of the one associated with his meeting. He subsequently became President of the same Union of all New England. In 1892 at the Friends' yearly meeting at Newport, he strongly advocated the change of name to Christian Endeavor and affiliation with the United Society. His proposal was carried and he is now President of the inter-denominational Society of his State.

THE B. Y. P. U. ANNIVERSARIES.

Three important anniversaries have been held recently in connection with the Baptist Young Peoples' Union. One of these was a celebration by the German Unions of the Central Conference, comprising the States of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Kentucky and Ohio, which

Church at Bellows Falls, Vt., where he resides Mr. Osgood and his wife have each a large class in the Sunday School and it is related of them that when they have finished their Sunday's duties there they set off, whatever the weather may be for a little community eight miles distant where they have a flourishing Sunday School. This appointment they never miss even in the notoriously inclement Vermont winters. A man so deeply interested in the welfare of young people was not likely to miss the opportunity afforded by Christian Endeavor. In 1887 Mr. Osgood had already organized a young people's society of which he was President. Vermont has now recognized his ability and consecrated energy by electing him President of the State Union.

Mr. J. R. Townsend, the President of the Maine Union is one of the most prominent business men of Augusta, Me., which is his native city. He has also been prominent in church work, holding the office of deacon, treasurer, etc., in his church. He was connected with the Christian Endeavor Society from the beginning of its work in Augusta was held at Peoria, Ill. Twenty Unions, with an aggregate membership of over a thousand, were represented. The speeches and reports indicated a very rapid growth of the Union among the German-speaking people, and a hearty appreciation of the value of Young Peoples' Societies. A number of speakers advocated the organization of an international fellowship of these Societies among Germans in all lands and a committee was appointed to open negotiations. The addresses were all concerned with the practical working of the Unions, and all present were evidently deeply in earnest in their desire to increase their efficiency and promote their growth.

Janesville, Wis., was the scene of another notable gathering. The Baptist Ministerial Union was holding its anniversary there this year, and a day was devoted to the Young Peoples' Union. Mr. Joseph Moody, of Milwaukee, President of the B. Y. P. U., presided. Papers were read on each of the three Christian Culture Courses and on the other departments of work. After the business of the convention in relation to finances and the election of officers had been transacted, Dr. William M. Lawrence, of Chicago, delivered the address of the day. He contended that the Young Peoples' Union was the hope of the Baptist church and expressed his conviction that greater progress might have been made in the past if more attention had been given to the spiritual welfare of the younger members of the churches. He believed that any one who belittled the young people's movement would find that he had been working against God. It was not, he thought, an unalloyed success yet, but experience and thought and prayer would bring it as near perfection as any human organization could be, for it had in it the elements which would pay for all effort. Dr. Lawrence's address was a masterly presentation of the merit and possibilities of the B. Y. P. U. and was listened to with breathless attention by an enormous audience, in which were many ministers who have not yet availed themselves of this means of usefulness.

The third anniversary was that of the South Dakota Union which was the fourth it has held. The Secretary was able to announce that the past year had been the most prosperous in the history of the State Association. The Christian Culture course had been pursued with industry and enthusiasm and were being vigorously taken up again this year. The report of the Junior work was also encouraging and one of the speakers describing the work in his own church said that twenty members of the Junior Union had been baptized during the year. An interesting feature of the Convention was the presentation of banners. Unions which had attained excellence in the Christian Culture Courses. Mrs. Walt Ross of Centerville received the banner for the past year which she acknowledged in a modest speech referring to the benefit derived from the Course.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Loyal Workers, a League of twenty-five young women in Chicago, are supporting and educating an intelligent crippled girl in one of the institutions of the city.

India has now 72 Christian Endeavor Societies; Japan, 59; the West Indies, 4; Turkey, 38; China, 23; and Madagascar, 30. In missionary lands there are in 2,740 Societies.

It is estimated that fully fifty thousand members of the Epworth League have pledged themselves to give half a dollar each to the foreign missionary fund, which is to be completed on Thanksgiving Day.

When the last mail from India left, the Epworth Leagues were preparing for great Convention at Lucknow. It was held on Oct. 6 to commence with a Sunrise Prayer Meeting and to be followed four sessions lasting all day.

For three years the Christian Endeavor Society at West Torrington, Ct., has given an annual reception to the old people of the neighborhood. Of those present at the gathering of this kind five were more than eighty years old and one was more than ninety.

Fifty-three Epworth Leagues have been organized in the M. E. Church, South since July 1. Texas takes the lead, Missouri a close second, and Tennessee on the heels of both. Georgia and North Carolina for fourth place, while other States bring up the rear.

The Boston Young Women's Christian Association has outlined its plans for the winter. The Evening Bible School has just opened. Rev. J. M. Gray will repeat his popular course in outline Bible study Tuesday evenings; Miss L. J. Gray Bible history and geography, illustrated Wednesday evenings; Rev. J. M. Orro Bible interpretation, Thursday evening. Other departments are also in process of arrangement.

Our Indian Wards at Home.

Though not Particularly Successful as Farmers, They are Skillful Hunters, Fishermen and Boatbuilders.

IN the whole history of American progress, there is no more interesting or instructive chapter than that which deals with the civilization of the Indian. Tribe after tribe of these wild nomads has been brought under the influence of a progressive and peaceful Christianity, and, although in many cases the change has been accompanied by a severe struggle, the red men as a whole have come to regard the white race as their brothers. It is true there are a few scattering tribes in remote parts of the country who still cling to their old, roving ways, and disdain the restraints of civilized life, but even these feel that sooner or later they must follow the example of their tawny brothers and sisters. The educational work and training schools of such organizations as the Hampton Institute, and the influence of men of the high Christian type of the late Gen. Armstrong, have done more for the American Indian than all other human agencies combined in helping to raise him from a savage condition to the plane of an intelligent, law-abiding, industrious citizen. Thousands of red men in Western and Northwestern States are now farmers and stock-raisers, and large numbers subsist by hunting, fishing and gathering berries for the markets. Still there are engaged in various callings, and nearly all may be said to be learning the dignity and utility of labor. Especially is this true of the younger generation of the Indian race.

Among the industrious tribes, the Chippewas, of Wisconsin, furnish a good example. Our illustration shows a party of young Chippewa lads constructing a birch canoe, under the direction of an older member of the tribe. No boys in an Eastern technical school could work with greater deftness or accuracy. Another tribe in Wisconsin, the Menomonees, also give evidence of remarkable civilizing progress. They have discarded their medicine men, or tribal doctor-statesmen, whose counsel formerly ruled in all political affairs and regulated all physical conditions; they dress like the whites and are gradually adopting their customs and manner of living. Yet many hold fast to the old traditions. The younger branches of this tribe wear modern clothing, use modern household utensils and are in most things guided by Christian ideas; but the immemorial "medicine dance" is still indulged in at the initiation of a new candidate for tribal honors, although it is no longer the savage rite it was, but a comparatively mild amusement, which has been modified by contact with civilized people.

Of a total Indian population of about 200,000 (exclusive of Alaska) fully 96,000 are wholly or partly clad in the garments of civilization, 28,000 can read, between 30,000 and 40,000 can converse in English, and between 20,000 and 25,000 live in houses instead of tents as formerly. Nearly 400,000 acres of land are cultivated by civilized Indians. Some of the tribes are apparently dying out while others, like the Navajoes, have doubled their numbers in fifteen years. The Dakotas, too, have increased 60 per cent. in forty years. These tribes, however, that have taken most readily to the employments introduced by the whites, whether in the field or the workshops have not visibly deteriorated in health or physique, save in exceptional cases.

At the Hampton Institute the Indian boys are among the brightest and most night for her baby. The day of the funeral, though it was in the depth of winter and the cold was intense, the ladies in attendance were greatly distressed on entering the room of their sovereign they found her standing wrapped in a black veil and having, amid her tears, a passionate discussion with the Emperor, who was trying to dissuade her from a resolution she had taken—that of, according to the Russian custom, carrying on her lap in a shut carriage the little coffin which was to be taken to the Fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, the burial place of the Romanoff family. "What the poorest woman in Russia has a right to do," the Czarina said, "I will do myself!" And she had her own way, but she caught a terrible cold which kept her in bed for a month.

Well-Bred Korean Children.

It is good manners, in Korea at least, for the girl to get up first in the morning, sweep the room, roll up the bed (a mattress spread on the floor), and then begin the preparation for breakfast, which is not served until ten o'clock, writes R. G. Appenzella, a European traveler in that country. The girl in Korea is not thought worth educating, though she is welcome to such knowledge of the native script as she may be able to pick up from her mother. It is proper for the boy to rise early enough to go round to

EVEN-SONG.

LIKE a cradle rocking, rocking.
Silent, peaceful, to and fro,
Like a mother's sweet looks, dropping
On the little face below,
Hangs the green earth, swinging, turning,
Jarless, noiseless, safe and slow,
Falls the light of God's face bending
Down to watch us here below.
And as feeble babes that suffer,
Toss and cry, and will not rest,
Are the ones the tender mother
Holds the closest, loves the best:
So when we are weak and wretched,
By our sins weighed down, distressed,
Then it is that God's great patience
Holds us closest, loves us best.

TOO UNSELFISH MOTHERS.

IT has been wisely said by a thoughtful Christian matron of ripe experience, that the unselfish mother often makes a selfish child. Her unceasing devotion develops in the petted son or daughter a feeling that such service is due, and endless calls upon "mother" from babyhood to mature age, deprive her of the leisure that is the right of every human being. She must know just where "everything" is belonging to every member of the family. To relieve a daughter of all household cares in order that she may practice music or read interesting books; to do all the little duties which a thoughtful and considerate son or daughter would never permit a mother to do while they could perform them themselves—is the shortest way to make a child selfish and to deprive it of that keen, sweet pleasure that comes to every boy or girl who loves to "help mother." They seem to forget that

Nobody knows of the work it makes
To keep the home together,
Nobody knows of the steps it takes,
Nobody knows—but mother.

A wise mother, then, will encourage habits of industry and self-helpfulness in her children. She will teach them habits of order and neatness and the value of punctuality, as well in tidying up a room, as in learning lessons or attendance at school. And if, occasionally, they fall somewhat short of expectations she will not nag them. A model mother was once asked, "How is it that you never seem to nag your little ones as so many mothers do, who weary themselves, as well as the small offenders, by continual don't's?" She replied, "Had you known me when I had but one child, you would have called me the don't-woman, for that world was continually on my lips. I wanted her to be perfect, and was constantly on the lookout for misdeeds. The result was that I robbed myself of all comfort, and the poor child was nagged almost to the ruin of her disposition. I did not realize my mistake until one day, after having been unusually vigilant, I overheard my child, in another room, saying in a very plaintive voice, 'Please, God, don't let my mamma scold me all the time.' I said to myself from a contrite heart, 'My poor little one, God helping me, your prayer shall be answered,' and from that hour I watched myself more, and my child less."

One of the best habits that a young boy or girl can form is that of keeping accurate account of personal expenses, and the smaller the items the more important to keep account of them. If children be taught to keep an account of every penny they spend, they would be better prepared to expend money judiciously when they became men and women and heads of families, and we should hear less about the prevalence of thriftlessness and extravagance.

CHIPPEWA INDIAN BOYS MAKING A BIRCH-BARK CANOE.

promising pupils. After leaving the Institute, many of these lads become teachers among their own people, and by personal example, illustrate the value of education, and habits of industry. At a number of the Indian schools at the Agencies manual labor is taught. Some of the tribes having training schools which are of the greatest value in teaching the young Indian boys and girls. As a whole, the outlook among these people—and more especially among progressive tribes like the Cherokees and Iroquois, is very promising for industrious citizenship, neat homes, good farms and self-supporting mechanical skill. Their greatest need is more mission schools, where a pure Christian influence may be exerted to break down the last barriers of their old savage customs and beliefs.

A Royal Mother's Grief.

The Czarina has shown herself all along the most devoted of wives and mothers, and many a Muscovite matron delights to recall an incident of 1860, when the young Empress lost a little child three months old. She was inconsolable and mourned day and his father's apartment and greet him with "Have you had peace in your sleep?" and then to busy himself around the front of the house, sweep the yard or see that it is swept, and then go to his studies. He goes to school before breakfast. Children stand in the presence of parents and superiors, with eyes cast down, hands folded reverently, and for the rest they are supposed "to be seen and not heard," unless spoken to.

Mother Wren's Queer Home.

As an illustration of the strength of the home-building instinct among birds, the following is related: A farmer at Iford, in Sussex, England, did a very common thing when he hung up an old jacket in one of his outbuildings; and when Jenny Wren came along she saw it, and was glad, for forthwith she proceeded to build a home in one of the pockets. Judge of the owner's surprise, however, when he took his jacket down, to discover that it contained a nest and five eggs. He hung his coat up again and wore another until the eggs were hatched and the young wrens were able to shift for themselves and get their own living.

CHAPTER XII.

Invitation to Val's Wedding.

"A LETTER for you, Annie," said Clarence one morning as he entered the sitting-room. "I think it is from that pretty, little, country cousin of yours, who was here last Fall and came near turning all of our masculine heads."

"So it is, from Val," said Annie, looking at the post-mark. "I have not heard from her since we left Florence."

Walking out into the front veranda so as to enjoy it undisturbed, she opened and read: "My dearest Cousin:—Although you have not replied to my last letter, yet I intend to write again, especially as I have something of importance which I wish to communicate. I am very happy this morning, and nature too seems in her very happiest mood. The world looks more beautiful than usual, the sky bluer, grass greener, flowers brighter and sweeter, and the little birds just hop about and sing so merrily, I cannot imagine what they can be thinking about."

"Is this preamble long enough to go before the important communication? If so, then I will have compassion on your womanly curiosity and tell you my secret at once. I am going to be married. I know you are glad. I look for more congratulations from you than from any one, since you are happily married to the man of your heart, and know full well the joy of wedded love. But I haven't told you the name of my intended. Here it is—James E. Carlisle—now isn't that a name fit for a king? He is Val Vernon's king. Now were I to name his noble qualities of mind and heart, I should have to get a bigger sheet than this, for they are as the drops in the ocean, and the sands upon the sea shore. But, dear Annie, please do not think, because my pen is rattling off in a frivolous way, that I do not realize the solemnity of the vows I am about to make at the altar. He is not a rich man as far as this world goes, Annie, but he is a thorough business man, the manager of a large factory, and we expect to begin life in a small way. How insignificant our preparations would seem to you! We take the greatest delight in laying plans for future operations, and mother has often to be called in for advice. Mr. Carlisle loves her devotedly and this delights me beyond measure, for I could never love any man who did not appreciate and love my dear mother."

"Our marriage will take place in October and we shall settle down at once to busy life. Business will not allow Mr. Carlisle to leave, so we have never given a thought to a bridal trip, for, in addition to his confinement here, the expense would be greater than we could afford. You will smile when I tell you that, but we can best economize in this way and that enters largely into our conversations, and I think it is a very sweet subject. It is rather a novel discussion for young people on the verge of marriage, but it is a very satisfactory one and it leaves the heart very tender."

"Our arrangements are of the simplest kind. We will have a few friends to tea, and have the ceremony performed very quietly just before supper is announced. My trousseau will consist of four new dresses, one cloak and one hat. Are you laughing? It is very insignificant by the side of yours, but I shall feel very grand in it, and Mr. Carlisle says—but never mind about that."

"You were very happy in your preparations for your wedding, and now I call upon you to rejoice with me in anticipation of mine. Have you no good advice to give me? Sit right down and write me, and give me as much of your experience as you think will be of benefit."

"Accept this letter, please, as my card of invitation to you all, for, since economy is our watchword, we will issue no others. I beg that you will make all your arrangements to come. Our pure mountain air would benefit dear auntie, I am sure, so please urge her to come."

"Please write immediately and say that you will accept."

"My love to the entire family, in which mother unites. Lovingly, VAL."

CHAPTER XIII.

"The security of his love."

A darkened room—figures moving noiselessly about—a physician bending over a mysterious bundle of embroidered merino, held tenderly in a lady's arms.

The physician whispers:

"They are both quite comfortable now, and are doing as well as we could expect. As I have a critical case in the country, Mrs. St. Clair, I will leave you now, but will call again on my return. Good evening."

The door made a little creaking sound, whereupon the bundle moved and two baby fists were thrown up in defiance, then a shrill cry broke the stillness of the room and Annie turned uneasily on the pillow, just as the door softly opened and Clarence in slippers entered.

"How is my darling?" he asked as he leaned over and kissed Annie tenderly.

"Better, please bring baby to me."

"Don't worry about him, Annie, he is doing very well. He is fast asleep now, so I would not disturb him."

He sat close, caressing her hand and smoothing the hair from her forehead with a gentle touch. She closed her eyes languidly, but opened them soon again, saying:

"Clarence, bring baby here, I want to see him first in your arms."

So he stepped over, received the bundle from its grandmother, looked frightened, walked slowly, cautiously, as though he held costly china, which was in imminent danger of breaking, but at last he reached the bed and laid it by Annie, and then drew back, as though a feat had been performed and he immensely relieved.

"Little darling," exclaimed Annie, as she curled the toy fingers around her own, "You remember its name, Clarence."

"It's too little to name," and the young father peeped over at the curiosity.

"Yes, but it was named long ago, you know, Ernest St. Clair, after poor papa and your father."

The nurse came, took the wee baby away, cautioned Annie about talking and things grew quiet again. Clarence was not quite sure that he was very proud of the little pink baby upstairs, but this he determined he would never let Annie know by word, look or action.

Years ago when Col. St. Clair was making out his will, Mrs. St. Clair begged that he would leave her only a few thousand dollars for individual expenses, saying she did not wish to be burdened with property, and, that in the event of his death she would live with Annie or Roy and would need nothing more. This he would not consent to do, but finally a compromise was agreed upon that she was to receive only a child's share, and he stated in his will that this had been done at his wife's urgent request. Now that her husband was dead and she was free to do as she pleased, she immediately divided her portion between her two children, retaining only the few thousand she had petitioned for before.

Domestic duties were never in accordance with Mrs. St. Clair's taste, so, as soon as Annie had recovered her wonted strength, her mother put the reins of government into her hands, and felt relieved of a heavy burden.

Annie was now mistress of a grand establishment, with plenty of money at her command. After a certain length of mourning had passed and fashion would permit, Clarence's gay spirits boiled over, and he declared that "he would die if he didn't have some fun." Roy's marriage with a wealthy lady had been postponed on account of his father's death, and now began grand preparations for the reception of the bride. Every thought was centered on this. In a few weeks Roy would return, and then would begin an almost never-ending round of festivities.

Little Ernest was now just eight months old, a lovely, beautiful child, with his father's sparkling black eyes, which Annie never ceased to admire. "A little idol in white," he certainly was, for grandmother, mother, father and uncle felt as if an angel had dropped from heaven right in their midst. Love was showered upon the unconscious child, and pride loaded it with the costliest fabrics and jewels. Even his carriage had been ordered from abroad. Not a day's sickness had he ever known, and now little pearls began to peep through his laughing lips. Here, in this child, seemed centered all good,—lovely in feature, rosy in health, perfect in senses with beautifully molded limbs, plump and fair, and a mind unusually bright.

Smiles and happiness had come back to Annie, for time is a merciful healer. Now she threw herself with redoubled zest into every pleasure. Theatres and halls were frequented, and baby left with its nurse. At first Annie left him with trepidation, but as each night, upon her return, she found him well and sleeping, she at length yielded without reluctance to Clarence's entreaties and went to all places where fashion resorts.

Then came Roy's bride, not beautiful, but very rich and accomplished. The reception given them was only surpassed by Annie's wedding, for it was universally conceded that it was very grand. Every one agreed that Roy's wife was very stylish, and that it mattered not about beauty, only so she could cover up facial defects with fashion's devices. She had been educated partly in France and partly in Germany, and conversed as fluently in those languages as in her mother tongue.

Clarence acted the host and master of ceremonies at the reception with great grace and gentlemanly ease, but late in the evening Annie noticed his flushed face, unsteady step and loud, hilarious voice. Later, friends slipped him off to his luxurious couch and laid him down a drunken man. When Annie went to her room at two o'clock, a scene, she never forgot, met her eyes. Little Ernest lying on the bed in his pretty, ruffled night slip, his dimpled hand still grasping a flower he had been playing with—by his side, upon his back, lay her husband in his elegant broadcloth suit, white satin vest and patent leather boots, now breathing deep and sonorous in the profound stupor of drunkenness!

She stood and gazed, the gay scene forgotten and her heart almost petrified with grief. She could not call Roy, his new wife must never know this, so summoning a man-servant she directed him to undress her husband, while she sat by, clasping her heart.

"Why should I care?" she mused. "This is nothing new in society, and there is nothing to be so mortified about. Clarence, poor fellow, was only playing the host, and how perfectly he did the honors! Then, to do this, he must drink with this lady, then with that one,—was challenged by the men, persuaded by the women—yes, that is why he lies yonder, drunk. Poor Clarence! This never happened before, why should I grieve so? Oh, I could never respect my husband if he were a regular drunkard. Could I feel the least particle of respect for him to see him lying down like a brute? I don't care if fashionable people do drink, I cannot stand it in my husband. Papa indulged in wine but was never intoxicated, neither was Roy, and Clara—Ah! Val, I remember your warning now, it comes back to me to-night for the first time in a year. I told you that love would quench this growing thirst, love would keep him a sober man, love would do all things, and it will, I will not be hard on him, I don't believe I will even tell him. Poor Clarence! He will be so mortified, no, he shall never know it; that I'm determined on."

The work of undressing having been finished, and the baby threatening to awake, warned Annie to lay aside her own party attire and snatch an hour or two of rest. With baby on her arm, by her drunken husband's side she dropped to sleep. At a late hour next morning the house showed signs of life. Clarence, between reaction and mortification, looked pale, hollow-eyed and Annie, without a reproachful word, petted and caressed him, so that his spirits soon arose and he became himself again.

It was not many months before the servant had to be called to undress "Mr. Clarence" again, and this time Annie's seriousness lasted longer than at the first, and it left a shadow upon her usually bright face. A few pages from her Journal will best tell her inmost thoughts.

"Clarence, poor Clarence, has nothing to do, I wish he had some stirring business that would keep busy the powers of his mind and body. I verily believe that rich people are the most unhappy in the world. A man of idle leisure is certainly to be pitied, and Clarence is just this pitiable man. Nothing to do, but to go down-town ride fine horses, smoke fine cigars, lounge about, doing neither himself nor any one else any good.—Well, yes, I believe he is doing others good, has done it lately. We have always had money to lend at interest papa always did when he had good security, and Clarence has been lending some recently. The other day, Mr. Snow found himself greatly involved, was about to be sold out, and his family were in great distress, for they were in the power of a bearless rich creditor, and most rich creditors are heartless. Clarence said he could not bear to think of their distress, and when Mr. Snow came and bowed his head upon his hands in an agony of despair at mortification. Clarence said:

"What is the amount of your note, Mr. Snow?"

"Fifty thousand dollars and no hope."

"It pains me to see your distress, my friend," said my noble husband. "I'll give your security for that amount, sir."

"Clarence said that although the man had come to solicit his aid, that when promised it so freely, he looked bewildered then grasped his hand and poured forth thanks with tears flowing down his cheeks—I am glad Clarence went his security even if we lose every cent."

CHAPTER XIV.

A Journal leaf of a later date.

"People say Clarence was wrong to sign Mr. Snow's papers. Perhaps he was, but I am proud of my husband's noble impulses, for he is always aiding some one in distress, and I think this generosity a beautiful commendable trait of character. Generally, hearts like Mimosa leaves, close when poverty and distress approach, but is not so with Clarence. He gives hundreds to his minister, or rather to the minister of his family, for he himself belongs to no church, and he has promised to put up a new spire himself, in place of the recently blown down. This will cost $2,000, and then he gave $5,000 to aid endowing the Orphan's Home. His benefactions are many. Every one calls him magnanimous. They say all they have to do is to represent a case to Clarence, and big, warm heart overflows with pity, and out comes his purse. I hope Ernest will like him. Now his baby fingers clutch every thing that belongs to him, I then he is only a baby. When he grows older, I'll show him his father and tell him to follow in his noble footsteps. Clarence said in my hearing, the other day:

"I declare, Mr. Deveraux is just paying his way up to heaven with gold."

"My heart gave a quick bound, I smile but could not appear to hear. I wonder one could pave his way up there! Of course, it was only meant figuratively, as referred to good works, which, undoubtedly, are golden in the sight of heaven. May I envy Clarence the amount of good he has done, and I am very sure I emulate his noble example, for without a doubt he does more for that church than any of its members. In these things I would not have him change one iota: in one of these times when he drinks too freely, and then he loses all self-control, and then he does not care for me or Ernest, only wants to let entirely alone. Now he goes into room opposite mine and sleeps off the spells. They say a maniac turns me violently against those he loves best. Surely these spells are the ravings of one mented, for he speaks to me as he never spoke before, quick, impatient, angry, and the other night he came in under the influence of liquor and punished our precious baby! The little fellow cried most piteously and right straight put up his arms 'papa' to take him, but he turned off with an oath, the first one he ever uttered in my presence. Ah, would I not change the things if I could! Oh, to bring back the blessed, happy days of yore!"

A LEPER'S LETTER.

In the Home for Lepers at Purulia, India, there are several patients who are each supported by some Christian lady. One of these patients is a remarkably intelligent man, and has been very grateful for her letter. She wanted to have a picture of a lady who was paying for her support and a photograph was sent. She replied in a letter which pathetically indicates her appreciation of the difference between Hinduism and Christianity, which to some better educated, but more fortunate people does not seem so great as it does to her. The following passages are taken from a translation of her letter: "When I came of age, according to the Hindu laws, I was married. Soon after my marriage I was overtaken with this disease. I tried some medicine to cure it, but in vain; and the result was that my husband turned me out of the house. I went to the house of my father, but after some time some one advised me to go to the house of the god Siva and worship there. I went, and was lying on the ground for twenty-six days, spending day and night in fasting and prayers, crying so far as I understood, to the gods for mercy. Every twenty-four hours (at sunset) I took a mouthful of dry corn; that was all I had during these twenty-six days. I got no answer, nor did Siva appear to console me. I left that place much disappointed, and went home; but when my father found that my pilgrimage had been useless, I was told that for such people as I, homes had been built at Purulia, and I had better go there. With great sorrow I received this news. I took my only child in my lap, and sheltered her for four days under a tree; then, with a broken heart and sorrowful face, I started for Purulia, to see what people would do for me there. When I arrived at Purulia, I was very kindly received, like others who are here. Here it was that I first heard the name of Jesus, and where I learned the great difference between heathenism and Christianity. And then I began to thank God. I know I cannot thank the great God in this world as I should do, but I hope to do so with my whole heart when I arrive in heaven, where also I shall see you as you are. Please pray for me, as I pray for you, that I may be able to bear my pain with patience. Your daughter in Christ.

WOMEN'S EDUCATION.*

INDEPENDENCE, writes Dr. Lyman Abbott, is a very popular word in America; but independence is of no value. God has not made us to be independent of one another. The employer is dependent on the employee, and the employee on the employer; the mistress on the servant, and the servant on the mistress; the husband on the wife, and the wife on the husband. And the more highly life is organized, the more intricate and elaborate is the system of independence. The Robinson Crusoe state of society is the lowest and least desirable. We should not train our children to independence, but to interdependence; to bear one another's burdens; to exchange one another's services; to share one another's lives. We do not train them in everything except as regards the home. The merchant is not trained as a carpenter or a farmer, but depends on others for mechanical and agricultural products. The wise man never mixes his own home-made drugs, but calls a doctor. The layman who attempts to act on the motto "every man his own lawyer," has a fool for a client. The congregation does not trust for religious instruction to any pious mechanic who thinks he has a message, but employs an educated preacher. God, who has set men in society, thus to exchange their services, has set them in families also. That man is best prepared for home life who is trained to be dependent on his wife for wifely counsel, cheer and services; and that woman is best prepared for home life who is trained to be dependent on her husband for support and protection. It may be very well for the boy to learn how to sew on a button or cook a steak in case of need; but this is not his work; he is appointed to be the bread-winner of the family. It is important that the girl should have practical knowledge of affairs in general, and also some specific qualifications which she can put to useful service in bread-winning, in case of need; but under ordinary circumstances to be the bread-winner of the family is not her appointed task, and if she sacrifices training for the other, and, in most cases, really higher service, that she may acquire a money-making profession, she has made one of those unfair exchanges which is a robbery. The history of heredity makes it tolerably clear that great fathers have not often had great sons, while great sons have almost always had great mothers. "Woman," says Dr. Wither Moore, "are made and meant to be, not men but mothers of men." If this be true their education should keep probable maternity always in view. If that education is so conducted as to destroy a good mother and produce a distinguished collegian, it has been a very sorry education.

For the mother is the home-builder, and the home is the basis of civilization. The girl should be taught to look forward to marriage as her probable and natural destiny, as the boy also should be. She should be taught to regard wifehood and motherhood as the highest and most sacred of all callings. She should be habituated to think of the one as leading to the other. She should be accustomed to regard man, not as her natural foe, not as her remorseless competitor, but as her God-given protector, defender, supporter, companion and friend. Much, and not too much, has been said of the duty of training men to reverence woman. But woman should also be trained to reverence man; for the divine image is in both men and women, and in both alike to be revered.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved many numbers from Consumption, have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly I give testimonials for publication; but I see you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lung and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colic, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with counts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be kept free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will be some time before it will be introduced into the market throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will send you, carriage paid, from my own receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

A NONAGENARIAN'S BELIEF.
One of the most active members of the aristocracy in England in promoting the philanthropic efforts to supply the sons of workingmen with technical training, was the late Sir Harry Verney. He lived to be more than ninety years old, and in his later years, while still taking a deep interest in enterprises of an industrial character, he seldom spoke in public. He was, however, induced once to come out of his seclusion. The venerable man, then in his ninetieth year, after referring briefly to his favorite topic, said with solemn emphasis: "Far, far more important than all these good schemes for technical training and material comfort, it is that our farmers and laborers should be taught to be pious, God-fearing men. Piety! piety! that is the secret of national happiness."

A QUEEN THWARTED BY ANTS.
In describing a vigorous missionary work now going on at Farkin, in Eastern Turkey, Mrs. Wheeler, a missionary of the American Board, mentions incidentally an interesting fact: It appears that one of the walls of the city is an immensely thick and strongly-built structure. There is a tradition that it was built by an impious queen who declared she would build so strongly that neither God nor man could overturn it. The wall is now discovered to be in danger, for one of its chief foundations has been undermined by the ants, which are among the most destructive Armenian pests.

ELI BROWN.

The following remarkable statement was made by me direct special attention, is from a farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from toothache, dryness of the mouth, formed in nostrils, or both sides stopped continually, dryness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continuous roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in ears. My hearing began to fail, and for 1 years I was almost entirely deaf, and gradually grew worse. Every thing I had tried failed. In despair I commenced to use Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect the first application was simply wonderful less than five minutes my hearing was restored, and has been perfect ever since, in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

ANY hallowed memories associated with the earthly life and ministry of Jesus are revived by the scene shown in the photograph below, which is one of the most striking and important that has ever appeared in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In the immediate foreground is the ancient road that leads from Bethlehem to Jerusalem, a broad, level highway along the base of the limestone ridges that are everywhere in Palestine. Starting from the village of Christ's nativity, it passes along a depression, passing the tomb of the prophet, the valley of Hinnom, the field of blood, the vale of Siloam, and many other localities of Biblical interest. On the outskirts of Jerusalem, it skirts the base of Mount Zion, and passes beneath the extreme right in the photograph), is Olivet, the cluster of buildings on its summit gleaming white, and the tall tower of the Russian church being the most striking feature of that part of the landscape. In the middle distance, and between us and Olivet (also on the right of the illustration) is the "King's Garden," in former times the royal pleasure-ground of the Jewish monarchs, but now greatly neglected, although its soil is still remarkably fertile and its olive trees are well nourished and give an abundant yield. To the left, and bordering on the wall of Mount Zion is an enclosure which is used as a Protestant cemetery. There is an English school-building of Pompey and Titus and those of the Saracens, Moslems and Crusaders and many other warlike hosts, as they marched to attack the Holy City. Twenty-eight times, as history tells us, Jerusalem has been subjected to siege or assault, and against her strong citadels and stout walls, armies of Egyptians, Philistines, Syrians, Assyrians, Romans, Persians, Arabs, and other hostile nations have directed their attacks with varying success. Titus, with his Roman legions, is said to have levelled every building, with the single exception of the Tower of David, which he left standing to mark the general desolation. Although the tower, as it exists to-day, may have been greatly

Among the latter, David's Tomb may be readily distinguished by its dome.

From Zion, the eye ranges across the King's Garden and over the valley, that lies between it and the Mount of Olives, variously named the "Mount of Anointing," Mount Elaion and the "Hill of Corruption." Its modern native appellation is Jebel et Tur, signifying simply "The Mount." But to believers the world over, it will ever be known by the name given to it in the Gospels. From its summit can be seen the Holy City, fair and beautiful beneath, the Judean wilderness, the "Mountain of Offence" the "Hill of Evil Counsel," and even a glimpse of distant Bethlehem. Upon Olivet's slopan old aqueduct, and finally leaves the way to ascend the slope that leads to the Bethlehem Gate. Our illustration is taken at an advantageous point which commands a magnificent comprehensive view, Mount Zion stands out in bold relief, with its walls, its towers and its shining domes, while northward, in the distance (and on the exchanged since the time of its Roman conquest, there is every reason to believe that much of the original structure remains. It was the royal citadel and Mount Zion on which it stood was then deemed an impregnable bulwark of defence. The Tower is on ing sides Jesus sat with his disciples, while they drank in the words of life that fell from his lips. There he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, and his own death on the Cross. There, under its cool sycamores and olives, he rested, meditated and prayed; at its base he was betrayed and its soil was the last to be pressed by his sacred foot before his ascension to heaven.

VICTORY OVER PAIN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage. Text: Rev. 21: 4, "Neither shall there be any more pain."

THE first question that you ask when about to change your residence to any city is, "What is the health of the place? is it shaken of terrible disorders? what are the bills of mortality? what is the death-rate? how high rises the thermometer?" And am I not reasonable in asking, What are the sanitary conditions of the heavenly city into which we all hope to move? My text answers it by saying, "Neither shall there be any more pain."

First, I remark, there will be no pain of disappointment in heaven. If I could put the picture of what you anticipated of life when you began it, beside the picture of what you have realized, I would find a great difference. You have stumbled upon great disappointments. Perhaps you expected riches, and you have worked hard enough to gain them; you have planned and worried and persisted until your hands were worn and your brain was racked and your heart fainted, and at the end of this long strife with misfortune you find that if you have not been positively defeated it has been a drawn battle. It is still tug and tussle—this year losing what you gained last, financial uncertainties pulling down faster than you build. For perhaps twenty or thirty years you have been running your craft straight into the teeth of the wind.

Perhaps you have had domestic disappointment. Your children, upon whose education you lavished your hard-earned dollars, have not turned out as expected. Notwithstanding all your counsels and prayers and painstaking, they will not do right. Many a good father has had a bad boy. Absalom trod on David's heart. That mother never imagined all this as twenty or thirty years ago she sat by that child's cradle.

Your life has been a chapter of disappointments. But, come with me, and I will show you a different scene. By God's grace, entering the other city you will never again have a blasted hope. The most jubilant of expectations will not reach the realization. Coming to the top of one hill of joy, there will be other heights rising upon the vision. This song of transport will but lift you to higher anthems; the sweetest choral but a prelude to more tremendous harmony; all things better than you had anticipated—the robe richer, the crown brighter, the temple grander, the throng mightier.

Further, I remark, there will be no pain of weariness. It may be many hours since you quit work, but many of you are unrested, some from overwork, and some from dulness of trade, the latter more exhausting than the former. Your ankles ache, your spirits flag, you want rest. Are these wheels always to turn? these shuttles to fly? these axes to hew? these shovels to delve? these pens to fly? these books to be posted? these goods to be sold?

Ah! the great holiday approaches. No more curse of taskmasters. No more stooping until the back aches. No more calculation until the brain is bewildered. No more pain. No more carpentry, for the mansions are all built. No more masonry, for the walls are all reared. No more diamond-cutting, for the gems are all set. No more gold beating, for the crowns are all completed. No more agriculture, for the harvests are spontaneous.

Further, there will be no more pain of poverty. It is a hard thing to be really poor; to have your coat wear out and no money to get another; to have your flour-barrel empty, and nothing to buy bread with for your children; to live in an unhealthy row, and no means to change your habitation; to have your child sick with some mysterious disease, and not be able to secure eminent medical ability; to have son or daughter begin the world, and you not have anything to help them in starting; with a mind capable of research and high contemplation, to be perpetually fixed on questions of mere livelihood.

Poets try to throw a romance about the poor man's cot; but there is no romance about it. Poverty is hard, cruel, unrelenting. But Lazarus waked up without his his rags and his diseases, and so all of Christ's poor, wake up at last without any of their disadvantages—no almshouses, for they are all princes; no rents to pay, for the residence is gratuitous; no garments to buy, for the robes are divinely fashioned; no seats in church for poor folks, but equality among temple worshippers. No hovels, no hard crusts, no insufficient apparel. "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them nor any heat." No more pain!

Further, there will be no pain of parting. All these associations must some time break up. We clasp hands and walk together, and talk and laugh and weep together; but we must after awhile separate. Your grave will be in one place, mine in another. We look each other full in the face for the last time. We will be sitting together some evening, or walking together some day, and nothing will be unusual in our appearance, or our conversation; but God knows that it is the last time; and messengers from eternity, on their errand to take us away, know it is the last time; and in heaven, where they make ready for our departing spirits, they know it is the last time.

Oh the long agony of earthly separation! It is awful to stand in your nursery fighting death back from the couch of your child, and try to hold fast the little one, and see all the time that he is getting weaker, and the breath is shorter, and make outcry to God to help us, and to the doctors to save him, and see it is of no avail, and then to know that his spirit is gone, and that you have nothing left but the casket that held the jewel, and that in two or three days you must even put that away, and walk around about the house and find it desolate, sometimes feeling rebellious, and then to resolve to feel differently, and to resolve on self-control, and just as you have come to what you think is perfect self-control, to suddenly come upon some little coat, or picture, or shoe half worn out, and how all the floods of the soul burst in one wild wail of agony! Oh, my God, how hard it is to part, to close the eyes that never can look merry at our coming, to kiss the hand that will never again do us a kindness. I know religion gives great consolation in such a hour, and we ought to be comforted; but anyhow and anyway you make it, it is awful.

On steamboat wharf and at rail-car window we may smile when we say farewell; but these good-byes at the death-bed, they just take hold of the heart with iron pincers, and tear it out by the roots until all the fibres quiver and curl in the torture and drop thick blood. These separations are wine-presses into which our hearts, like red clusters, are thrown, and then trouble turns the windlass round and round until we are utterly crushed, and have no more capacity to suffer, and we stop crying because we have wept all our tears.

On every street, at every doorstep, by every couch, there have been partings. But once past the heavenly portals, and you are through with such scenes forever. In that land there are many hand-claspings and embracings, but only in recognition. That great home circle never breaks. Once find your comrades there, and you have them forever. No crape floats from the door of that blissful residence. No cleft hillside where the dead sleep. All awake, wide awake, and forever. No pushing out of emigrant ship for foreign shore. No tolling of bell as the funeral passes. Whole generations in glory. Hand to hand, heart to heart, joy to joy. No creeping up the limbs of the death-chill, the feet cold until hot flannels cannot warm them. No rattle of sepulchral gates. No parting, no pain.

Further, the heavenly city will have no pain of body. The race is pierced with sharp distresses. The surgeon's knife must cut. The dentist's pincers must pull. Pain is fought with pain. The world is a hospital. Scores of diseases like vultures contending for a carcass, struggle as to which shall have it. Our natures are infinitely susceptible to suffering. The eye, the foot, the hand, with immense capacity of anguish.

The little child meets at the entrance of life manifold diseases. You hear the shrill cry of infancy as the lancet strikes into the swollen gum. You see its head toss in consuming fevers that take more than half of them into the dust. Old age passes, dizzy, and weak, and short-breathed, and dim-sighted. On every north-east wind come down pleurisy and pneumonias. War lifts its sword and hacks away the life of whole generations. The hospitals of the earth groan into the ear of God their complaint. Asiatic cholera and ship fevers and typhoids and London plagues make the world's knees knock together.

Pain has gone through every street, and up every ladder, and down every shaft. It is on the wave, on the mast, on the beach. Wounds from clip of elephants tusk, and adder's sting, and crocodile's tooth, and horse's hoof, and wheel's revolution. We gather up the infirmities of our parents and transmit to our children the inheritance augmented by our own sicknesses, and they add to them their own disorders, to pass the inheritance to other generations. In A. D. 262 the plague in Rome smote into the dust 5,000 citizens daily. In 544, in Constantinople, 1,000 grave-diggers were not enough to bury the dead. In 1813, ophthalmia seized the whole Prussian Army. At times the earth has sweltered with suffering.

Count up the pains of Austerlitz, where 30,000 fell; of Fontenoy, where 100,000 fell; of Chalons, where 300,000 fell; of Marius' fight, in which 200,000 fell; of the tragedy at Herat, where Genghis Khan massacred 1,600,000 men, and of Nishar, where he slew 1,747,000 people; of the 18,000,000 this monster sacrificed in fourteen years, as he went forth to do as he declared, to exterminate the entire Chinese nation and make the empire a pasture for cattle. Think of the death-throes of the 5,000,000 men sacrificed in one campaign of Xerxes. Think of the 120,000 that perished in the siege of Ostend, of 300,000 dead at Acre; of 1,100,000 dead in the siege of Jerusalem; of 1,816,000 of the dead at Troy, and then complete the review by considering the stupendous estimate of Edmund Burke, that the loss by war had been thirty-five times the entire then present population of the globe.

Go through and examine the lacerations, the gunshot fractures, the sabre wounds, the gashes of the battle-axe, the slugs of the bombshell and exploded mine and the carriage and the hoof of the cavalry horse, the burning thirsts, the camp fevers, the frosts that shivered, the tropical suns smote. Add it up, gather it into one compress it into one word, spell it in syllable, clank it in one chain, pour it in one groan, distill it into one tear.

Ay, the world has writhed in six thousand years of suffering. Why doubt the possibility of a future world of suffering when we see the tortures that have befallen in this? A deserter from Seba coming over to the army of the pointed back to the fortress and "That place is a perfect hell."

Our lexicographers, aware of the immense necessity of having plenty of words to express the different shades of trouble have strewn over their pages such words as "annoyance," "distress," "grief," "sorrow," "heartache," "misery," "trouble," "pang," "torture," "affliction," "anguish," "tribulation," "wretchedness," "suffering." But I have a glad sound for every heart for every sick room, for every life-long invalid, for every broken heart. "Neither shall there be any more pain." Thank God!

No malarial float in the air. No foot treads that street. No weariness. No painful respiration. No hectic. No one can drink of that healthy food and keep faint-hearted or faint-headed whose foot touches that pavement beneath an athlete. The first kiss of that air will take the wrinkles from man's cheek. Amid the multitude of stars, not one diseased throat. The flash of the throne will scatter the dust of those who were born blind. The lame man leaps as a hart, and the blind sing. From that bath of infinite life we shall step forth, our weariness to Who are those radiant ones? Who had his jaw shot off at Freiburg; that one lost his eyes in a blast; that one had his back broken fall from the ship's halyards; that one of gangrene in the hospital. No pain. Sure enough, here is Robert H. who never before saw a well day, ward Payson, whose body was eaten of distress, and Richard Baxter, who died through untold physical torture. No more pain. Here, too, are the legion, a great host of 6,666 pure souls for Christ's sake. No distress of their countenance. No fires to burn or floods to drown them, or rack of them. All well. Here are the Scotch anthers, none to hunt them now. The cave and imprecations of Lord Clarendon exchanged for temple service, and hence of Him who helped Hugh Lamb of the fire. All well. No more pain.

I set open the door of heaven and blows on you this refreshing breeze, fountains of God have made it, the gardens have made it sweet. I know that Solomon ever heard a day, the ice click in an ice-pitcher wrote as if he did when he said, "waters to a thirsty soul, so is grace from a far country."

Clambering among the Green Mountains I was tired and hot and thirsty, and I not forget how refreshing it was after a while, I heard the mountain tumbling over the rocks. I had a chalice, so I got down on my knees face to drink. Oh, ye climber journey, with cut feet and parched and fevered temples, listen to the of sapphire brooks, amid flowered over golden shelvings. Listen to the Lamb which is in the midst of shall lead them unto living fountains of water." I do not offer it to you as ice. To take this you must be down on your knees and on your face drink out of this great fountain of consolation. "And lo! I heard from heaven, as the voice of many at

MANY GOOD CAUSES HELPED.

Christian Herald" Readers Active in Works of Charity and Christian Philanthropy—Contributions Acknowledged.

WHAT no really worthy cause is ever presented to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in vain, is abundantly proved by their generosity in a multitude of instances, where they have freely and spontaneously responded to appeals that have been made in the interest of Christian philanthropy. To-day, we devote considerable space to the acknowledgment of contributions in aid of a number of very interesting charities, including the Turkish Relief Fund, the Western Fire Sufferers, the Moody Bible Institute, Mrs. Jamal's Training School in Jerusalem, our Child Home at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, and other works of a practical Christian missionary character, all of which have been substantially benefited by the generous aid they have received. A more precious boon, however, is that which comes from the grateful hearts of the multitude of sufferers themselves, whose souls have been cheered while their lives have been saved by the kindness of those who have given of their substance "In His name." During the week a number of contributions have been received for the Turkish Relief Fund including a gift of $50 from Oscar S. Straus, ex-United States Minister to the Porte. Mr. Straus sent the following letter:

WARREN STREET, NEW YORK, OCT. 20, 1894.
S. KLOPFER, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, City.

I learn that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is making a collection for the relief of the sufferers in recent earthquakes in Turkey. I sincerely regret that at the time this misfortune befell Turkey I was in this country, otherwise I should have been one of the first to do my utmost in bringing the sympathy of the American people, with a view of obtaining a large collection expressive of the sympathy of the people with the subjects of his Imperial Majesty the Sultan. I herewith enclose you a contribution to your fund.

The Johnstown calamity occurred, it was my duty to be the diplomatic representative of the United States at Constantinople. Knowing of the great calamity that existed in Turkey, I purposely did not mention to the Sultan of this calamity, but I drew upon the well-known generosity of the Sultan. A few days after the occurrence I was summoned to the palace, and the Sultan spoke with great feeling of sympathy for the disaster, expressing his sorrow and concern. He asked whether I would be in transmitting to my country a contribution which he desired to make. He thereupon sent me two hundred pounds, which I promptly forwarded to the Secretary of State, who sent it to the committee in charge of the relief fund.

It is to my best recollection, the Sultan was not only a sovereign of the old world who was prompt in making a substantial subscription, but showing not only his deep sympathy, but his friendly feeling for the people of this country.

It is exceedingly glad that the news of the earthquake which has wrought such wide-spread disaster in Constantinople, reached this country at a time when the minds of its people were absorbed in the most important questions that have agitated the world for the past thirty years—I refer to the then tariff legislation. Otherwise, I am sure I could have been a more substantial interest throughout the length and breadth of the land. Constantinople has always shown the most friendly and cordial towards this country and its diplomatic representatives, but to all Americans who have lived in the Empire. He is a capable, enlightened, and tolerant ruler, industriously devoted to the welfare of his people, under him Turkey has made marked advances. He has fostered education, arts and sciences, and is doing his utmost for the best interests of the Empire. I enter into the highest esteem, and shall be very glad if any words of mine will awaken sympathy for the sufferers in Constantinople.

Truly yours,
OSCAR S. STRAUS.

A Home for Tired Workers.

One Bright, Christian Woman's Way of Helping Self-Supporting Women.

URS is an age of philanthropy, and of multiplied opportunities for human helpfulness. And when the good Samaritan spirit is stirred in the hearts of Christian men and women, its generous impulses are moved by a desire for the spiritual as well as the physical welfare of those whom they seek to benefit. This higher philanthropy has found many noble exemplifications in the various Homes, Retreats and Rests established by Christian benevolence in many parts of the country.

Four years ago, Mrs. Alida Stanwood, Superintendent of the Christian Aid Society in New York City (and for many years previous connected with the City Mission), lay ill in Saratoga. She had been greatly prostrated, but was now convalescing. During these long and somewhat wearisome days, the desire came to her to make an effort to secure for other self-supporting women, whose health like her own had given way under too severe a strain, just such a resting-place as she was then enjoying. After recovery, the burden still lay on her mind and she began to make inquiries for a house that would be suited for the work. She interested a few people in the project, but sickness intervened and she very reluctantly abandoned the plan for a time. Last summer, while at Lake George, she received a letter from a friend in Saratoga, saying she was about to break up her home and would donate her furniture to a home for tired workers. Mrs. Stanwood, accepted the welcome offer, went at once to Saratoga, and, by a peculiar providence, succeeded in securing the very house that was desired for the work four years ago. The way now seemed clear for the long-cherished plan to be fulfilled, and it was realized that Providence was clearly guiding the efforts made. A lease was executed, although there was not a dollar in sight for payment of the rent, but it was felt that the same Providence would provide means. Sufficient to cover six months' rent was soon received, and the second six months was guaranteed. It is hoped that provision may be made for the endowment of three rooms, to be set aside, absolutely free, for self-supporting women who, by reason of ill-health, or lack of employment and means, are unable to take the rest they so much need. It will cost $75 to endow one room for a season of five months. The desire of the founder is to have the Rest Home entirely free.

The Rest Home is situated on Lincoln avenue, near Broadway, Saratoga Springs, N. Y. It is furnished through the generosity of Miss Augusta Wiggins, New York City. Among others who have substantially assisted in the project are Mrs. Myles of Saratoga, Mrs. Nichols, Saratoga; Miss Baldwin, Mrs. Reed and Miss Buchanan, all of New York; and Mrs. Morris, owner of the building. All interested may address Mrs. Stanwood, 21 Bible House, New York.

DR. TALMAGE HONORED.

On October 26th, immediately after his arrival in London from Australia and India, having almost concluded his round-the-world tour Rev. Dr. Talmage was entertained at a banquet by Sir Henry M. Havelock, the son of Gen. Havelock. "the hero of Lucknow." The banquet took place at the United Service Club and was the occasion of a notable gathering of famous veterans of the great Indian mutiny. Among those who were present to meet Dr. Talmage were Gen. Sir McLeod Innes, Gen. Sir William Olipherts and Gen. Dodgson, all of whom took prominent part in the relief of Lucknow, when its beleaguered and decimated garrison was at the mercy of the rebels. The speeches made had reference to that memorable episode, and the American divine paid a high tribute to British military bravery and the heroic character of the British women in India during that time of peril.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 18, Luke 6: 20-31. Golden Text, Luke 6: 31. By Mrs. Baxter.

IN the ministry of our blessed Lord there were several occasions in which he repeated his teachings. The Sermon on the Mount, as it is usually called, is one instance of his doing this. He had been travelling through Galilee, teaching in the synagogues and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people. Multitudes were attracted to him, but, as was customary with him, he withdrew from the multitudes, and gathered around him his disciples, and he instructed them in the principles of "the gospel of the kingdom." Far other than his disciples thought was

The Kingdom of Heaven.

The restoration of the kingdom to Israel was the constant hope in the Jewish mind, and the disciples of Christ, even after his death and resurrection, still hankered after it (Acts 1: 6). Therefore they heard, when he taught them, with preoccupied minds, not really taking in, and making their own, the truths which ran so counter to their national prejudices and personal anticipations.

It was the kingdom of heaven, a "kingdom" not of this world, of which he taught them the laws and customs, the spirit and principles: a kingdom which cometh not with observation; a kingdom which is neither set up nor maintained by outward force. It my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered unto the Gentiles. Therefore he taught them that the poor in spirit, those who are persecuted for righteousness sake, "theirs is the kingdom of heaven." It was the exact reverse of that which could bring glory to man; and this wonderful and precious discourse was the first full statement of his great message, his coming kingdom, and its spiritual and divine teachings. Then he taught them the contrast between that and the traditions of men, and between his kingdom and the old Jewish law, and an intense call to reality and declaration of the responsibility of such as might enter in at "the strait gate" and yet fail to enter in; such as might bring forth good fruit, and because the tree remains evil, can only be hewn down and cast away; those who might build upon the rock, but instead of doing so, build their house upon the sand.

The Jewish people knew, and even boasted of, the true and holy things contained in the law of God, and yet, as a people, did not even attempt to carry them out. A semblance of religion, a round of ordinances such as would attract to themselves a credit for piety among their fellow creatures was all they cared for, and God they knew not. But in the sermon on the mount, the axe was laid unto the root of the trees, and except their righteousness should exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, the most acknowledged and recognized for piety among them, they should in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.

The sermon on the mount, as our Lord epitomized it to make it his first lesson to his twelve chosen ones, dwells especially on the subjective side of his teaching: Blessed are ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of heaven. None but earth's poor, despised, rejected ones can bear the stamp of divine royalty. Like their master, in order to ascend, they must first descend. They must be content to Hunger Now.

The Christian Church, as a whole, is impatient to find satisfaction now; in their experience in their work, in the regard of other Christians, they must have satisfaction. The kingdom which can wait God's hour and be content—as Abraham was, and the holy men of old, when God was not ashamed of them to be called their God—is wanting in the church of the present day. Like little children, they clamor for present joy, present honor; and they have no idea of hungering and waiting now. They think it is the highest form of religion to seek their own joy and satisfaction now. They do not count it blessed, but they feel that they are greatly wronged if men hate them, separate them from their company, and cast out their name as evil for the Son of man's sake. Yet to one who has entered into the kingdom of heaven into its true spirit, there is the deepest joy in being despised and with the Master; they want no other portion on earth than their Lord had. The Lord did not mince matters: from the very outset he laid down the unearthly nature of the kingdom which he came to set up. Very solemn are the words: "Woe unto you that are rich! for ye have received your consolation" (R.V.). You could not, would not wait God's time; in your childish pettishness you insisted on having your joy and satisfaction now and here. You have sown for time and not for eternity; for yourselves, and not for Christ and his kingdom, and now you have reaped down here what you have sown. "Woe unto you that are full, for ye shall hunger: Woe unto you, ye that laugh now, for ye shall mourn and weep" (R.V.). You would walk by sight, and not by faith, and you cannot reap the harvest of a faith life. Paul the Apostle understood from the very first the true spirit of the kingdom of heaven, and God made him independent of circumstances. When he suffered, it was in fellowship with Christ (Phil. 3: 10). When he rejoiced, it was not in his experience, but in the Lord. "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you, for in the same manner did their fathers unto the false prophets." Perhaps there are few things which touch people in general more than the way in which others speak of them. Human nature loves to get credit to itself; loves to be appreciated, and thought and spoken well of. It is only as God becomes a reality to us, and by the greatness of his holy presence extinguishes man from our horizon, that we become indifferent to the opinion of men, thought or spoken: we stand before God. It was a tremendous, and yet a primary, lesson from the great Master to his early students for the ministry.

The Lord then takes up his teaching of the kindly character in relation to our enemies: "But I say unto you which hear," as in Rev. 2: 3 he sends messages to the overcomers which have ears to hear, which the churches cannot receive. So now this special message is unto you which hear: "Love your enemies; do good to them that hate you; bless them that curse you, and pray for them that despitefully use you." This was strong meat. Even under the old law, in the very word of God, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, impartial justice was the divine rule. But this word of the Master's was something beyond justice, it was sacrifice, and that for the unworthy for those who are in the wrong. All the sense of justice in our nature rebels against such teaching until the lesson of the cross is learned. This settles everything. Human nature must bow before the divine, and the laws of the kingdom must prevail. Thus he amplified his teaching, and entered into detail: To him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other. Do not resist; do not think of what is due to you—Christ was a lamb led to the slaughter. We, if we would be more than conquerors, must also be esteemed as sheep for the slaughter. "And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise," quite independently of how they treat you: this is divine.

Christ came to teach "newness of life"

divine life lived in human beings conformed to his image. He would have the most absolute contrast between his disciples and others. If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature, or creation; old things have passed away, behold all things have become new. Thus he says: And if ye love them that love you, what thank have ye? for even sinners love those that love them. And if ye do good to them that do good to you, what thank have ye? for even sinners do the same. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for even sinners lend to sinners to receive as much again. Where is the newness of life if, when put to the test, we do just as those do who know not God? Are we not false witnesses of him? He calls us to bear witness to a life so new that it never was lived on earth till Jesus lived and ignored himself in his human life that he might teach and empower us to do the same by the spirit of God working in us.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

HAVING appointed his twelve Apostles, as narrated in last week's lesson, Jesus proceeds to state the principles of his mission, which they were to promulgate. His statement is apparently condensed in the passage from the Gospel of Luke, which is selected as the basis for this week's lesson. Luke probably received it at second hand and his report is contained in thirty verses. Matthew, who heard the discourse, gives a much fuller report, occupying a hundred and seven verses. The scene of the discourse was probably the Mount of Hattin, a ridge running a quarter of a mile east and west, between Nazareth and the sea, seven miles south-west of Capernaum. It was a suitable place for such a meeting. There is an elevated plateau on which the people could sit or stand, while at each side rises a knoll about sixty feet high, from the side of which the speaker could be easily seen or heard. The discourse is deeply interesting, both from its circumstances and its subject-matter, even if it is regarded from a merely human standpoint. Here was a new Teacher, whom the people knew simply as a workingman, who had shown marvellous spiritual insight and had proved himself by miracles to have a divine commission, like the ancient prophets. For nearly five hundred years God had sent no message to his people, no prophet had spoken in his name, with clear proofs of having been sent by God. Now One had come. What message had he brought? This discourse is the answer, but not all the answer. Christ had much more to say than he uttered on this occasion. Here we have nothing about faith in himself, nothing about the sacrifice of himself or about his mediation; but he had first to define his attitude toward the dispensation that was dying and to describe the new order. The sermon marks the intermediate step from the Old to the New. Christ says it is not destruction but development. He is not come to destroy, but to fulfil. The essence of the old stripped of its cumbrous coverings of rite and ceremony is to be the essence of the new. The blossom is to fall and the fruit appear. The ten commandments turn into ten blessings. But his hearers are not to imagine that the standard of righteousness is lowered. Christ raises it. Before, the man counted himself guiltless of murder if he did not kill; now he is not guiltless unless his heart is free from the wish to kill. Righteousness is not the character of the man who holds the evil of his nature in check; he is not righteous unless the evil is extirpated. He alone is blessed who is pure in heart; it is he who shall see God. Henceforth this purity of heart is to be the standard of righteousness, and to any discouraged one who complains that it is beyond the attainment of human nature, Christ declares that divine help will be given to all who seek it. The new nature is imparted to the human nature. God will give the Holy Spirit to all who ask him. Thus he saved his hearers a danger which always besets men cut loose from their old convictions, danger of falling into carelessness or licentiousness. They are exhorted, like climbing a mountain, to retain essence but to cast aside superfluities that they go higher.

Give to every one that asketh. This not demand, or sanction indiscriminate charity. Christ's law of love about he had been speaking requires more than that. A loving father would not give his children all they ask. If he did would be injured by it. A substance was being raised for a widow whose band had been killed by a fall from a fold. His employer, who was a member of the Society of Friends declined to anything and as he was a wealthy some very hard things were said him. But he called on the widow a quired into the circumstances. She two children and these were through influence admitted to institutions where boy was taught a trade and the girl cooking. The widow, herself was to a hospital and received training enabled her to earn her own living professional nurse. The Quaker had en nothing to the fund raised for the but who was it that best fulfilled the law of love—those who had only put out a few dollars, or the man who helped the family to support themselves.

To him that smiteth thee on the one cheek. A stalwart soldier was the terror of his regiment. Every new recruit must acknowledge his superiority or fight. The man was in continual brawls had the strength of an ox and delighted nothing so much as a fight with son who considered himself a match for the brawler was converted and his grades were curious to see how he would. It was soon noticed that he did not at time seek quarrels. The men stood in awe of him to provoke him, but time his meekness encouraged a no bully, with whom he had often fought insult him. The converted man patiently and at last the bully flung of hot soup on him and called him a coward. Then the man rose and said as he dismissed from his uniform, "You who me, know whether I am a coward. Not long ago if any man had insulted like this he would have been likely for it with his life. I am just as strong as I was then; but I do not resent because I have the grace of God in me. This man knows it, otherwise he would have done as he has." From that time no one called the converted man a coward.

Love your enemies. During the Revolution, Peter Miller was the pastor of a small Baptist church in Pennsylvania. One of his neighbors had been his enemy for years and missed no opportunity of abusing the Baptists in general and Miller in particular. Miller did not retaliate, but he said more than once the man was more abusive than I shall get even with you yet." C. C. news reached Miller that his enemy had been caught in dealing with the British was treason and there was no doubt guilt. Soon the inevitable end came: traitor was to be hanged. Miller never heard of it than he set out on the Philadelphia, thirty miles away to with Washington for his life. He told that his plea was useless: Was he could not spare his friend's life. "F" exclaimed the worthy minister, "his friend of mine; he is the only enemy in the world." Washington looked searchingly. "Will you tell me," he asked, "what motive impelled you to walk miles to save the life of your enemy?" The minister took his New Testament from his pocket and showed Washington the passage. "I grant you his plea was the laconic reply. With the paper in his pocket Miller hurried to the place of execution and arrived just as the condemned man was being carried to the scaffold. He noticed Miller running and recognized him. "There's Peter," he said to his guard, "he's walked away from Ephrata to have the pleasure of seeing me hanged." The words were scarcely spoken before Miller ran to the side and producing the pardon said, "I have my revenge."

Traditions and Legends.

ish Tales Connected With the Church of the Holy Sepulchre—Professional Beggars—"The Stone that would have Cried Out."

VESPERS are singing, or intoning in the Chapel of St. Helena while we loiter in this corner. Much visiting of churches has accustomed our senses, and not unpleasantly.

to the throbbing echoes awakened in the dome by responsive chanting and organ accompaniment. We rather like the smell of good incense, and the æsthetic is gratified by the "dim religious" produced by the blending of lamp-light and the faint daylight that finds its way through the stained glass windows.

Now we are in no mood for enjoying æsthetic effects. Even Mrs. Sharpe, as Miss Sharpe, must have supped her fill of superstition and churchly tradition in her frequent visits to the sanctuary reared by the founders. They believed to the last of the authenticity of the story that the gorgeous altar in the low-ceiled chamber over yonder, the Tomb from which Christ arose on the first Easter morning, is the depths of aching hearts we wish we could credit it and one-tenth of the tales poured into our ears with volubility acquired by continual practice. We see the sacristan who has us in tow steady as in the eyes, for sign of faltering or embarrassment, as he runs off legend after legend as an auctioneer extols his wares.

Jerusalem has three chapels attached to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, erected by a different sect of Christians. It is even harder to believe in it than the pulchre, and it is yet more effectually discredited by precious metals and marbles. The square opening above the socket in the wall in which the foot of the cross is reputed to have been sunk, is lined and bound with silver. Scarcely six feet away is what looks like a ventilator of open brass-work, the upon payment of a fee, is slid aside to show a fissure in a rock, said to have been made by the earthquake that rent the veil of the Temple during the Crucifixion. In the succession are exhibited with business-like promptness, the spot where Mary Magdalen fell upon her knees, exclaiming, "Rabboni!" the grave of Joseph of Arimathea, the prison in which our Lord was detained until the Sanhedrim could be collected; the tomb of Nicodemus and of James the brother of John and son of Zebedee, who was killed by the sword in Herod's persecution of the early church; the Pillar of Pilate, the place where the Roman soldiery parted the raiment among them, asking lots for the vesture; the bough in which the kid was entangled as a substitute for Isaac, and the altar on which Abraham would have sacrificed his son; the tomb of Adam in whose dust we are told the cross was set up,—and so many other notable places that I have not the heart to write a list which could not but disgust the sensible reader and pain the devout.

We are driven, whether we will or not, to expect at every new exhibition, Dr. Merrill's allusion to the revenue drawn from his marvelous—I had almost written monstrous—collection of sacred curios, and to wonder, only, at the economic instinct that gathered so many under the one domed roof of the Holy Sepulchre. Nor is it possible being human and readers of the Bible, we should fail to remind ourselves and another in connection with the venders of charms, charms and photographs within the church, and painted candles within the riot raised by the craftsmen of Ephesus when the trade in silver shrines for Diana was threatened by Paul's preaching.

The ablest scholars who have studied and written upon sacred history, agree in declaring that this cannot be the true Calvary; that the site of the Holy Sepulchre never was within the city walls, and corresponds in no particular to the description of the holy spot given by the evangelists. The fact will never be admitted by those whose interest it is to encourage pilgrimages to the Mecca of Christendom.

It is like a breath of purer, honester air when David again takes us in hand and conducts us into a side-room to see the sword and Jerusalem-Cross badge worn by Godfrey of Bouillon. They are kept in a locked coffer, and shown upon the payment of a trifling sum to the sacristan. The Syrian dragoman lifts the great weapon carefully and lays it in Alcides' hand with:

While on a visit to Jerusalem twelve years ago, he went to sleep one night, well, and waking next morning, could not open his eyes "for a great swelling which made his head so large"—describing an area about it with his hand. He went to a physician who put something into his eyes that burned like fire, or boiling water, and from that time he has been totally blind, unable to tell day from night. A blind man cannot work in the fields or tend cattle or thresh grain, so he came to this city and makes a living by begging. He has children who give him a home where he may sleep at night, but they are poor—very poor, and he will not be a burden to them. Being a Christian, he is allowed to sit here and ask alms of those who come to pray or to see the church. Sometimes, in the season of visitors, or at Christmas and Easter, he makes as much as four piastres a day (fifteen cents of our money), sometimes he makes but two piastres, sometimes but half a piastre, sometimes but eight paras (the lowest of value in Syrian coins, being many times less than one cent.)

David is still translating when Mrs. Sharpe comes up the steps, rising oddly out of the darkness, first, her white face, then her hands, becoming visible against the black background and her black dress. She stops to listen and we see that her eyes are large with tears, her face pure and sol-

A second beggar sits at the head of still another staircase, and here, too, the sunshine never falls. His is a meaner figure than that we have just left, but made picturesque by a pretty little girl, not more than eight years of age, who leans against his knee and regards us with big, solemnly pathetic eyes. They have been here all day, and come every day in the week, the child leading him from his home outside of the city walls to his place upon the steps about eleven o'clock in the day, few tourists visiting the church before that hour. The child looks like a plant that has grown in a cellar, pale, and slight to fragility, so poor of blood that she shivers all over now and then, under her thin cotton gown. Her father was blinded by a sunstroke while working in the fields before she was born, and has no business but beggary.

"I have been told that every professional beggar in Jerusalem would be cared for by the convents and other religious organizations," I say to David when we are out of the church and climbing Christian street.

"There are a great many of them, Madam, and as they must be supported by charity, having no work to do, and knowing no trade of any sort, they are free to come and go when they beg for themselves from anybody who happens along, than if they had to obey rules and accommodate themselves to certain hours, and all that. To them, their way of living is as respectable as to ask alms of a religious society. They may be wrong, but that is the way they feel about it."

The idea is novel, and there may be something in it—in Jerusalem. The poverty of means and of resources prevailing among the lower classes here is patent and pitiable.

The afternoon is fine and cold, and we walk from one side of the city to the other before returning to the hotel—not an arduous undertaking, the entire circumference of the walls being less than three miles. We are hurrying somewhat to get back in season for dinner when for the second time to-day we encounter Dr. and Mrs. Sharpe. Whereas we have been glad of the opportunity afforded by the former meeting to modify a harsh judgment, we wish now that we had taken another turning of the narrow thoroughfare in which we find them. For the husband's hair bristles pugnaously, and the wife has on her most amiably-obstinate expression.

"I don't see why not, doctor dear," we hear in nearing them. "What more natural than that He might have pointed to that very stone in speaking the words, and devout men would be sure to treasure it piously afterward."

"Of all the sacrilegious enormities"—sputters her spouse, and we quicken our speed to get out of hearing.

The cause of dispute is known to us, having been designated by Dr. Merrill in one of our earlier walks about Jerusalem.

It is a time-stained stone built into the wall of a filthy cross-street, a round, common-looking fragment, with a hole in it, an aperture enlarged and discolored by the kisses of devotees. The relic is believed by others besides Mrs. Sharpe to be "the stone that would have cried out, had the whole multitude of disciples rejoicing and praising God with a loud voice," have held their peace in the Master's triumphant progress into the city.

That the appeal of the Pharisees to him to silence the acclamations, and the Lord's reply are plainly said to have been spoken at the descent of the Mount of Olives, avails nothing with those who make the Word of God of none effect through their traditions.

Can human effrontery and the credulity of superstition go further?

ENTRANCE TO THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.

Engraved from a photograph secured for "The Christian Herald."

"There, sir, is the sword of your favorite hero! He must have been a great man in more ways than one, if he used that in battle."

The badge is several inches long, and both it and the sword are evidently extremely old. Our interest in them being merely a matter of hero-worship, we do not tread upon, to us, debatable ground in choosing to believe them genuine relics of the stout-hearted, stainless Knight of St. John.

At the head of the steps leading into the dismal Chapel of the Invention of the Cross, sits an old man, with a noble head and a white beard, such as we see in pictures of Abraham. He is turbaned, and wears the brown-and-white abieh of the fellahen. He raises his face at the sound of our footsteps, and we see that he is blind.

"For the love of God and for holy charity," he quavers, holding out a tin cup.

"A professional beggar," I remark. "He might be King Lear, or Belshazzar, or Homer. Get his story, if you can, please!"

He tells it readily, but not officiously. According to it, he is a farmer from Ophrah-emn for all the babyish roundness and softness it will never outgrow.

"And what do you think then of a Heavenly Father who lets you go to bed hungry?" she interpolates as the last pitiful sum is named.

"I go to sleep, and trust him for to-morrow," the man makes answer in simplicity that sounds sincere.

"Tell him that is right," Mrs. Sharpe instructs David, "and never, never to doubt him. Tell him, too, how sorry I am that he must sit here all day long in the darkness and where it is so damp, and ask him to pray for me to-night."

She has dropped two francs into the tin cup and hurries away to avoid his thanks.

"I believe that is a good woman," utters David, peering into the cup where the silver shines bright upon a layer of copper coins. Then to the beggar, "You have there two francs. When you buy your supper see that you do not pass them off for pennies. And don't forget to pray for the lady."

A PLAIN BELIEF.

MANY years ago, when I entered the ministry, I resolved that I would not interfere with any religious worker, however different his theories and modes might be from mine. I have fulfilled my promise.

So much for the ecclesiastical controversies of the day. But people all over the country, in the church and out of the church, are now telling what they believe and what they do not believe; so I suppose my turn has come to tell what I believe.

I believe in God the good, the kind, the loving, the just, the self-existent, the omnipotent. I believe in Jesus Christ, with a heart large enough to include the whole race in his compassion, and perhaps other worlds, for I do not know but that he has done as much for other spheres as he has done for ours. I believe in the Holy Ghost, a wooing, coaxing, elevating, sublimating, purifying, gracious personage—gentle as the dove that symbolized him at the baptism and yet as intense as the fiery tongues which covered the heads of the disciples at the Pentecost. I believe in a soul immortal, winged for eternal flight and having free choice whether that flight shall be upward or downward. I believe in a heaven built on so vast a scale that there is room for all angelhood, all manhood, all womanhood, all childhood, and not a monopoly for a few, but twelve gates for all. I believe in a perdition, the abode of those who are soul suicides, for God pushes no man off the precipice. He jumps off. "O! Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself! O! Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself!" You see, it is self-destruction. If a man is in peril and there are twelve gates, wide open, to let him out, and he turns his back on the twelve gates and jumps into the crater of a volcano, who is to blame? Certainly not the man who swung open the twelve gates. And if any man misses heaven, it will not be God's fault, but the fault of those who perish. "Ah!" says someone, "how can a merciful God allow any suffering hereafter?" I will answer your question as easily as you will answer mine. Why does a merciful God allow that good woman to marry a man who makes her life a hell on earth? Why can a merciful God allow bad people to prosper in health, while men who spend their lives in doing good succumb to disease? You answer my question, and I will answer yours. You tell me why a merciful God allowed sin to come into this world, then I will tell you why God lets suffering go into the nether world. I get on and I say, I believe in baptism, the water beautifully symbolic of a cleansing of the soul, and whether the bright liquid drop from a wooden cup, as when in holy rite the Covenanters of Scotland sprinkled their children among the highlands, or whether the candidate have whole Jordans roll over him. I believe in the King's banquet, commonly called the Lord's Supper, and welcome to its table all who acknowledge allegiance to him. I believe in the brotherhood of man; all of one blood, all having the same rights, all made in the image of God, and that he who insults a man, however obscure, strikes in the face his Maker.

These cardinal truths I have been preaching all these years, and I have no prospect of changing. I am all the more indisposed to change because I have noticed that those who get off the track are like a rail-train off the track, tumbling down the embankments; they roll over and over and over from place to place, now one side, now the other. Now they wonder about this and now they wonder about that, and most of them end in agnosticism. That is, they do not believe anything. That is generally the depot at which they fetch up. They call it progress, and it is progress; but it is progress into a bank of mud.

THE LESSON OF FAILURE.

THERE is one very mean thing about human nature, namely, its disposition to jump on a man when he is down. Ever and anon, the community must have a scapegoat, or some one upon whom others can put their wrong-doing. People unload the blame from their own shoulders and put it upon some one unfortunate. You wrong every man when you unnecessarily put on him temptations greater than he can bear. Put into a young man's hand a million of dollars belonging to other people, let him draw his own checks and submit his accounts to no scrutiny, and you be satisfied with taking your three per cent. a month without asking how he gets it, and you have sinned against him as much as he ever possibly can sin against you. A ship company who sends out an untaught craft under an inexperienced commander, into a Caribbean whirlwind, is responsible for the shipwreck. Let us cut up the results of any great commercial disaster into slices and give to each his share of the blame, instead of making one offender the scapegoat for all the recklessness and indiscretion. While you put some of your investments on earth, put some of them in Heaven. No "run" on the celestial bank can ever break it, or cause its doors to close. Its capital is made up of all the resources or infinity, immensity and eternity. And when good men are halted it ought to impress people with the importance of making good use of money while they have it.

I knew two men who had these theories in business years ago. The one man was giving largely to Christian and philanthropic objects. The other man said: "Now that is all very well, but how if you should come into some financial crisis and you should not be able to meet all your obligations? I am going to wait until I make my fortune, and having made a large fortune, then I am going to be charitable and benevolent." Time passed on. They both kept on making money. The man who made a large fortune and all the time kept largely contributing to charitable objects, came to the end of his life in a vast estate. The other man, who had given nothing at all until he had made a great fortune, died poorer than a pauper. Lay not up for yourself treasures where moth and rust can corrupt and where stock-gamblers may break through and steal; but lay up for yourself treasures in heaven. Mark well this fact: When a man fails in business he is always blamed, always misrepresented, always pursued, always made miserable unless he has the Eternal God to fall back upon. You suppose yourself to be a man of integrity and a Christian. You have that idea of yourself. I have the same idea in regard to you. But you fail to-morrow in business, and I will prove from some who now pretend to be your friends, that you are a defaulter, a hypocrite, an unmitigated scoundrel—in a word, that you ought to be either imprisoned or hung. You get going down hill and I will find fifty people glad to help you in the descent and act as cheerful pall-bearers and gravediggers at your financial obsequies. That which I hear against men when they are unfortunate makes no impression on my mind. The atmosphere gets malarialized with an infernalism which rejoices in the overthrow of a financier, and the higher he is up the greater the happiness of some people when he comes down. There is only one healthful Christian mood in which at such times you and I ought to stand, and that is of intense, enlarged, prayerful Christian sympathy. Put the best phase you can on every man's misfortune. Do not call it a rascality when it may have been only a mistake. Divide up among many the condemnation which you are tempted to put upon one or two or three.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

R. Oliver, Trowbridge, Ont. As the Good Templars of this place intend sending a box of clothing to the Minnesota fire sufferers, we ask you to indicate where it should be sent?

Send it to the headquarters, Relief Committee, Pine City, Minn.

M. A. S. Is it wrong for a person, who does not profess religion, to lead in prayer in public meeting?

Ordinarily such an act would be rank hypocrisy; yet there might be circumstances in which it would be entirely right. If an unbeliever, whether in public or in private, came under conviction of sin and was impelled to cry to God for pardon, it would be right to encourage such prayer.

J. Parsons, Poughkeepsie, N. Y. How many Buddhists are there in the world to-day and how many Hindus?

Prof. Rhys David and other eminent authorities estimate that there are 500,000,000 Buddhists or fully 40 per cent. of the earth's inhabitants. Hindus are 13 per cent. and Moslems 12½ per cent. Christianity has fully 26 per cent.

Mrs. Mary Rutledge, Fort Madison, Ia., writes:

I wish to thank you for making my request known through the MAIL-BAG, asking for literature for State prison work. The subscribers of your most excellent paper answered this request, as they do all others, most liberally, from all over the Union and even from Canada. I thank all of you, in Jesus' name and ask your believing prayers for the work.

Lucinda Silsbee, Slatteryville, N. Y., sends verses on the Constantinople earthquake and urges pity for the sufferers in these lines:

"Cast thy bread upon the waters,"
Trusting in His holy name,
After many days He tells us,
We from Him will find the same.

Subscriber, Mahaffey, Pa. Is it wrong for a man who is trying to live a just, upright life, to play instrumental music? If not, what kind of music should he play?

Music is one of the most elevating and spiritualizing influences, whether vocal or instrumental, and has been used in worship from time immemorial. It is an accomplishment which every Christian might cultivate to advantage, but it should be properly used and not abused or degraded. Any instrument is consecrated by being put to a righteous use.

Wellwisher, Reedsburg, Wis. What books are most suitable for boys between the ages of 8 and 15 to read?

It depends greatly upon the taste and inclination of the boys. Some take a deep interest in history and books of travel and adventure; others in works of imagination, etc. Many young people would be charmed with such books as Plutarch's "Lives," "Pilgrim's Progress," Dickens', Scott's and Cooper's tales, and Jules Verne's stories; others of poetic tastes might prefer Milton's, Longfellow's, Whittier's or Emerson's poems, while still others would delight in Knox's books of travel, Stanley's "Darkest Africa," Irving's "Life of Washington," or Willard Glazier's books of travel and adventure. A thousand books might be named, as suitable for young folks.

H. Roberts, Minn. Fla. and E. J. Johnson, North Bend, Wash. What does the Moravian Mission consist of? Of what nationality are the members, and when and where was it organized?

A remnant of the Hussites in 1457 formed themselves into communities, and established themselves in Moravia and Bohemia under the name of the Unitas Fratrum or United Brethren. In 1722 a number of their descendants were assembled on the estate of Count Zinzendorf at Bethelsdorf, Oberlausitz, and were the originators of the "Brotherhood." They were established in this country in 1735. Their creed holds the principles of Christianity in common with other Christian denominations, but they insist on a diligent study of the Bible, a moral and inwardly pious life and the maintenance of strict church discipline. They are essentially peaceful in their attitude toward all other sects and denominations and to the world in general. Their leading doctrines are: belief in human depravity; the benign sovereign God the Father and the real godhead of the manhood of Jesus; the all-sufficiency of Atonement. Their church is divided into great provinces, German, British and American, each independent in its own local affairs, each with a provincial Synod, but all united in regard to fundamental principles and the general welfare.

S. C. Tussing, New Lexington, O. What did mean by saying that the least in the kingdom of heaven was greater than John the Baptist?

Greater in position, not in personal character. It is as if you compared a boy school with some ancient astronomer. By his knowledge of the discoveries of Ptolemy, Newton, &c., is farther in advance the most learned astronomer who lived them. The humblest Christian is similar advance of all who lived before Christ, including John the Baptist.

L. J. G., Chadd's Ford, Pa. I notice in the Prophecy published in your journal, Jews and Israelites, are spoken of as peoples; were they not one and the same?

No, the Jews are the descendants of the tribe of the Southern Kingdom of which was the chief tribe. The Israelites were people of the Northern Kingdom of Israel separation of the kingdom into these described in I Kings 12 and in II Ch. The people of Israel were absorbed in nations and are consequently lost. Many ogists think that the Anglo-Saxon race sends the people of the Kingdom of Israel.

K. H. J., Cleveland, O. Should not religious instruction in the public schools, if this is a country, as it professes to be?

We think religion should not be taught in the public schools. It is not their business. Children should receive their religious instruction and training at home and in church Sunday School. It would be unfair to who differed from the religious teaching might be given in the public schools, to them in the dilemma of either having children taught what they believe to be or depriving them of secular education, as a Protestant, lived in a community the majority of whom, being Roman Catholics, the power to have their creed taught in the schools, you would justly feel that it was wrong that the money you pay in taxes being used to propagate Catholicism on the rising generation.

Constant Reader, Lamborn, Kans. (1) Was Apostle Paul baptized? If so, by whom what mode? (2) What did he mean by being baptized unto Moses (I Cor. 10:2)? (3) Was descendant of the Israelites who came to Egypt?

(1) Yes. You will find the record in I Cor. 10:2. Presumably Ananias baptized him; it is not so stated there. It was not in his point of view. As you will see in I Cor. 12:13, he regarded the baptism of the person who administered the rite of secondary importance. Nor is anything in the record as to the mode. (2) Paul was initiated into the Mosaic Covenant. Paul was comparing the position of the under the two dispensations, and exhorting Christians who had confessed Christ to baptism, to be watchful. He reminded that although the Israelites had seen through many solemnizing experience and Moses, many fell away. (3) In Daniel is described as being of the tribe of Judah whose descendants came out of Egypt those of the other patriarchs.

Mrs. C. E. A., Baltimore, Md., C. G., L. W. Thos. S. Conrad, Jacksonville, Fla., Mr. Wears, and several others, replying to the G. A. C., Fishers Mill, Va., have forwarded their where shall rest be found, which we publish as part of this issue.—Rev. C. F. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

ROYALTY IN MADAGASCAR.

FRENCH journals are now sanguine of a triumph in the great island of the Indian Ocean. They announce that the Hovas have consulted England and have been advised to yield to the claims of French government. The French emperor is consequently merely waiting the formal ratification of the terms. If the Queen really about to comply with the French demands, she is doing so with extreme reluctance; but she and her husband, being well-informed persons, are aware that resistance to France would be hopeless, without the help of some European power. Like King of Siam, she may therefore yield, and a worse thing happen to her. France in that case acquire a rich prize at little cost, and with as little risk as a well-armed band incurs in despoiling a defenceless ruler. The country is rich in minerals, and, if it were better cultivated, would produce enormous quantities of sugar, cotton and tobacco. The interior, however, is inhabited by people utterly unlike the Hovas, having far less civilization and being much more wilful. The Queen and her predecessors have never been able entirely to subdue them, after suffering defeat before several numbers, they retreat to inaccessible fastnesses in the mountains, to recover strength and renew the conflict. They are likely to prove a thorn in the side of the French if the island becomes a French province. At present the demand appears to be only for a protectorate and if the Queen submits, further demands may not be made. Hitherto she has refused to yield and her rights in the matter have not been respected by European nations and by the United States. The people now would gladly fight for her against the French, whom they hate, but the slaughter would be useless and resistance would, besides, give their powerful enemies the excuse they require for a war of conquest. The Queen and her husband, who is the prime-minister, commander-in-chief, and actual ruler of the country, are averse to war and are advised by the missionaries to whom the country owes civilization. The Queen herself is a member of the Congregational Church in Antananarivo and is a very devout woman. In her trial she has the sympathy of religious people here and in England though they are powerless to help her. She has, however, the consolation which the Preacher uttered long ago when he saw "oppression and the violent perverting of justice in a province that He that is higher than the highest regardeth." (Eccles. 5 : 8.)

Disturbed Foundation.

Some alarm has been caused among the occupants of one of New York's many-erected buildings by the appearance of several large cracks in its front. Another high building is being erected adjacent to it and the contractors of the new building sank its foundation ten feet deeper than of its neighbor. Apprehensions were felt at the stability of the older building might be impaired by the excavation in its vicinity. The owners, therefore, determined to make a new and deeper foundation for it. They shored up the walls and dug down the foundation and built arches below. When all was finished, the shoring timbers were removed and the owners believed that their building was safe from harm. At the huge structure settled on its new foundation and appears to have done so evenly, for a huge crack extending through three stories, and about an inch in width is now seen. The occupants are now anxiously inquiring whether that is the extent of the damage, or whether it is a sign of a further settling and consequent insecurity. The cracks excite a good deal of attention from passers-by as the walls of the building are very massive. Sometimes there is similar surprise when cracks and blemishes appear in the character of men, whose religion and integrity have been long admired. They may often be traced to a cause analogous to that which has affected the building. There has been a disturbance of the foundations of faith, which were not laid upon the sure basis of Christ and his Gospel. (1. Cor. 3 : 11.)

A Novel Wound.

The secret cause of the long suffering endured by a working man in Texas was discovered recently. About six weeks ago, one of the saws in the works of a manufacturing company was noticed working unevenly. As an accident was liable to result, a skilful mechanic was sent for immediately to fix it. The power was stopped until while the steel was in the flesh. Injudicious friends often cause spiritual suffering in the same way. The wounded spirit of the convicted sinner is not so much in need of healing as of purifying and the extirpation of evil. God made it a ground of complaint against the prophets who falsely professed to speak in his name, that they had healed the hurt of his people slightly. (Jer. 6 : 14.)

An Old Boundary Dispute.

One of the questions still unsettled, relating to the boundaries of States, is an intricate one, in which Delaware and New Jersey are concerned. It involves jurisdiction over the river opposite New Castle, and for some distance above and below. New Jersey insists that her jurisdiction extends to the middle of the river there as elsewhere, while Delaware claims jurisdiction at that point clear across to the New Jersey shore. Charles II, granted to his brother James, Duke of York, about the year 1683, a portion of the Delaware peninsula. The grant specially gave James a circular piece of land twelve miles about New Castle, and seemingly from the language the bed of the stream. James gave the land to William Penn, and this land afterwards became the State of Delaware. It is upon the language of this grant that Delaware claims jurisdiction over the whole river opposite New Castle. People are often similarly in doubt about the boundaries of the church and the world. Certain amusethe service, was a special favorite with her. She rose with the congregation, and her lips mechanically followed the words. Suddenly she felt a strange sensation in her throat, and, to her amazement, she heard distinctly from her own lips the concluding words of the refrain, "By his own hand he leadeth me." She sank to her seat completely overcome. "I am not ill," she said to a friend who was with her, "but I have found my voice." She is now able to speak audibly and distinctly. It was a singular recovery, which the physicians are at a loss to explain. If some Christians, who are unable to speak for Christ, would adopt the same mode of treatment by going to church and joining in singing his praises, they, too, might, like this lady, find their voice, and be no longer useless. (Ps. 34:1,2.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mrs. Amanda Smith has been holding Revival services at Cork, Ireland. The meetings were held in Wesley Chapel and in Central Hall. She had large audiences and was warmly welcomed.

Evangelistic Meetings conducted by the Rev. J. C. Radding, of York, Neb., at Axtell, Kans., have resulted in many conversions. Over forty persons united with the various churches. Twenty-two of these were received into the Presbyterian church.

News of the Death of Mr. Henry Densmore, one of the pioneer missionaries of the American Sunday School Union, will be received with sorrow in a large number of homes. Mr. Densmore was seized with paralysis while at Blanchard, Mich., on October 17, and he died October 24. He had actively served the Union for twenty-eight years, during which he organized 450 Sunday Schools.

The new Secretary, elected by the American Board at its annual meeting in Madison, Wis., to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Rev. N. G. Clark, D.D., is Rev. James L. Barton, D.D., who was formerly Secretary of the East Turkey Mission, and Theological instructor at Harpoot.

Among the Obituary Notices in the Washington, D. C. journals is one of Judge Macon B. Allen, who enjoyed the distinction of being the first colored man admitted to the bar in the United States.

The First District Convention of the Christian Workers of the United States and Canada was held at Rochester, N. Y., October 25-31. Among the speakers were: Rev. John C. Collins; Rev. H. H. Kelsey of Hartford; Mr. C. F. Cutter of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, New York; Rev. E. H. Byington, of the Open Air Workers of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Miss E. L. Clarke, the Friend of Factory Girls of Toronto, Canada; Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, of the Door of Hope, New York; and Rev. David Allen Reed of the Christian Industrial League of Springfield, Mass.

The Grand Jury of Union Co., N. J., uttered the following important warning to churches where church fairs are held in its presentment recently: "We cannot close our eyes to the fact that it has become a prevalent evil among many churches, and various organizations of this county to raise money for various purposes by means of what the law has clearly adjudged to be a lottery. In order to stop such practices, and to give ample notice to all of our churches who engage therein, that they are liable to indictment, we have determined to make this presentment, and refrain from presenting indictments. We particularly address ourselves to the clergy men and officers of the various churches in this county who have heretofore violated the law."

A Home for Bible Workers in Chicago has been dedicated at 35 South Ada Street. There are really two houses—one a home for those in charge if needed, and a larger house in which about sixty young women can live. The work is intended to be carried on as an arm of the regular Bible work of the city. It has thus far been very useful and eminently successful.

A Congregational Chapel in South London which was abandoned for a larger and better situated place of worship has been purchased for use as a College Settlement. It has been named Robert Browning Hall, after the poet who was baptized there.

The London County Council Which has the charge of licensing saloons in the English Metropolis is closing up saloons the licenses of which became void. So far the value of the licenses which have thus lapsed through the determination of the Council to curtail the traffic is $150,000.

The Presbyterian Board of Missions has now three centres of work in South America. These are in Brazil, Chili and Columbia. It has fifty-three male and female missionaries, one of whom is a physician, laboring in the three countries besides seventy-seven native helpers. Last year 320 converts were received into membership. In the schools conducted by the mission there are 1618 pupils.

Japan's Need of Missionaries and the Advantages of the country as a mission field are emphasized by the recently published report of its last census. From this it appears that there are in Japan 123 towns, with a population of from 10,000 to more than 1,000,000. These contain a population of about 7,000,000. Besides these there are about 4,512 towns with populations of from 1,000 to 10,000.

Mr. Robert Jones, the Ruling Elder of the Lombard St. Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, has had the unique gratification of celebrating his fiftieth anniversary of his ordination as elder. Fifty years of continuous service in the office is a record which it is believed is unparalleled in the history of Presbyterianism in America.

RESIDENCE OF THE CONSORT AND PRIME MINISTER OF THE QUEEN OF MADAGASCAR.

he came; and was then applied again that he might see what was wrong. The saw had not been in motion more than a minute, when a series of snapping sounds was heard, and broken pieces of steel spring flew in all directions. The foreman felt a stinging sensation in the neck and found himself bleeding freely. He went to a surgeon, who stopped the bleeding and, seeing that it was a clean cut, gave the man a lotion to bathe it with. The wound, speedily healed, but in a few days became extremely painful. The man's breathing was affected and the pain increased daily. He was unable to work and at last travelled to the nearest hospital for treatment. A careful examination revealed no cause for the suffering; but after a time a minute dark mark was observed under the skin. This was found to be metallic and when an operation was performed for its removal, a piece of thin steel spring, two inches long, was taken out. There was no difficulty then in understanding why the man had suffered so much. The surgeon, who first dressed the wound had erred in hearing it ments and pleasures lie in this debatable borderland, and members of the church often venture there to seek them. It is an unwise thing to do, for, unlike the citizens of the two States, they cannot cross the border without entering the territory of their implacable enemy, and they are safe only in keeping well within the line. (Prov. 4 : 15.)

A Lost Voice Recovered.

A remarkable restoration of the power of speech is reported by the Indianapolis "News." It states that four years ago a lady suffered severely from an attack of the grippe. She recovered, but the disease, affected her voice. She could not utter a word articulately. Since that time, although enjoying her customary health, she could communicate with her family only by writing. She formerly sang in the choir of the Baptist Church, and, as she was passionately fond of music, the deprivation was keenly felt by her. She continued to attend church, and was there as usual one Sunday morning recently. The hymn, "He leadeth me," announced at the close of

WALKING ON THE WAVES.

A Sermon delivered in the First Baptist Church, Richmond, Va., by Rev. Dr. J. B. Hawthorne, of Atlanta, Ga. Text: Matt. 14: 29: "When Peter was come out of the ship he walked on the water, to go to Jesus."

UST after Jesus had performed the miracle of feeding the multitude with the few loaves and fishes, the enthusiasm of the people rose to the highest pitch. They believed him to be the long-promised Messiah, and in the wildness of their joy they were about to lay hands upon him, and compel him to be their king. Knowing that his own immediate followers were somewhat in sympathy with this feeling, and desiring to remove them from the temptation to which they were about to be subjected, he commanded them to get into a vessel and go over to the other side of the Sea of Galilee. Dismissing the multitude to their homes, he went up alone into a mountain to rest and pray. Night came down, and with the night a furious storm—one of those famous hurricanes so common in that region. The face of the little inland sea was like a huge boiling caldron. The mad waves rose like mountains, and the wild winds roared like an army of infuriated beasts. All night the disciples were in imminent peril. In vain they tried to row their little ship to shore.

Through all this danger and struggle Jesus watched them from his mountain retreat. He knew their situation, and his loving heart responded to every fear that agitated their breasts. As the black night began to recede before the advancing dawn they saw a mysterious being, in human form, walking towards them over the surging billows. Very naturally, the horror which they already experienced was intensified by the appearance of this unknown and weird visitor. Full of the superstition so common to their time and country, they supposed it to be some being from the spirit world, and gave vent to their fear in cries that mingled with the bellowing storm. But immediately an answer to their exclamations of alarm came to them in a voice which they had heard before—a voice whose every accent was tenderness and pity, and more soothing than any music that mortal minstrel ever made: "It is I; be not afraid."

A Loving Request.

No sooner had the impulsive Peter heard these words, than he shouted back, "Lord, if it be thou, bid me come to thee on the water." Peter did not mean to be presumptuous. He was not ambitious to do something which would distinguish him above his brethren. In this request he simply expressed an enlarged and intensified love for Jesus, and a stronger faith in his benignity, power, and divinity. And the Saviour, knowing what was in his heart, said to him, "Come." And when Peter was come down out of the ship, he walked on the water to go to Jesus. He did well for awhile. He stepped upon the water, and it was to him like a solid pavement beneath his feet. But when he ceased looking at the Master, and turned his eyes upon the terror of the storm, fear seized him, and beginning to sink in the raging sea, he cried, "Lord, save, or I perish." Then Jesus, impelled by the same love and compassion which he had so often displayed towards Peter and his brethren, stretched forth his hand and caught him, saying, "Oh thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?"

In this fragment of inspired history, we see a miracle. Christ walking upon the water and empowering Peter to do the same, was no illusion, no creation of an excited imagination, no feat of legerdemain. It was a reality—just as much a reality as the storm that lashed the sea into a raging fury. If it was a reality, it was a miracle.

What is a miracle? "It is a work out of the usual sequence of secondary causes and effects, and produced by the direct agency of God." "It is a departure from that uniformity which is the general characteristic of what we call nature." It is not the suspense of a natural force, but the temporary intervention of a higher and stronger force. I hold a ball of lead in my hand. The force of gravitation which draws that ball towards the earth is not suspended. It is the intervention of

in my hand and arm, that keeps it from falling to the earth. The operation of natural forces would have sunk Christ's body beneath the waves of the sea, but the intervention of a mightier force, emanating from the Eternal Godhead within him, held him securely on the crest of the surging billows.

If you believe in the personality of God, you can have no real difficulty in admitting the possibility of a miracle. If God is a person, who operates the machinery of nature in a certain uniform way, you must admit that he can, if he choose, deviate from that uniformity, in a certain instance, to accomplish a purpose which he deems important.

There are some faint-hearted and weak-kneed theologians of our day, who are so intimidated by infidel rationalists, that they have ceased to contend for the reality of the miracles recorded in the Bible. They have fallen back upon the untenable and absurd position that the Gospel can stand without the miracles. It seems to me that a child can see that if the miracles of the New Testament were unreal, the Gospel is false, and the author of it a trickster and deceiver. Christ stood up among men, and in words the most simple and emphatic, laid claim to supernatural power. To repudiate his miracles is to repudiate him, and brand him as a lying impostor. It is worse than absurd—it is simply idiotic, to say that the Gospel can stand without the miracles.

of that apostle, who, notwithstanding his notable weaknesses, was a man of great virtues, and one eminently worthy of universal admiration and affection. He wore no mask. He was perfectly transparent in every word and act of his life. He made no concealment of his thoughts and feelings. He was not only free from cunning duplicity, but, at times, he seemed to be devoid of ordinary caution. In none of his undertakings did he foresee the difficulties, and count the cost. But combined with this generous and uncalculating impetuosity, there was, at times, a lack of stability of faith and purpose. While he was grandly courageous in some places, he could be disgracefully timid in others. Only a few hours after he had drawn his sword and defied a mob, he was frightened by the words of a servant girl into a base denial of his Lord and Master. Here we see him jumping overboard to walk on the high waves of a storm-tossed sea. What an exhibition of faith and courage! We search in vain the records of human conduct to find something which excels it. But a few moments afterwards, while he is stepping with majestic stride from wave to wave, he is smitten with fear, and cries, like a frightened child, for help.

Now it is very easy to criticize Peter, and to say that he was too hasty, too rash, too presumptuous, and that having started with a sublime faith and boldness to do a perilous act, he should have persevered to the end. We must not forget that the very height to which, for a moment, his faith had attained, exposed him, more than others, to the temptation to unbelief. His brethren who did not dare to step out on the water, but sat securely in their boats, were not so liable to sink as was Peter, who went marching over the billows; and therefore, they had less temptation to doubt and fear.

The man of even temperament, who is rarely excited or disturbed about anything, is apt to be a very incompetent and unjust critic of one who is very impressible, very emotional, and capable of great and sudden fluctuations of feeling. Some people experience no because they have no elevations. Their religious career is a dead level, and a very low level. They never fall, because they have nothing to fall from. Phlegmatic, prosaic, unemotional, imperturbable, they do not understand people who are sensitive, imaginative, excitable, explosive, sometimes soaring to the sun under the inspiration of a great joy, and sometimes sinking into cavernous depths under the burden of a great sorrow; sometimes defying the very gates of hell, and sometimes fleeing before the weakest and meanest spiritual foe. And not understanding such spiritual alterations, they regard with suspicion and distrust the people who are subject to them.

Depressions in Spiritual Life,

Peter was a Christian of the adventurous type. He ventured where others feared to tread. If he failed more frequently than other disciples, it was because he attempted many things which they had not the faith and daring to undertake. God be thanked for the men who, walking by faith in the unseen, project great schemes, and master great difficulties. The faith of a single child will do more for the world's progress than all the gigantic doubts of men and devils. Agnosticism is nowhere a workable creed. Wherever it has been tried it has been found wanting. "Confucianism is Agnosticism." Look at China, that lagging and pauperized nation, and you will see the fruits of it. Look at our own nation and you will see the fruits of faith—faith in the living God, and his crucified, risen, and living Christ.

Here in this terror of darkness and tempest to which the Lord's disciples were subjected, we see in a dark providence. Why did the Master command these men to take ship and cross the sea? Because the multitude he had just fed had the greatest misconception of his Messianic character and mission, and were clamoring for him to become their temporal king. In the presence of these false ideas and aspirations his disciples were exposed to a perilous temptation, and it was to remove them from this temptation, that he sent them on that night voyage, and subjected them to the dangers of an angry sea. They too had been dreaming of a temporal kingdom, and two of them, through their mother, had approached the Master upon the subject, and expressed their desire to occupy the two highest offices. But when the storm fell upon them, and they seemed to see the madness of fiends and the glare of hell on the battling clouds; when they were expecting every moment to be buried in a watery grave, they lost their worldly ambitions, and were lifted into a realm of spiritual thought and feeling.

My brethren, our troubles in this lower life—our sickness, bereavements, business reverses, and persecutions—are not mere signals of God's displeasure against our sins; nor are they merely God's discipline of our souls, to bring us back to the path of virtue and duty. They are Preventives.

They are sent to occupy our minds and hearts and energies, so that some temptation that is confronting us shall lose its power to harm us. "Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." How terrible was the scourging he gave his disciples on that night journey over the sea of Galilee! He smote them with wind and wave, and all the horrors of darkness and tempest, until they were paralyzed—dead to every worldly aspiration and unworthy motive.

Here we see an exhibition of Christ's watchfulness when his people are in trouble and danger. All through that black night of tempest he was on the mountain, where his eye beheld every movement of the little boat freighted with the precious lives of his loving disciples. Oh! if they had only known that Jesus was there, that his tender eyes were upon them, and that his effectual intercession and the almighty arm of his Father were between them and death, they would have banished fear from their breasts, and laughed at the storm.

What true Christian doubts, that, through the centuries of Pagan and Pagan persecutions, Christ has looked down from heaven upon his people, and watched their infinite solicitude their every struggle for God and his truth. What true Christian doubts that those heroic Waldenses, the Gensengs and Anabaptists, who kept alive the light of "the faith once delivered to the saints" through the long night of Pagan superstition and tyranny, and who suffered all that mortals can endure, rather than false to their principles—who, I say, do so that Christ watched those with the same profound solicitude that he felt for the imperilled little band on the Galilean sea. And who doubts that it was his unceasing intercessory prayer that placed God's shield between them and extermination, and that secured them the grace which they needed to the faith, and transmit uncorrupted and tarnished to coming generations?

Out there, on the silent hills of eternity that same thoughtful and benignant Christ sits to-day, watching every toiling struggling band of his disciples, as he faces the frowning front and challenges the wrath of the world's infidelity and unbelief. And it is because he sits there, lifting up his once crucified hands in holy intercession, that his people draw new strength from day to day, to contend the fight, and to multiply the triumph of his truth.

Finally, we see here, how, when Christ comes to us in our troubles, we can rise above them. The approaching tempest and assuring voice of the Master enabled Peter to conquer his fear, and to walk securely and calmly on the ruffled face of a vasty deep. He did not come with the beginning of the night and the storm. It was not until the night was far spent, and the tempest had reached the culmination of its terrific fury, that he left his outlook on the mountain, and of his imperilled and despairing disciples waited until his purpose was accomplished. He tarried out of their sight until they were cured of their false ambitions, until they lost all faith in their own wisdom and strength, and until their longing for his presence rose immeasurably above every other desire. Then, and not till then, did he come.

Brother, has the darkness and tempest of adversity overtaken you? In this great commercial upheaval and collapse of fortunes, has your business been wrecked, and your estate swept away? Have merciless creditors pressed you to the wall? Have they gathered about you with stern authority of law, to demand that you surrender the last dollar, the last trinket, the last bed, and the last measure of food in the barrel?

Or are you persecuted for righteousness sake? In standing up for truth, virtue, and God, have you incurred the fiendish pleasure of an army of infidels, and scoundrels, and knaves. Do they pursue you with lying lips? Do they employ newspapers to publish their falsehoods, and load your name with calumny? Have they silenced the witnesses of your innocence, and frightened from your support every earthly friend?

Or, has the skeleton monster smitten your home, and left you wifeless and childless?

Be not faithless. "Cast not away your confidence." "Lift up your eyes to the everlasting hills." Out there, on the unseen and serene heights of the spirit world, sits that divine Sentinel who never sleeps nor slumbers.

His Pitying Eye is upon You.

His heart is responsive to your anguish, and when the discipline of struggle and pain has accomplished his purpose, he comes to your help. Walking to you on the high waves of your distress, he will part to you comfort and strength, silence the tempest, and turn your darkness into day. Be this thy prayer:

When the mighty storm is surging,
Stars are hid, and wind is shrill,
Satan striving, passion urging—
Saviour, whisper, "Peace, be still."
When affliction's storms are howling,
And its voice my soul doth thrill,
Earth is black, and heaven is scowling—
Saviour, whisper, "Peace, be still."
When the tide of Death's cold river,
Shocks me with its icy chill,
Body quakes, and billows quiver—
Saviour, whisper, "Peace, be still."

PREMIUM ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has succeeded in arranging for a remarkable series of premiums. First of all, of course, is the International Teacher's Bible, with all the Helps and Maps, set in tiny type, Divinity circuit binding overlapping at the ends, with red under gold edges. This eminently serviceable and pretty Bible is again offered, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at $2. When ordering please mention Premium Offer: B-Five.

Next in order comes that most beautiful Bible known as the International Emerald Teacher's Bible, London Clear Type, plain, leather bound and leather lined, with silk book-mark and silk head-bands and silk sewed. There were times when a Bible like this would cost $8. To-day it cannot be bought everywhere even at $4. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers it, together with a year's subscription, at $3. This book will last a lifetime. When ordering, mention Premium Offer: B-Three.

We also continue to offer Dr. Talmage's most marvelous book, "From Manger to Throne," which has proved of infinite value, to tens of thousands of people, presenting in a new view of the life of our Saviour, magnificently illustrated, with many pictures based on photos brought from Palestine by Dr. Talmage, while journeying in the Holy Land with a view to gathering material for his latest and greatest work, "From Manger to Throne" with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. Mention Premium Offer: B-Four.

Next to a Teachers' Bible, the "Gospel Hymns" sung by Moody and Sankey in the great evangelistic services throughout America and England, are dearest to many a Christian's heart. Never before has it been possible to secure these 739 Hymns, constituting the books usually known as Gospel Hymns 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 all in one volume, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has succeeded in obtaining a large edition of the marvelously soul-stirring hymns in combined form, without a duplicate and without an omission, printed from large type and set to music, and beautifully bound in cloth, with red edges and gilt. A summer hymnal has never been put on the market, and these "Six volumes of Song, complete in One," are offered to subscribers with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. If you are entirely pleased, send it back, and we will refund your money. Messrs. Moody and Sankey in commending the volume say:

"These hymns in this book have been greatly blessed and used in many of our meetings as well as outside of them. May they in this combined form continue to bring the blessing of Him to whose honor and glory they have been sung in this and other lands."

This very desirable Premium contains about 700 pages, each page measuring 5½ inches. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-Two.

Finally, we offer Dr. Talmage's great book, "The Pathway of Life," a large edition of which has been specially prepared for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Talmage kindly consenting to waive all claims of royalty. This great book containing 544 pages, having for a frontispiece a picture of Dr. Talmage recently taken in Australia, embellished by 200 beautiful engravings, in an exceedingly handsome binding of cloth and gilt, and sent out into the world to make it more and more useful and more serviceable, is offered in connection with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $2. The book weighs three pounds and measures, when open, from tip to tip 9x15 inches. This book has been read with interest by Her Majesty Queen Victoria, ex-President John, Major-Gen. O. O. Howard, Sec'y H. C. Carlisle, Bishop Vincent, Joseph Cook, Bishop Hurst, Miss Frances Willard, Senator John Sherman, John G. Whittier, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Neal Dow, and many others all of whom unite in cordially endorsing it. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-One.

Combination Premium Offers: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and any one of the above premiums—except the International "Emerald" Bible—for two dollars; any two for three dollars; any three for four dollars, and any four for five dollars. REST.

OH where shall rest be found—
Rest for the weary soul?
There vain the ocean depths to sound,
Or pierce to either pole.
The world can never give
The bliss for which we sigh;
'Tis not the whole of life to live,
Nor all of death to die.
Beyond this vale of tears
There is a life above
Unmeasured by the flight of years;
And all that life is love.

There is a death whose pang
Outlasts the fleeting breath.
Oh, what eternal horrors hang Around the second death!
Lord God of birth and grace,
Teach us that death to shun,
Lest we be banished from Thy face,
And evermore undone.

NO HOPE.

Lines suggested by an anecdote related by Dr. Talmage in his sermon of Sept. 30, entitled "Quick Feet."

SHE was young, and life's fair morning
Broke in sunshine and in song;
And she heeded not the warning
That would counsel her from wrong.
Or, if awed by sense of sinning,
It was but a passing pain;
For she lov'd the world's praise-winning,
And she sought its joys again.

She was young and gay and brilliant,
And the world's admiring eye
Saw her shine, a star scintillant
In the social galaxy.
And she little thought of dying,
For to her, so young and gay,
It was folly to be sighing,
And the end so far away.

She was young; but death, the reaper,
Waits not always the full bloom;
Nor could youth and beauty keep her
From the cold and silent tomb.
Was there light at the cold river?
In the valley did she grope?
Watch her pallid death-lips quiver:
Hear her dying words, "No hope!"

TRUST IN GOD.

WHATEVER my God ordains is right,
His will is ever just;
Howe'er he order now my cause,
I will be still and trust:
He is my God—
Though dark my road,
He holds me that I shall not fall,
Wherefore to him I leave it all.

Whate'er my God ordains is right,
My Light, my Life is he,
Who cannot will me aught but good—
I trust him utterly:
For well I know,
In joy or woe,
We soon shall see as sunlight clear
How faithful was our Guardian here.—S.R.

TIMES IN PARALLEL.

Points of Resemblance Between this Age and the Antediluvians.

THE true Church (the saints known to God, but not to be infallibly discerned by man now witnesses for Christ and God in the power of the Holy Spirit energizing her. The world is unconscious of the debt which it owes the saints in restraining the general outburst of evil, and so averting judgment, as Lot's presence did in Sodom; to which the Lord compares the world when just ripe for vengeance. God gave the old world a respite before the flood, during which his two witnesses—Enoch, the preacher of the Lord's coming judgment, and Noah, "the preacher of righteousness"—testified of mercy, as well as of wrath, if only men would repent.

Probably that witness shall be at the end concentrated in two individual prophets in Israel, as Moses and Elijah (whose very miracles—"shutting heaven that it rain not," and "turning the waters to blood, and smiting the earth with plagues"—shall be repeated on a wider arena), the two who reappeared at the Transfiguration, and one of whom, as it is foretold, will come again before Christ's appearing. But whether the two witnesses shall be churches, or individual prophets, they torment the worldly by their faithfulness; and, therefore, their testimony shall be hushed in death by the second beast from the bottomless pit; then, like our Lord, after three-and-a-half days they arise and ascend to heaven.

Before the flood Christ, by his Spirit in Noah, "went (not local going, but by his Spirit, as in Ephesians 2:17) and preached" unto men, who, during the 120 years between the sentence of the flood and its execution, were like men in the condemned cell: they are called "the spirits in prison," because they continued "disobedient" all the time "while the ark was a preparing," and the "long-suffering of God was waiting" to be gracious; but they suffered the "flesh" to quench the "Spirit." Isaiah alludes to the flood, "the windows from on high are open," and foretells the last days (alluding to their resemblance to the days before the flood), "Upon the earth—they shall be gathered together as prisoners gathered in the pit and shall be shut up in the prison, and after many days they shall be visited" (in wrath). So now, "the Spirit of the Lord God hath sent" Jesus, by his ministers, "to proclaim the opening of the prison to them that are bound" (Isa. 61:1).

Enoch was not found by his enemies who sought him in vexation as his faithful witness, because God had translated him. Similarly for three days, in the mountains of Jericho, the sons of the prophets sought for Elijah after his translation, but found him not. So the elect of the Judaic-Gentile dispensation, with transfigured bodies, shall be caught up, out of the great tribulation (so that their enemies cannot find them), together with Christ, to meet him in the air (1 Thess. 4:13-17). "Then shall two be in the field, one shall be taken (for glory) and the other left (for judgment)." (Matt. 24:40, 41). Just when Antichrist "gathers" his hosts, God "gathers" to him his saints. As this dispensation began with Christ's own translation, so shall its consummation begin at the translation of the saints. Just after Antichrist has lured "the kings of the whole world to the war of that great day of God Almighty," the Lord's voice is heard, "Behold, I come as a thief; blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments." God hid Noah in the ark. So in the approaching wrath the Lord will hide the elect of Israel, saying, "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast; for behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity" (Isa. 24:20, 21). Israel has to pass through the last great tribulation (which the saints have not wholly to pass through).

Wickedness culminated in Lamech, the seventh from Adam in Cain's line; godliness culminated in Enoch, the seventh from Adam in Seth's line. So shall wickedness have come to the full, and, on the other hand, the number of the elect be fully accomplished, and its testimony shall have been completed, when Christ shall come (Joel 3:13). God will then fulfil, as in Noah's time, his word, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man."

THE GOLDEN RULE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Nov. 18.
Luke 6: 27-38.

DEPROFOUNDLY philosophical is Christ's teaching in this sermon, of which the precept that we call the Golden Rule was a part. The world was full of misery then, as it is now. Christ diagnoses its malady and prescribes for its cure. He taught with authority, the authority of one who had come from a realm of unalloyed happiness and knew what was the cause of the trouble and what would cure it. But there is no need to appeal to his divine authority for this teaching; our own reason perceives that the remedy is wise and effectual. The remedy is large and comprehensive, but it is contained in one word—Love. Let every man love his brother man—that is Christ's prescription for the woes of this groaning world. It is only necessary to imagine what a world would be in which every inhabitant really loved every other, to see that Christ was right. In such a world there could be no war. That is obvious, for how could men fight with those whom they love? There would be no poverty, for none would hoard the necessities that were needed by any one whom he loved. The labor conflicts which disturb our society could not exist in a world full of love, for employer and employed, loving each other, neither would take advantage of the other. In such a world there would be none of the fierce competition which is the bane and curse of our American life. Who would be eager to compete with one whom he loves, to get ahead of him in his business or in his social life? This one element of love, which was the essence of Christ's teaching, would transform the world by transforming the individual. It would take the brute out of human nature. But is it possible? Can a man love those whom he does not know; whom he has never seen? He can do this by developing in himself the capacity of loving. He can be kind to those about him, gentle, forbearing, pitiful; being so, his heart is enlarged and the farther circles, whose sufferings he knows only vaguely, appeal to him and he longs to help them. There is no tact better substantiated by experience than that a man cannot render another a service without being drawn nearer to him by his doing so. Every service so rendered cultivates the capacity of loving, strengthens the finer part of the nature and elevates the doer. We are only now coming to see, after centuries of blind groping, that this is the way of the world's redemption. Christ came to save the people from their sins. He came to lift them out of the selfishness and brutal instincts of their nature to a higher plane. The animal has ruled too long in man; Christ would have him cultivate the Godlike and God is love. His was no idle dream; the world may grow loving if the Church will set it the example. It is the one infallible panacea for all our troubles. The love that brought Christ to earth must glow in the heart of every follower of him and the sweetness and light of his people will attract the world and make it a heaven.

READING'S PROGRESSIVE Y. M. C. A.

In the line of substantial progress—the result of the energy and devotion of its members as a whole—the Y. M. C. A. of Reading, Pa., is a prominent example. Plans and specifications have been prepared for the erection of a handsome Association building, and the CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the illustration on this page, taken from the architect's drawings, shows how the beautiful home of this progressive Association will appear when finished. The corner stone was laid recently, and the work will be pushed with energy.

Reading's Y. M. C. A., which was organized in 1890, on a very modest scale, has now four hundred members. It has grown with the passing years, and its membership represents a very fair percentage of the city's population of 65,000 souls. Mr. Frank S. Livingood is President; Mr. John R. Miller and W. H. Shick, First and Second Vice-Presidents; C. T. Anderson, Recording Secretary, and J. H. Edwards, General Secretary; and the other officers include some of the brightest young business men in Christian work in that city. The new building will be four stories in height, with an area of 30x270 feet. It will be ready for occupancy in January next.

THE CONVENTION AT YORK, PA.

The meeting of the Pennsylvania Christian Endeavor Convention, at York, is not blessed of God. At one factory, the employees, and the people who joined from the street, numbered over five hundred persons. At the conclusion of the services a group of the factory girls gave beautiful and appropriate recognition of the interest of the visitors by singing, spontaneously, the hymn, "We hope to meet you there;" and, said one, "That is the sentiment of hearts." Fifteen girls in this factory, expressed a desire for the prayers of the band for their conversion. The visitors, in going to another factory, passed a house in which a prominent member of one of the York Christian Endeavor societies was lying sick, slowly recovering from a long and severe illness. She had felt deeply the disappointment of being absent from the convention. As soon as the facts were mentioned to the visiting delegation, a halt was called, and several Christian Endeavor hymns were sung in the open space in front of the house. The convalescent patient was deeply touched, as the strains of music floated in the open winter chamber. The factories was visited, and a very meeting was which special was offered five men left their work and attended meeting in one of the shops, and the proprietor sent around for improvised seats make all comfortable.

Every factory in the town was visited and then a large company marched off to the jail, where an interesting service was held. There were many special requests for prayer there, too; and several prisoners shed tears of penitence. The York "Daily Telegraph," reporting these special efforts, says that, in the course of the day's visiting, fully one hundred and fifty persons asked for prayer, and the results of visits were truly wonderful.

A B. Y. P. U. ANNIVERSARY.

Delegates from a host of Baptist Young People's Unions, in Illinois, assembled at Pontiac, Ill., on Oct. 19, to celebrate anniversary of the Union. As early as past six in the morning the enthusiastic young people came together to open the convention appropriately with prayer. When the convention assembled later in the day, it was found that there was special reason for congratulation in the progress the secretary was able to report. There were now in all 456 Unions—Senior and Junior—in the State, with an aggregate membership of 16,902. During the past year less than 750 persons had made profession of faith, ascribing their conversion to Young People's work. The financial results were also very gratifying. Unions have given liberally to the Foreign Missionary, the local church, and other funds, the aggregate sum for the year being $4,853.02. The papers read covered each department of the Young People's work. To Miss Nell R. Blount, of Macomb, Ill., was assigned the subject of the Junior Union, and none who heard her earnest words could withhold sympathy from this, which is the most promising and fruitful of the Union's operations. Among the speakers were Rev. Austin K. de Blois, Rev. M. W. Buck, Rev. Fred. R. Swartout, Rev. R. F. Y. Pierce, and Miss Mabel F. Prominent in the proceedings was an address by President John H. Chapman, which, as usual, stirred all hearts by his earnest, vigorous utterances. The new officers of the State Union are, for the greater part, those of last year, who succeed themselves. Mr. John Nuveen is President; Mr. W. I. Wanny, General Secretary; Miss Geo. T. First, Recording Secretary, and Rev. W. Bell, Educational Secretary. The Board of Managers has been strengthened by the acquisition of Rev. R. F. Y. Pierce, Rev. B. Weber, and Rev. A. K. de Blois.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of the Reformed Church in America have at built their third church. It is located at Johnstown, N. Y. It is under the direction of the denominational Board of Home Missions.

The Epworth Guards have another life of life. The Board of Control was strongly urged to express disapproval of the organization. Eloquent friends of the "Guard" however, after a long discussion persuaded the Board to give the system a longer trial.

The Board of Control of the Epworth League voted at its recent meeting to commence a correspondence with other young people's societies, looking to the organization of an International Christian Union for co-operation in general reformatory and benevolent work; the President to appoint a committee of three to make these overtures.

An Australian newspaper has this to say in announcing the Christian Endeavor Convention at Adelaide: "This movement is more than anything else that we know of has brought our young people to take an interest in Christian service. There are many young people out serving the cause, we should all rejoice over those who are endeavoring to do right. Let us give them a chance to do their best, a word of praise, and a helping hand. Our hope is in the young, and the Endeavor Society, it appears to us, has done much to nurture this hope."

The Value of Good Brand

Is appreciated by every one, but so few are able to secure uniformly good results. This is due to the fact that when milk is used the character of it is exceedingly variable. Borden's Peerless Brand Evaporated Cream will overcome this difficulty.

THE BUILDING IN COURSE OF ERECTION FOR THE Y. M. C. A. OF READING, PA.

likely to be soon forgotten in that town. The delegates were there in large numbers, and the Convention Hall, of which a picture appeared in this journal recently, was crowded. The meetings were of the most inspiring and enthusiastic kind, but it will be chiefly for its outside work that the Convention will be remembered by the people of the town. Not a few persons there will think that it happened to them as to some hosts mentioned in Scripture, that in entertaining "strangers they entertained angels unawares." Companies of Christian Endeavorers—some fifty, and some a hundred, strong—went to the various factories in the noon hour and held services with the workers, which appear to have been wonderfully conversion of several present, at their own request. At the conclusion, the delegation was informed that the employees in another part of the building would be glad of a service, and the delegates gladly complied with the request. One who was there said that he had never attended any service in church where the presence and power of the Holy Spirit were so clearly manifest. At another factory, the delegates were urged to talk and sing in the shops, and when they expressed some delicacy about interrupting the work, the girls promptly answered that they considered that their time would be better spent in attending to their eternal interests than in their work. At another factory one hundred and twenty-

In a Congo Home.

What the Traveler Sees in Passing Through a Native Village—A Mixture of Barbarism and Civilization.

LESS than twenty years ago, there was hardly a civilized African to be found along the Congo, except perhaps at the settlements near its mouth, where it enters the sea.

White traders, the coming of the railroad and steamers and, above all, the tireless and energetic labors of devoted Christian missionaries, have transformed a very large part of this vast and populous region and changed the character of its people by contact with civilization. It is not many years since travelers like Stanley, Ward and Casement, who explored the river for great distances, wrote of the strange cannibal peoples they had encountered: of the fierce elephant-hunters among the Lualaba, a tributary of the Congo, the human flesh-markets below and above Stanley Pool, the universal "fetish" worship, and the deadly antipathy of the natives to all white men. Now all is changed. Mission stations dot both banks of the great river for a thousand miles or more, schools and chapels, fairly attended, are found at frequent intervals, cannibalism and the fetish are vanishing together. Tribes, the doors of whose existence seemed to be sound the war-drum and fight for each other's extermination, are living in comparative peace and their weapons are laid aside for the implements of husbandry. Petty kings and chiefs who formerly held power and influence in proportion as they were successful in battle are now, in many places, respected and obeyed as leaders who are helping their people to a better and brighter life than the old one of incessant warfare and brutish superstition. Some of these native potentates have become active church members and officers, and in one or two cases at least, teachers, like King Hodge of the Grebo in Liberia.

Of course, this transformation has been accompanied by a corresponding change in the home lives of the Congo natives. It is a long step from naked savagism to civilization, clad and decorous; but though the Congo native is still far from the latter condition, he is traveling in that direction. In remote districts, far from the mission stations and the ports of trade, all the conditions prevail, although even there they are modified by the surrounding influences. Fetishism has lost its power and a "fetish doctor," once unopposed in affairs of government and religion, is practically deposed. Brave, outspoken missionaries who are willing to risk their lives for the truth, have so thoroughly exposed the foolish and kindred superstitions that there are now Congo districts where idolatry may be said to be unknown and where the God is worshipped instead.

Our illustration affords a glimpse of a native home, in which fetish-worship is still preserved. It is a characteristic group that is gathered under the low roof of the little cabin of mud and sticks, just such a group as one might see in many villages along the river. A meal is being eaten; the father, who according to custom is served first and eats alone, sits in the doorway while his wife and children dispose of their dish of cassava pie. With the youngest upon her knee, the matron cooks and serves for the entire household, of which she is the slave and drudge. To the left, lying up against a pole, is a fetish of the usual Congo type, a block of wood carved to represent a human face and painted white. With training, such as thousands of other Congo children are now receiving at the mission stations, these children would doubtless soon become followers of the Gospel of Jesus instead of ignorant idolaters as now. Child-training in religious and secular matters, combined with the teaching of useful mechanical arts, such as could be applied in communities where the simplest conditions of life prevail, is gradually bringing about the redemption of the Congo. There are many Congo children, of heathen parents, who can read and write and sew, cook, and make

med. Her coiffure, always elaborate, sometimes includes a string of gold coins, encircling the head, or strung down the plait. A silver belt encloses the waist, and a string of coins encircles her neck. The position of woman in Armenia is a most degraded one and the influence of Christianity is tending to elevate her from the condition of ignorance and social servitude in which she has been kept for centuries.

Be Pleasant at Table.

"We never talk about dismal things at the breakfast table," says an entertaining writer. "No one is expected to tell his or her bad dreams, and we do not consider it polite or kind to talk of our pains or aches in the presence of the family, least of all at the table. In some homes each member of the family thinks it is his duty to inquire for the health of the others every morning, and to ask if he has had an attack of indigestion, or insomnia, or a sick headache, which excites the sympathy or depresses the spirits of the listeners. If the pain had passed, of what use is the recollection, if it still exists? The breakfast hour is not the time to narrate symptoms. The children have a pleasant custom, not, however, invariable, of reciting some pretty verse or poem, which they have found in their children's paper or magazines, at this hour. So many dainty, graceful bits of verse are made for little folk nowadays that we often have great pleasure in listening to them. I often reserve a story or bit of news for the breakfast table. And papa goes to his

JUST A WORD WITH JESUS.

JUST a word with Jesus,
When you lie down at night,
Will make a softer pillow,
Because the heart is right.
Just a word with Jesus,
When you awake from sleep,
Will help you all the day-time
Your promises to keep.
Just a word with Jesus,
When Satan makes attack,
Will drive away the tempter,
And make him turn his back.
Just a word with Jesus,
When you a cross must bear,
Will make the burden easy,
For He your cross will share.
Just a word with Jesus,
When you are called to die,
Will bring to you his angels
To wait your soul on high.

BABIES, THE WORLD OVER.

MOTHER-LOVE, that potent passion of the heart, manifests itself in a variety of ways in different countries. Here, the mother shows her love for her baby by cradling it or hushing it tenderly in her arms. The Indian baby is strapped to a birchbark board, and hung up in a tree or carried on his mother's back. He has no playthings, and, if he cries, no one seems to mind it much. In South America some of the cradles are made of palm leaves. A single leaf turned up at the edges holds the baby. This cradle is often hung up in a tree, and the wind rocks the baby to sleep. In Africa the mother carries the baby in a leather pouch slung on her back. When she gets tired of this way, she makes a hole in the sand, under some shady bush or shrub, and tucks the baby into it.

An Eskimo baby is tucked up in his mother's hood. It is a warm place, and travelers say their chubby little faces look very good-natured and happy. When the child comes out of the hood, he is stuffed into a fawn-skin bag, and a string draws the garment together like a sack, keeping him safe and warm. In Lapland the cradle is a piece of wood shaped like a canoe, and hollowed out until it is very light. A quantity of grass is put in, and in this soft bed the baby laughs, sleeps, and plays with his toys. In Persia, when an Armenian baby is born, it is sprinkled with salt and left to itself for nearly twenty-four hours. This is done to harden it. The baby is tied in its crib, and the little feet are left bare even in the coldest weather. The mothers blacken the eyebrows and eyelashes, and a little girl's ears are pierced for rings often when a day old, and always before they are four days old. The day a Chinese baby is born it is called one year old. When the next New Year's day comes, even if it happens to be the day after it is born, it is two years old, and thereafter every New Year's day is its birthday. If the baby is a boy the top of his head is shaved when he is four weeks old, and after that is shaved once a week. In India the baby is rocked in a swing. The mother takes a long cloth and ties the two ends together over a small rafter in the low roof of the house, and puts the baby into the folds of the cloth. When they go out to work in the field, the cloth is fastened to the branch of some tree.

And so, in every country under the sun, the mother-love appears in many different ways, some beautiful and some grotesque.

Christian Children.

The reason why we do not succeed better in making Christians out of our children are found in three facts: First, we do not begin early enough; secondly, we do not reinforce our teaching by a goodly example; and thirdly, we neglect to ask the assistance of the Holy Spirit. If these matters were attended to as they ought to be, many heartaches would be saved. Seek the salvation of your offspring, and make your efforts effective by an increased holiness in your own lives.

garden. Some of their childish epistles, sent home by missionaries, display a wonderful faith and an intelligent desire to lead Christian lives. In a few years many of these young mission children will themselves be missionaries in turn to their own people, proclaiming the Gospel in the "dark places" of their native land.

Armenian Women.

A traveler writing of his experiences in Armenia, says: "The most striking feature of the missionary work at Kaisarieh is the education of the Armenian women, whose social position seems to be even lower than that of their Turkish sisters. With the native Armenians, as with the Turks, fleshiness adds much to the price of a wife. The wife of a missionary is to them an object both of wonderment and contempt. As she walks along the street, they will whisper to one another: 'There goes a woman who knows all her husband's business; and who can manage just as well as himself.' This will generally be followed in an undertone by the expression, 'Madana satana,' which means in common parlance a 'female devil.' The costume of the Armenian woman is generally of some bright-colored cloth, prettily trimmed, and the children to school, and I to my household cares with hearts full of good cheer, and pleasant remembrances."

Kindness and Politeness.

There is an essential difference between kindness and politeness, and in no relation is this distinction more easily observed than between mistress and maid, employer and employed. One woman may excel another in the number of gifts and gratuities to those in her employ and yet fail to receive the measure of willing service accorded to another, who rarely renders material assistance yet is uniformly and genuinely polite to her servants. For to be this involves a quality of sympathy, a certain personal interest, which reaches far beyond a mere superficial courtesy and really includes the element of kindness. In discussing this question, one woman said to another, "But if I should listen to a servant's talk about herself or her own people I should be afraid she would forget her position." To which the other replied: "My experience is that servants rarely forget their positions. They only resent being reminded of them." Kindness loses half its charm if separated from politeness, and politeness can hardly be called such unless it has its root in kindness.

A NEW FASHIONED WOMAN

Written Specially for
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
BY
MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

CHAPTER XIV. Continued.

LATER entry in Annie's journal indicates that other troubles besides her husband's drinking were preying on her mind. It runs as follows:

Things have been brighter since the above, and I am sorry I wrote it—feel like tearing out the leaves upon which it is written, but I will not detach my book.

Clarence has fully atoned for his quick words and action. He is so perfectly devoted to us; says he wonders I do not hate him, and baby, too, but the little darling has long since forgotten his injury, and pats papa's cheek, pulls his whiskers, and kisses him.

"How could papa ever strike his baby," he said tremulously. "May my hand be palsied if it is ever raised again to strike my precious boy!"

We have both forgiven and forgotten. Clarence says he will never drink again. Has confessed in this tender hour that he had gambled in a fashionable faro bank; been enticed into it by champagne suppers, and that he had lost heavily, and that as soon as he recovered what he had lost he intended to quit this fashionable amusement, and would from this time on forever be a model husband and father.

"Let the money go, dear," I exclaimed, "don't go another time. I don't care a cent for the loss. I'll economize and save it. It will be sweet to economize for you."

"Economize, indeed!" he exclaimed in reply. "No, Annie, I've been there and played under the influence of wine and lost. I'll go there now a sober man, and win back what I have lost. Dr. Ripley says I have just got to quit both, especially drinking, for I'm getting rather shaky, and sometimes I can't control my nerves and muscles—have no power of volition at all. I will quit that gambling saloon forever, though it has been a pleasant nocturnal resort for us boys. I will quit it though, I promise you, as soon as I right myself. So

Cast that shadow from thy brow,
My dark-eyed one be glad awhile."

I did smile, I was happy, and it all ended in the sweetest of reconciliations:

Something dreadful has happened! Roy is away with his wife visiting her relations. She is jealous of his love for us, even of his love for dear mamma, so he has gone back home with her. Oh, that he were here! Clarence went to the faro bank to win—lost heavier than ever, and on the strength of this there came an imperious demand for him to meet Mr. Snow's note. I hear that Mr. Snow, while a good man, is very visionary. I know nothing of such things, only that Clarence has to raise a large amount of money on short notice. He is depressed, dispirited, came home cast down. I tried to comfort him, but, no, nothing soothes now but wine, wine, wine!

He is living drunk in the other room, and I can hear his heavy breathing as I write. Ernest is laughing and trying to win me over to play, now calling me by all his sweet pet names, but his bright face only mocks my grief. I could not bear to look at him, so I pushed him from me impatiently, and threw myself on my lounge in a flood of tears. What will be the end! Oh for a prophet's vision.

CHAPTER XV.

Val is happy.

"A letter for you, Miss Annie," said Betsey, as she handed her one addressed to Val's handwriting. Annie was glad of this diversion and read:

"DEAR ANNIE:—Some months ago I wrote you of my intended marriage, and my letter was full of joyous expectation. Our marriage has been necessarily deferred for some time to come. Mr. Carlisle has met with a heavy disappointment and loses by the failure of the National Bank in which he had deposited his all, $2500, the accumulated savings of years. In addition to this, the firm by whom he is employed, has lost very heavily by this failure, and it has been shaken to its very foundation. They wish Mr. Carlisle to go out West to look after some landed estate, sell it, and thus obtain means of operations, for without this help they must suspend. Now Mr. C. says he cannot ask me to marry a penniless man, then, too, he will be away perhaps for several months. It is a great trial to us both, but we try to feel that it is divinely directed and so right.

"Now, dear Annie, you expect to hear my impetuous self uttering heaps of dejected, despairing adjectives, full of sighs and tears. Instead of this, let me assure you, that never in all my life have I felt so happy as at this moment! You will wonder, and ask, what has happened now. Let me tell you,—a few days ago, I gave my heart to Jesus, and I am happy. Now he is mine and I am his and no earthly power can separate us. I will not stop to tell you the successive steps which led to this great change, for indeed it is a great change. Ah! Annie, how little in the light of this transcendent glory does earth look! I love, Mr. Carlisle as well, even better than before, for, between his prayers, and those of my dear mother, I have been enabled to lay hold on this rock, Christ Jesus, been enabled to accept him as the Saviour of my sin-cursed, lost soul! Lost? Yes, it was lost in the mazes of a forest dense and dark. It was sunk in the mire of sin, sinking faster and faster down to the terrible gulf, but thanks be to God, Jesus came to seek and to save them that are lost. He sought me, he found me, he drew me out of the depths of misery, he saved me. And now—

Not a wave of trouble rolls,
Across my peaceful breast.

Communion with Christ how sweet! Prayer, what an unspeakable privilege! Everything is absolutely glorious because my Father made them all. Now how little, earthly honors and emoluments! Once, while on a visit to your beautiful, elegant home, seeing all your surroundings of wealth and fashion, my heart pined, and I murmured against God, since he had given one man's child so much, while I, the sister's child, know nought but toil and privation. I enjoyed, revelled in the ease of your life, the magnificence of your home, and felt myself gazing down from the dizzy heights of pleasure, and I asked nothing, only to be let alone. I feel sure now, that my dear mother in allowing me to go, believed in her wisdom, that it was the best course to pursue to her wealth-craving child. If there was one thing I did admire it was the beautiful things of earth, not only the glories of nature, but those which money can buy, in short 'the lust of the eye and the pride of life.' These were my idols, idols of silver and gold. Here, before these, I sat down and murmured, secretly, silently. Had you, could you only have seen the first letter I wrote home, you would have read this in the very depths of my unbounded enthusiasm. My letters were the measures of this 'gamut of feeling,' passing from Major to Minor keys in chords of unbroken harmony and succession. At first I was overflowing, then gradually my ardor cooled, and I saw (forgive me for saying it), in your beloved self, a being with no holier aspiration than happiness. I loved you, I bowed down before you and almost worshipped your matchless beauty; and, while I longed to be like you, yet in time, the truth dawned upon my dazed vision, that the end you were seeking you had never attained. I began to see in wealth an emptiness which could not satisfy the longing of an immortal soul. In my heart of hearts, I acknowledged, that we were not put here to be mere pieces of work like the statue of Pygmalion, beautiful but lifeless. I knew that life was an earnest reality, and day after day this reality came and stared me in the face. This life-giving, health-restoring lesson I learned in your home, surrounded by all that heart and desire or gold could obtain. Then I wrote and begged to go back home to my loved ones and to life's duties. These brought greater rest for my disquieted spirit, though not complete. Afterwards, in the devotion of my love, I thought to be fully satisfied, but I was soon constrained to confess, that the heart needs more than earthly loves to fill it. Not till I bowed at the footstool of my Lord, my Saviour, and gave him my undivided heart, did I ever know true happiness, never did I have perfect peace, complete rest. How—

Sweet to lie passive in his hands,
And know no will but his.

"Annie, dear Annie, I am indeed happy. There is a peace passing knowledge, passing description or even conception, which fills my entire being. This is no impulsive, evanescent feeling, born in the morning to sink behind the western hills as evening comes creeping on. No, it is life long; yes, eternity long. Would that I could persuade you to come to this haven of rest and peace. Dear Annie, are you happy? Is there no longing in your soul for something higher, or do your arms never stretch upward to grasp an unknown but longed-for something, a something which is up above you, but which you never reach? These are the struggles of immortality. The soul knows its own eternity, and longs for a high, untainted atmosphere. Annie, will you accept the offered terms of salvation? They are full, and they are free. Go to Jesus in prayer and ask his guidance, he will direct your searchings after truth. I will not weary you with this subject, though I feel I could write forever, for it is the subject now nearest and dearest to my heart.

"We heard, and with pleasure, of Roy's happy marriage. Please give him our love and congratulations. Dear little Ernest! How I would love to fold him in my arms! I kiss his picture often and often. May he, dear Annie, be spared to be your comfort, and may he prove a blessing to the world.

"My kindest regards to Cousin Clarence, whom I remember with much affection. Mr. Carlisle desires to be remembered to you, and says he hopes the day is not far distant when he too will be able to say 'Cousin Annie.'

My dear cousin, my letter is finished, but my happy heart only half poured out. Mother writes her love, and her prayer with mine that you may soon be partaker with me of the same overflowing joy and soul-rest. Write soon. With fondest love, VAL."

CHAPTER XVI.

Love Cannot Avail.

Annie's eyes filled with tears as she read the words of soul-satisfied joy; indeed all through the letter they were so blinded she could scarcely decipher the words before her. Then she held the letter in her hand, and pondered:

"Oh, how blessed Val is! She has by nature a happy disposition. I cannot comprehend it. Happiness 'life-long—eternity long.' Happy Val! Yet it would seem to all human appearances, that the disappointment of her marriage and the loss of $2,500 (how little that does seem), it would seem that both of these combined would cast a shadow over her for a long time. She says she acquiesces in the divine will. Pshaw! What infatuation! But is it infatuation? Ah! Val, child, could you look into my heart now, torn and bleeding as it is you would see but an empty, hollow, coldly gleaming marble sepulchre. Papa gone and Clarence in the next room drunk! What have I done to deserve such a fate! Somehow it seems to me that death is pursuing me, follows me, wherever I go, I see his pale face, feel his icy fingers long and bony, clutching here at my boy, then at my husband and almost feel him grappling at my aching heart. Oh, what have I done! Oh, God, I know not how to pray, but Jesus, take me by the hand and lead me like a little child. Oh, gently lead me to those green pastures, I cannot wait. Give me this rest, this joy which lives through time and all through the long eternity."

Tears were streaming down her cheeks upon Ernest's dress, for he had climbed up in her arms and was lying fast asleep. Scarcely had she time to wipe them away, when the door across the hall opened, and Clarence walked slowly in. When he saw traces of tears upon her face, he exclaimed:

"Annie! has it come to this?"

Evading the question, she replied:

"I have just received a letter from Val, and it brought back old memories."

"Well, and what does our little cousin say?"

"Her intended, Mr. Carlisle, has lost $2,500 by the failure of the bank in which he had deposited it, and the concern by whom he was employed lost very heavily, and they wish him to go West, spend some months in arranging some business out there, so, all taken together they are in a great deal of trouble and their marriage has been indefinitely postponed."

"Surely that small trifling amount would not keep them from marrying!"

"It is no trifling sum to them; it was his accumulated savings for years. They are content. Val writes full of happiness; indeed she says she has never known joy until now, and this she has found in the Saviour."

"Pshaw! Fanaticism! I thought she was a sensible girl."

"She seems very peaceful, very happy, and she says it will be life-long, eternity-long."

"Laying all this nonsense aside, I am certainly sorry for them. I wish I could help that fellow, Carlisle, out of this box, for I feel for him, but plague it all, I am overwhelmed with so many obligations myself, that I don't see my own way at all."

"Keep up your spirits, Clarence, we will come out all right, never fear. Loss of money does not matter, dear. We have each other and this blessed angel boy. Let our bank money go, all in every bank necessary. It this will not be sufficient to relieve you, you are the silent partner of a large, prosperous firm, let this go, also your railroad stock, let all go, then let us sell our interest in this house to Roy, get a small one and begin life over again. I verily believe we have begun at the wrong end. Welcome poverty, welcome labor! I am convinced that there is more happiness among the poor than is to be found in a our splendor."

"Why, Annie, are you losing your senses?"

"No, Clarence dear, only waking up waking up to the truth. I am beginning to see things as I never saw them before."

"Poverty and labor" indeed! Would n't you look beautiful cooking and washing! Imagine it if you can. Laying aside diamond rings, folding away satin dress and plunging into dish water, pots and kettles. Ha! Ha! Ha! Annie it is to ludicrous. You little romantic woman! is the vine clad cottage which you see your mind's eye. Imagine your husband homespun garb, sitting in the multi floor porch smoking his pipe stem, and Ernest picking up chips for mamma to cook supper. Ha! ha! ha! It is perfectly ludicrous too absurd to conceive of even."

"Clarence, I am in solemn earnest, may come nearer that picture than you no think. I have thought it all over, and I am ready for it when it does come."

She had laid Ernest down while she was speaking, and now coming to her husband she wound her arms around him, laid her head upon his shoulder, and went on:

"Go pay all you owe, dear, it does not matter how much it is. You have been heavily by security, pay all, and do not stop to grieve. Go, pay your gambler's debt if it takes every cent, pay everything. My darling, I can bear this, can bear poverty, labor, any, everything, but I cannot, cannot stand it to see you coming home as you have been coming lately. Clarence, if you love me, if you love your baby, for my sake, for his sake, for God's sake, don't drink!"

He pressed her quivering lip, silently looked softly, tenderly into her face, spoke no word, then he moved away, took his hat and was gone.

That night the tramp of feet was heard upon the stairway, heavy as though weight was borne. It was Clarence brought in by four men, drunk. Annie met them directed them to the room, while she looked on with a bursting heart. One of the men was a rejected lover, one who had urged her suit long, but she had trifled with him awhile and then refused him. Now, as they stood together, with a heartless, exultant leer, pointing to the body, he said:

"I have brought you your husband madam."

She drew up her form to its full height and, fixing her flashing eyes upon him, replied:

"Sir, I would rather have that man lying there for my husband, than the grandest lord of earth. You are kind, sir, I thank you."

He quickly bowed himself out, and left her to her sorrowful work.

"AS IT IS IN HEAVEN."

There are very few people, however, single their lives, who do not cherish a vague hope that in some way they will go to heaven when they die. It does not occur to them that they might not be happy there. The correspondent of the "Watchword" relates how a suggestion on that view of the subject was used with good results: "I have just been thinking," said a Christian traveler to a profane and half-drunken coach-driver, with whom he had been journeying, "I have just been thinking what you would do in heaven! There will be no coaches, nor horses, nor harness to swear at; no saloons to get drunk in; no stable companions to quarrel with—what will you do in heaven!" The question was startling, ill-timed, and unexpected. It proved like a nail in a sure place, and, by the blessing of God, it brought him to repentance. Perhaps some reader whose life is worldly may be indulging the hope of going to heaven. Read your Bible and see what heaven is and what its employments are. Now, my friend, you must know that God cannot change heaven to suit your sin-tastes and propensities. If you ever hope, or wish, to get there, it is you that must undergo the change. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Peculiar Perils

Sail our health in the Fall, when the sea-son changes and mild weather gives way to chilling winds and cold storms, with dangerous warm waves between. This variable weather taxes the nervous energy, chills the skin and overloads the kidneys. An abundant supply of pure blood is thus necessary to prevent the advance of disease, to nourish the nerves, renew the waste and sustain the health tone. To purify, vitalize and enrich the blood you should take Hood's Sarsaparilla. It is the ideal Fall medicine. Get Hood's because

Hood's Sarsaparilla Cures

Hood's Pills cure all liver ills, constipation, headache, dizziness, nausea, etc.

Plenty of Fuel

What the body needs, in these days of burning the candle at both ends, is plenty of fuel. It is no use to tell a man to quit burning; he can't do it. Give him fuel enough so that the fire of life will not be obliged to feed on the body itself, and there's relief.

Electropoise does just this. It supplies fuel for the fire of health, and fortifies the system against the possibility of burning itself out.

MRS. JUSTICE JACKSON.

1311 K St., N. W. Washington, D. C., Feb. 5, 1894.

Ever since I began to use the Electropoise in our family, I have taken frequent occasion to speak to my friends of its wonderful curative powers. We have both the pocket and wall Electropoise, and we would not part with either under any circumstances.

I have found that no medicine or drugs will so quickly give relief as the Electropoise, and particularly is this true of a cough, or in case of sleeplessness. The application of the instrument almost instantly stops the cough, and thereafter produces sleep. Ordinarily, I decline to give public testimonials, for I very much dislike notoriety in any form, but I take pleasure in recommending the Electropoise, because of the wonderful relief it has accomplished in our family.

Yours truly,
MRS. HOWELL E. JACKSON.

In addition to Justice Jackson's family, to other judges of the United States Supreme Court have the Electropoise in their households.

BE OF GOOD COURAGE.

(Isaiah 41:6.)

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

BE of good courage, my brother,
Now in the morning of youth,
Walk in the road that is narrow,
Still battle for God and truth,
Trust Jesus thy mighty Captain.
He conquered Satan and sin,
Storm every stronghold of evil,
With him you will surely win.

Be of good courage, my brother,
Now in the midst of the fight;
Though storms and conflicts surround thee,

Still trust in thy Saviour's might.
Thy God will never forsake thee,
He's ever faithful and true.

Then be of good courage, brother,
He'll bring thee all the way through.

MRS. J. KENNEDY.

A PHRENOLOGIST AT FAULT.

An incident related by Prof. J. Collier indicates how marvelous a change may be effected by grace in a man's character. He says: "In a certain town a phrenologist was lecturing on phrenology and physiognomy, and declared his ability to tell from the formation of the head and the expression of the features of any man, his exact nature. His challenge was accepted, and a rough-faced, stern-looking man mounted the platform. The phrenologist went to work, and after a thorough examination of the skull and face of the subject, described him as harsh, cold, unsympathetic, and possessed of many most disagreeable characteristics; but the audience, who knew him well, heard the description with derisive laughter. They knew the man to be kind, genial, sympathetic, and benevolent. They told the Professor that he had miserably failed to judge character by his science. As to this man he was altogether wrong. But the man himself did not seem to be in any way amused. Turning to the people, he said, 'Friends, do not laugh. The description you have heard portrays exactly what my nature was till Jesus took possession of me; and if there be any change, to him be the honor ascribed, for it is his doing.'"

It has often been supposed that there was position betwixt this utterance of James and the doctrine of Paul. It is to be nevertheless acknowledged at once that this is the case, when one reflects that the works of which Paul speaks are entirely different from those which James intends. Paul always speaks of the works of the law: James has his eye upon the works of faith. The works of the law are those which are done out of the personal power of man, in the direction of fulfilling the law. God in order to merit the favor of God make himself worthy of it. Of these the word of God says, that the man is justified without the work of the law. He can do nothing that is good or meritorious: all that comes from him is impure and deserving of wrath. On the contrary, the works of faith of which James speaks are those which must be done for the confirmation and the perfecting of faith, and thus out of the power which God gives and not to merit anything. They serve to manifest that which faith has received from free grace. They follow upon conversion, while the works of the law can only precede this change. The works of the law will be able to glorify man: the works of faith give him all the honor: for they are done in the acknowledgment of personal unworthiness. Works and faith go together, as being both fruits of grace and tokens of the renewing of the mind—faith as the root of the works, the works as the perfecting of faith.

In this way it can now be clearly understood what the word of God means, when one passage it says: "To him that worketh not but believeth, his faith is reckoned for righteousness," and then again insists on works. The works which are one apart from faith, as an endeavor to make ourselves worthy of God's favor and thus keep us back from faith, the reception of God's free grace, are not to be done: they are abominable in the eyes of God: He that worketh not is justified." The works which are done with and in faith, while the soul in the sense of its unworthiness commits itself to the gracious promises of God, just because it hopes or knows that the Lord receives it apart from its merits, and seeks to praise him for them, are acceptable to God, and must be done, the more the better. And it is of these that it is said that "man is justified by works": they are the manifestation of faith and actual fruit-bearing, and not merely of a faith that continues inactive, and is thus dead.

FRATERNAL HELP.

The rich are debtors to the poor, because the rich and poor are brothers, and every brother owes his brother something. There is one debt, Paul says, which never can be paid: it is perpetually outstanding; installment after installment touches only the interest: the principal remains. It is the debt of fraternal love. The rich ought to use some of their money in paying the interest on this debt. They do use a great deal of their money for that purpose, but not always with ideal wisdom. For the deserving poor do not ask alms. They ask opportunity and brotherly consideration. And to that they have a right. To the poor ought to be given the right hand of every prosperous Christian. The poor man ought to have a friend in any member of the church. Every employer of labor has his answer to the question, how to help the poor? marked out plain before him. The poor, so far as he is concerned, are his own men. It is his place to see that they are not taken advantage of by reason of their poverty; that they are not given a scant wage: are not over-taxed; are not kept at work so many hours that they have no chance to live like Christians. That is what the poor man asks of the philanthropist—the plain philanthropy of practical fair-dealing.

And from us all the poor need sympathy. The rich and the poor alike need to know each other better. Genuine help comes along the way of personal acquaintance. Jesus helped the poor, not by giving them money, for he had none to give, but by giving them his time and his attention and his love. Every Christian family which is comfortably circumstanced ought to have some neighbor, not so plentifully supplied, whom they are fraternally helping: and helping not in any spirit of condescension, not with any taint of pride or of position, but with real interest and personal friendship, and delight in giving pleasure. "Blessed is he that considereth the poor and needy." Considereth!—the benediction does not come to the careless giver. "Give to him that asketh thee"—give what? Give your attention, your best thought, your helping hand, yourself.

This is the way we spell it. It's necessary to mention it, because some women don't seem to know. We find so many who say they use Pearlina, and then, upon examination, find that what they are using is only some imitation of it.

See if your package is marked as above. There is only one Pearlina. It makes white things whiter—bright things brighter—economical and saves at every point. For washing and cleaning, nothing under any other name can equal it.

SIXTY-FIVE YEARS' WORK FOR CHRIST.

Splendid Record of the Brooklyn City Mission—Gospel Efforts that have Broadened with the Years—Redeeming the Homeless and Saving the Outcast.

BROOKLYN, besides being a city of churches, is also the home of many other noble, practical, Christian philanthropes. One of the most distinguished and useful of these is the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society, an organization which, for two-thirds of a century, has been laboring for the evangelization and improvement of the poor and the criminal among a very large cosmopolitan population. Its missionaries go into the piers, the lodging-houses, and the slums, and they preach the living Gospel of Christ to a multitude who would not otherwise be brought within the reach of evangelical ministrations. Its work lies among a variety of nationalities. Founded sixty-five years ago, it has steadily widened its field and multiplied its energies and the number of its workers with the passing years, until now, in the zenith of its activity, it has become one of the grandest agencies in the city missions, rescue a temperance work every known of his continent. Thousands of convicts can indicate the good of their contact with the Mission at the turning-point of their lives; a multitude of prosperous homes owe to it much of their happiness, and the afflicted poor in the tenements, who have been rescued from absolute starvation by its generous benevolence in times of depression, regard it with loving gratitude. Eleven churches, of various Protestant denominations, have grown out of the labors of its missionaries in Brooklyn and its immediate suburbs.

DR. G. LE LACHEUR, Superintendent.

to help the seamen spiritually the Mission has a Floating Bethel, and is contemplating the establishment of a sailors' boarding house and shipping agency which are greatly needed. Its missionaries reported last year 2,460 ships and canal boats visited.

The officers of the Society, which has its headquarters at 102-110 Flatbush avenue, Brooklyn, are: S. S. Marples, Chairman; and J. J. Tower, Vice-Chairman; Thomas Christie, Treasurer. The Executive Committee consists of: Thomas A. Nelson, D.D., Asa W. Parker, A. D. Wheelock, Charles W. Ide, C. A. Perkins, L. D. Mason, M.D., G. Hoyt, Thomas B. McLeod, D.D., Harold McGill Davis, Alfred H. Porter, James W. Elwell, Dwight Johnson, and G. LeLacheur, M.D., the last four being ex-officio. Dr. LeLacheur, who is the General Superintendent and Secretary of the Mission, was a medical missionary who joined the Society's forces eight years ago. About four years ago he was appointed General Superintendent and his extraordinary zeal and practical methods have been of the utmost value. A thorough Christian, his enthusiasm expends itself in action, and his ability as an executive has been demonstrated by the great progress the work has made under his charge. He has planned and established the Industrial Department, the Lodging-House work, also various other branches, besides opening up new and valuable fields of Christian effort. He is ably aided in his labors by Mrs. LeLacheur who established the "Helping Hand Mission" for Homeless Girls, which is a remarkable success. He also founded and established a Shelter House, a Faith Chapel and various other agencies that are now in successful operation and doing much good. A portrait of Superintendent LeLacheur appears on this page.

Another devoted and efficient worker, whose efforts have done much to strengthen the Mission is Mr. Nathaniel Nicolai, whose special field is conducting Gospel meetings, and visiting business men and philanthropists who have become personally interested in the Mission and contribute to its support.

The Brooklyn City Mission Society is un denominational. It was organized in 1829 and has a foreign Home and Medical mission, HOME AGAIN!

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage. Text: Luke 15: 23, "Bring hither the fatted calf and kill it."

IN all ages of the world it has been customary to celebrate joyful events by festivity—the signing of treaties, the proclamation of peace, the Christmas, the marriage. However much on other days of the year our table may have stinted supply, on Thanksgiving Day there must be something bounteous. And all the comfortable homes of Christendom have at some time celebrated joyful events by banquet and festivity.

Something has happened in the old homestead greater than anything that has ever happened before. A favorite son, whom the world supposed would become a vagabond and outlaw forever, has got tired of sight-seeing, and has returned to his father's house. The world said he never would come back. The old man always said his son would come. He had been looking for him day after day and year after year. He knew he would come back. Now, having returned to his father's house, the father proclaims celebration. There is a calf in the paddock that has been kept up and fed to utmost capacity, so as to be ready for some occasion of joy that might come along. Ah! there never will be a grander day on the old homestead than this day. Let the butchers do their work, and the housekeepers bring into the table the smoking meat. The musicians will take their places, and the gay groups will move up and down the floor. All the friends and neighbors are gathered in, and extra supply is sent out to the table of the servants. The father presides at the table, and says grace, and thanks God that his long-absent boy is home again. Oh! how they missed him; how glad they are to have him back. One brother indeed stands pouting at the back door, and says: "This is a great ado about nothing; this bad boy should have been chastened instead of greeted; veal is too good for him!" But the father says, "Nothing is too good; nothing is good enough." There sits the young man, glad at the hearty reception, but a shadow of sorrow flitting across his brow at the remembrance of the trouble he had seen. All ready now. Let the covers lift. Music. He was dead and he is alive again! He was lost and he is found! By such bold imagery does the Bible set forth the merry-making when a soul comes home to God.

First of all, there is the new convert's joy. It is no tame thing to become a Christian. The most tremendous moment in a man's life is when he surrenders himself to God. The grandest time on the father's homestead is when the boy comes back. Among the great throng who, in the parlors of my church, professed Christ one night was a young man, who next morning rang my door-bell and said: "Sir, I cannot contain myself with the joy I feel; I came here this morning to express it. I have found more joy in five minutes in serving God than in all the years of my prodigality, and I came to say so."

Oh, it is no tame thing to become a Christian. It is a merry-making. It is the killing of the fatted calf. It is jubilee. You know the Bible never compares it to a funeral, but always compares it to something bright. It is more apt to be compared to a banquet than anything else. It is compared in the Bible to the water—bright, flashing water; to the morning—rosate, treasured, mountain-transfigured morning. I wish I could to-day take all the Bible expressions about pardon and peace, and life and comfort, and hope and heaven, and twist them into one garland, and put it on the brow of the humblest child of God in all this land, and cry: "Wear it, wear it now, wear it forever, son of God, daughter of the Lord God Almighty. Oh, the joy of the new convert! Oh, the gladness of the Christian service!"

You have seen sometimes a man in a religious assembly get up and give his experience. Well, Paul gave his experience. He rose in the presence of two churches—the church on earth and the church in heaven—and he said: "Now, this is my experience: 'sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; poor, yet making many rich; having nothing, yet possessing all things.'" If all the people who read this sermon knew the joys of the Christian religion, they would all pass over into the kingdom of God the next moment. When Daniel Sandeman was dying of cholera, his attendant said: "Have you much pain?" "Oh," he replied, "since I found the Lord I have never had any pain except sin." Then they said to him: "Would you like to send a message to your friends?" "Yes, I would: tell them that only last night the love of Jesus came rushing into my soul like the surges of the sea, and I had to cry out, 'Stop, Lord; it is enough! Stop, Lord—enough!'" Oh, the joys of this Christian religion!

Just pass over from those tame joys in which you are indulging—joys of this world—into the raptures of the Gospel. The world cannot satisfy you; you have found out—Alexander, longing for other worlds to conquer, and yet drowned in his own bottle; Byron, whipped by disquietudes around the world; Voltaire, cursing his own soul while all the streets of Paris were applauding him; Henry II., consuming with hatred against poor Thomas a-Becket—all illustrations of the fact that this world cannot make a man happy. The very man who poisoned the pommel of the saddle on which Queen Elizabeth rode, shouted in the street, "God save the Queen!" One moment the world applauds, and the next moment the world anathematizes. Oh, come over into this greater joy, this sublime solace, this magnificent beatitude. The night after the battle of Shiloh, there were thousands of wounded on the field, and the ambulances had not come; one Christian soldier, lying there a-dying under the starlight, began to sing:

There is a land of pure delight,

And when he came to the next line there were scores of voices uniting:

Where saints immortal reign.

The song was caught up all over the field among the wounded, until, it was said, there were at least ten thousand wounded men uniting their voices as they came to the verse:

There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers;
Death like a narrow stream divides,
That heavenly land from ours.

Oh, it is a great religion to live by, and it is a great religion to die by. There is only one heart throb between you and that religion this moment. Just look into the face of your pardoning God, and surrender yourself for time and for eternity, and he is yours, and heaven is yours, and all is yours. Some of you, like the young man of the text, have gone far astray. I know not the history, but you know it—you know it.

When a young man went forth into life, the legend says, his guardian angel went forth with him, and getting him into a field, the guardian angel swept a circle clear around where the young man stood. It was a circle of virtue and honor, and he must not step beyond that circle. Armed foes came down, but were obliged to halt at the circle—they could not pass. But one day a temptress, with diamonded hand, stretched forth and crossed that circle with the hand, and the tempted soul took it, and by that one fell grip was brought beyond the circle, and died. Some of you have stepped beyond that circle. Would you not like this day, by the grace of God, to step back? This, I say to you, is your hour of salvation. There was in the closing hours of Queen Anne what is called the clock scene. Flat down on the pillow in helpless sickness, she could not move her head or move her hand. She was waiting for the hour when the ministers of state should gather in angry contest; and worried and worn out by the coming hour, and in momentary absence of the nurse, in the power—the strange power which delirium sometimes gives one—she arose and stood in front of the clock, and stood there watching the clock when the nurse returned. The nurse said, "Do you see anything peculiar about that clock?" She made no answer, but soon died. There is a clock scene in every history. If some of you would rise from the bed of lethargy and come out of your delirium of sin, and look on the clock of your destiny this moment, you would see and hear something you have not seen or heard before, and every tick of the minute, and every stroke of the hour, and every swing of the pendulum, would say: "Now, now, now, now!" Oh, come home to your Father's house. Come home, oh, prodigal, from the wilderness. Come home, come home!

But I notice that when the prodigal came, there was the father's joy. He did not greet him with any formal "how do you do?" He did not come out and say, "You are unfit to enter; go out and wash in the trough by the well, and then you can come in; we have had enough trouble with you." Ah, no! When the proprietor of that estate proclaimed festival, it was an outburst of a father's love and a father's joy. God is your father. Our God is not a Sultan, not a despot, but a Father—kind, loving, forgiving, and he makes all heaven ring again when a prodigal comes back. "I have no pleasure," he says, "in the death of him that dieth."

If a man does not get to heaven, it is because he will not go there. No difference the color, no difference the history, no difference the antecedents, no difference the surroundings, no difference the sin. When the white horses of Christ's victory are brought out to celebrate the eternal triumph, you may ride one of them, and as God is greater than all, his joy is greater; and when a soul comes back, there is in his heart the surging of an infinite ocean of gladness; and to express that gladness, it takes all the rivers of pleasure, and all the thrones of pomp, and all the ages of eternity. It is a joy deeper than all depth, and higher than all height, and wider than all width, and vaster than all immensity. It overtops, it undergirds, it outweighs all the united splendor and joy of the universe. Who can tell what God's joy is?

You remember reading the story of a king, who on some great day of festivity scattered silver and gold among the people, who sent valuable presents to his courtiers; but methinks when a soul comes back, God is so glad that to express his joy he flings out new worlds into space, kindles up new suns, and rolls among the white-robed anthems of the redeemed a greater hallelujah, while with a voice that reverberates among the mountains of frankincense and is echoed back from the everlasting gates, he cries "This, my son, was dead, and is alive again!"

At the opening of the Exposition in New Orleans, I saw a Mexican flutist, and played the solo, and then afterward eight or ten bands of music, accompanied by the great organ, came in; but the soul of that one flute as compared with all the orchestra, was greater than all the combined joy of the universe, when compared with the resounding heart of Almighty God.

For ten years, a father went three times a day to the depot. His son went on aggravating circumstances; but the father said, "He will come back." The son was too much, and his mind parted; three times a day the father went. In an early morning, he watched the train's arrival, the stepping out of the passenger, and then the departure of the train. At noon he was there again, watching the advance of the train, watching the departure. At night, there again, watching the coming, watching the going, for ten years. He was sure his son would come back. He has been watching and waiting for some of you, my brothers, ten years, twenty years, thirty years, forty years, perhaps fifty years—waiting, waiting, watching, watching, and if this morning the prodigal should come home, what a scene of gladness and festivity, and how the great Father's heart would rejoice at your coming home. He will come, some of you, will you not? You will! you will!

I notice also that when a prodigal comes home there is the joy of the ministers of religion. Oh, it is a grand thing to preach this Gospel! I know there has been a great deal said about the trials and the hardships of the Christian ministry. I have seen somebody would write a good, rough book about the joys of the Christian ministry. Since I entered the profession I have seen more of the goodness of God than I will be able to celebrate in all eternity. I know some boast about their equilibrium, and they do not rise into enthusiasm, they do not break down with emotion. I confess to you plainly that when I see a man coming to God and giving up his life, I feel in body, mind and soul a transport. When I see a man, who is bound hand and foot in evil habit, emancipated, I rejoice over it as though it were my own emancipation.

Have not ministers a right to rejoice when a prodigal comes home? They are the trumpet, and ought they not to be heard of the gathering of the host! They point to the full supply, and ought they not to rejoice when souls pant as the hart for the water-brooks? They came forth saying, "All things are now ready." Ought they not to rejoice when the prodigal sits at the banquet?

We are in sympathy with all inner harmonies. We can enjoy a hearty laugh, and we can be merry with the merriest, but those of us who have toiled in the service are ready to testify that all these joys are tame compared with the satisfaction of seeing men enter the kingdom of God. In great eras of every minister are the outpourings of the Holy Ghost, and I thank God I have seen twenty of them. I thank God, thank God!

I notice also when the prodigal comes back, all earnest Christians rejoice. They stood on a promontory and there was a hurricane at sea, and it was blowing toward the shore, and a vessel crashed against the rocks and you saw people get ashore. The life boats and the very last man on the rocks in safety, you could not contain your joy. And it is a glad time when the church of God sees men who are tossed on the ocean of their sins plant their feet on the rock Christ Jesus.

When prodigals come home just as those Christians sing. It is not a dull you hear at such times. Just hear the Christians pray. It is not a stereotyped supplication we have heard over and over again for twenty years, but a putting the case in the hands of God with an im-ading. Men never pray at great unless they have nothing to say and hearts are hard and cold. All the in the Bible that were answered port prayers: "God be merciful to mer." And just m pray now that the prodigals are home. And then see those Christian ow illumined they are. Sixty-Five Years' Work for Christ.

"We have a missionary laboring among the criminal part of our population," Mr. Nicolai explained to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "and services are held in the King's County Penitentiary and in Raymond Street Jail every week. One missionary is constantly laboring in the County buildings, through whose instrumentality the Gospel is preached and sung to over 5,000 criminals. We have a missionary who visits the numerous lodging houses between Fulton Ferry and City Hall, in which hundreds of homeless men sleep every night. Our Women's Auxiliary has six missionaries working among factory girls, and in the police courts rescuing young girls, and also among the Italians and Jews.

"Since the establishment of our Industrial Department," he added, "we have furnished employment to 400 men, have fitted out 1,000 with clothing, and given over 158,000 meals and 77,370 lodgings. Last year we produced brooms of our own manufacture to the value of $13,000. Our main object is not only to relieve the immediate necessities of our beneficiaries, but to try to restore them to a condition of self-support and self-respect. An Industrial Department of missionary work has become a great necessity in every large city, and an object of our work is to give employment to homeless and friendless men who cannot find employment otherwise. Some of them are discharged from prison, some from hospital. How to deal with the thousands of idle and able-bodied men, who are constantly found in a large city, especially in the winter season, is a difficult problem to solve. Should no opportunity arise to secure outside work employment for the applicant, he is set to work at the Mission's broom factory, where numbers of unskilled laborers, with very little training, can be made to turn out a quantity of work that materially aids in defraying the cost of their support. Another industrial feature is the City Mission Farm, at Smithtown, L.I., where, during the spring and summer months, a number of men are employed. Other work is also furnished for the men, including chair-caning, repairing, etc., according to their ability. An illustration, accompanying this article, shows the interior of the Broom and Chair Department of the Mission.

On the Floating Bethel, an illustration of which is presented on the first page of this issue, the evangelical labors have been greatly blessed. Captain H. L. Meeker, who is in charge of the work, has given as the average number of sailors who visited the Bethel in a year, 5,458, of whom 2760 attended Divine service, and 195 made requests for prayer; 678 signed temperance pledges in a year, and nearly 1,500 Bibles, testaments and tracts were distributed among the sailors by the mission-

Sunday School Missionary Henry Densmore Passes to his Reward—A Noble Record of Christian Service.

THE LATE REV. HENRY DENSMORE.

WHEN the roll is called up yonder," and the trials and triumphs of God's people on earth are rehearsed, the names of a host of humble and unostentatious workers, who have given their whole lives to the cause of the Gospel, will not be omitted. Such a one was Henry Densmore, a veteran missionary of the American Sunday School Union, whose extraordinary career of Christian activity came to a close at Blanchard, Mich., on Oct. 24, last. Mr. Densmore was born in Ohio, in 1822, and moved with his parents to Michigan when that State was a wilderness, occupied by Indians and wild animals. He belonged to a family of giants, being one of six brothers, each of whom was over six feet tall, Henry being six feet four inches. The father and sons farmed, while the women spun flax, made all the garments, and kept house. They had no schools or churches. In due time a missionary came along and organized a Sunday School, and, at the age of sixteen, Henry, without a common school education, was chosen Superintendent. His ardent love for children, and the help of the missionary, gave him great success in the work, so much so that he was urged to enter the service as a missionary of the American Sunday School Union in his own State. This he declined to do, being still too worldly-minded to recognize a divine call in the matter. Some time after, he contracted consumption, and soon the doctors told him he had less than three months to live. Then, and then only, did he decide to devote the balance of his days to the Lord, and he was commissioned, but only for a short period, and against the remonstrances of his friends.

The field was 150 miles from home, among the pine forests, where he miraculously revived, and was soon restored to health. He never left the service since that hour, when he set out, as his friends fully believed, only to die. His record of twenty-five years' work shows 450 new Sunday Schools organized, with 1,829 teachers, and 15,000 scholars; 2,414 addresses made, 671 other schools visited and aided, with 12,169 teachers, and over 100,000 scholars; books to the value of many thousands of dollars sold or distributed among needy schools; thousands of Bibles and Testaments distributed, and nearly 5,000 visits made to families on the field. To accomplish this work, Mr. Densmore has traveled over 200,000 miles, over mountain, forest and river, a distance computed as fully equal to eight times around the world. The greater part of his traveling was done on a pair of sturdy Indian ponies. He was the last of a band of five missionaries, who began work in the Michigan field about the same time, the others having gone to their reward.

His snowy hair and beard framed a face that shone with kindness in every feature. While in New York recently, he visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, and recalled some of his more striking experiences, and an article on the subject appeared in our columns at the time, which many readers will remember.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE BROOKLYN CITY MISSION AND TRACT SOCIETY.

pitals, and others are those who flock to our cities and become victims of circumstances."

One of the most interesting features of the Society's field is its Industrial Rescue Work. Many have been redeemed from the lowest grade of tramping, and restored to respectability through its efforts. Similar success, although on somewhat different lines, has attended the efforts of the Mission among fallen women. At "The Helping Hand Mission," on Willoughby Street, many poor wanderers have been reclaimed, and won back to lives of usefulness and respectability. In the past twelve months the Home has sheltered two hundred and forty-five girls.

Of a distinct character is the work among the vast number of unemployed, who through misfortune or sickness, have been rendered helpless, and dependent upon aries. A number of instances of conversion have occurred on the Bethel, and the work is increasing every year.

To enumerate, even with slight detail, the various excellent agencies which this great Mission has set at work for the furtherance of the Gospel, would occupy many columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Not only are many souls being won by its workers, in the prisons, on the streets, on shipboard and in the various Homes and Shelters which it controls; but of all practical methods that will help in restoring the degraded masses to a sphere of respectability it has shown a high and vigorous appreciation. Girls improvement clubs, medical missionary work, German, Hebrew, Italian, Scandinavian, Chinese and other missions are all being conducted by its devoted and energetic missionaries.

OPPOSITION TO CHRIST.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 25. Mark 3:22-35.
Golden Text John 1: 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

CONSIDER him that endured such contradiction against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds" (Heb. 12:2). The ministry of our blessed Lord was, from first to last, opposed and thwarted by men and devils. "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword," or, rather, division. "He came unto his own, and his own received him not." Instead of hailing with joy the birth of the "King of the Jews," Jerusalem was troubled at the very news of his birth; and her king, Herod, took measures to get rid of him even in his early infancy. Bethlehem could find no room for him in the inn where travellers were welcomed. And, very soon after the commencement of his ministry, a systematic opposition to his life and teaching was instituted and maintained by the leaders of religion and religious thought in his day. His first visit to Jerusalem in the capacity of teacher, had gone far to arouse the jealousy and enmity of the priests and theologians of Jerusalem, when they saw the standing scandal of the desecrations of the temple swept away in one hour by the irresistible authority of One whom they only knew as an obscure peasant from the despised province of Galilee. Even John the Baptist's ministry, so popular at first, and patronized even by Herod, who "did many things, and heard him gladly," passed from the priests and Levites, who were sent officially from Jerusalem to investigate his personal and prophetic authority. The popular mind was ill at ease under the searching teaching of the Baptist: how much more under that of Christ, with its powerful "seal of works which none other man did." The religious leaders of the day became more and more alive to the fact that, if Christ's ministry were to go on, their influence must decline, and thus they lost no time and no opportunity to thwart and hinder, to combat, and to bring into contempt both the Teacher and the Doctrine which so reflected upon their own powerless words and deeds. Thus, wherever Jesus went, he was accompanied, and his footsteps were dogged, by critics, eagerly watching, jealously listening, for something by which they might condemn him.

at Nazareth, as we have already seen, the opposition to God's Christ was so intense that, taking the law into their own hands, the members of the synagogue had attempted, but in vain, to take the life of the meek Offender, on the ground that he was only Joseph's son, personally known to them, and therefore they could not accept that the words he had read from Isa. 41: were fulfilled in him. They were aroused, their consciences were pricked; but their prejudices, their own views of Scripture, their national pride, could not, and would not yield. There was no stopping short, no probability of compromise, no taking up a neutral position. Then, as now, the words of Christ were true: "He that is not with me is against me" (Matt. 12: 30); and thus early in his career, the men he came to save sought to

from the world. Jealous of the multitudes which followed Jesus "to hear and to be healed by him of their infirmities," Pharisees and doctors of the law came out of every town of Galilee, and Judea and Jerusalem. They were a representative company; the cause of the established order of things was at stake, and the commission of inquiry was instituted on a large scale. What it must have been for Jesus to carry on his ministry of love and power and blessing in such an atmosphere under such a system of espionage, we can never know. But this we do know, that he took this, with all else, from his Father, and himself never shunned the cross, which he called on his followers to take up for his sake,

There are many trials which are easier to bear than constant, systematic contradiction. But the Master led the way, in his ministry, to the victory of his own over this temptation, too. When the paralytic was let down through the roof of the house in Capernaum, opposition was working in the hearts of those unfriendly spectators, and Jesus dealt with it before it found expression, and answered the thoughts of those men, thus putting them to shame. On a subsequent occasion, in the house of Levi or Matthew, the publican, they, having been exposed by Jesus before, went more cautiously to work, and attacked Jesus through his disciples—neither frank enough nor courageous enough to speak to him directly: "Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners?" They got their answer from the Old Testament Scriptures. Then they changed their tactics, and questioned the action of the disciples, not speaking directly to them, but to Christ. Oh, the meanness of this cowardly spirit, which dares not speak directly to one! It was consonant with their whole attitude of these men, who must have felt ill at ease in the holy transparency of the atmosphere in which the Son of God lived and walked. Again they got their answer (Luke 5:33-35).

Jesus could not go through the cornfields but that these spies went too: and again they raised a question, which was answered from the Word (Luke 6: 3-5). He could not heal the man with the withered hand, but that the commission of inquiry made a note that he had, on two occasions, broken the Sabbath (Luke 5: 2), and "they were filled with madness, and communed, one with another, what they might do."

When he was invited to eat bread, his enemies went too, having perhaps themselves made the arrangements, that their opportunity might be the better to attain their purpose. In one case, the very Pharisee who had bidden him was the critic (Luke 7: 36-50); on another occasion, it is expressly stated, "as he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the Sabbath day, that they watched him" (Luke 14: 1).

It was but the culmination of this opposition, when these religious leaders, near the time of his decease, grew desperate. He had raised Lazarus from the dead, and these, his enemies, who had before sought to apprehend him (John 7:44-49), and could not find any of the officers who would lay hands on him, gathered a council, not to examine into the claims of Christ to Messiahship; not to institute an inquiry as to whether the truth of God was with him, but to secure their own position and reputation, at any cost, by getting rid of him. "What do we?" they said, "for this Man doeth many signs. If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him, and the Romans will come and take away both our place and our nation" (John 11:47, 48, R V.), and the high priest prophesied that Jesus must die for the nation. Oh, how little they knew that in their wicked enmity they were, nevertheless, working out the purposes of God!

Can we wonder if we, too, meet with opposition? The offence of the cross has not ceased. We are sent out as

"Lambs in the Midst of Wolves," but the wolf atmosphere around us is God's precious provision for the living of a lamb-like life. It is our high privilege to be "joint heirs with Christ," by being permitted to share in his experiences down here. Paul suffered the loss of all things that he might "know him and the fellowship of his sufferings." The world and the natural heart of man cannot endure opposition. The instinct of retaliation is rooted in the very being of one's self life. But our beloved Lord came to introduce newness of life, divine nature, the life of God, in which there is no retaliation, for "God is love."

Jesus had been casting out a devil from one who was blind and dumb. The man was now speaking and seeing, "and all the multitudes were amazed, and said: 'Is not this son of David?'" This was the occasion, probably, when the multitudes came together in such numbers that the Lord and his disciples found no leisure, so much as to eat; and his friends interfered, saying that he was beside himself.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A JEWISH SCRIBE

ecclesiastical lawyers. Originally mere writers and copyists, they had risen to the rank of a learned profession. Their time being chiefly spent in making superbly written copies of the law and the works of the prophets, they acquired a mechanical familiarity with the sacred books, and so, easily secured recognition as authorities on all questions of Jewish history and as interpreters of the law. They were the best instruments the council at Jerusalem could employ to discredit Jesus. Already they had charged him with Sabbath-breaking, and with blasphemy, and now they were about to make an outrageous accusation, which cut Jesus to the quick and elicited from him a more careful and elaborate reply than he usually gave to accusers. It is probable that while they were at Capernaum, Jesus worked the two miracles which Matthew describes (9 : 32 and 12 : 22). Mark does not describe them, but alludes to them. The Scribes could not deny the miracles in the face of the evidence ; indeed, they may have witnessed them. But with characteristic ingenuity and malignity, they made a wicked imputation which would surely impress the people. "Yes," they said in effect, "Jesus had cast out these two devils and had delivered the sufferers. There is no question about it ; but how had he done it ? He was in league with the prince of devils, who had invested him with power over the lower orders of demons. These inferior demons obeyed him as they would their master, Beelzebub, whose deputy Jesus was." It was a crafty suggestion which would, if believed, cause the people to shrink from Jesus in horror, as an incarnation of Satan. Jesus perceived the danger, and recognizing the malignity of the aspersion, turned upon his assailants with a vigor which they and the people must have been unprepared for in so gentle a teacher. Brushing aside any personal resentment, he charges them with speaking against the Holy Ghost. He indignantly brands their accusation with its real character. But the mischief was done. Even Mary and his family were affected. They would have withdrawn him from his work if they could. They acted as if he were a fanatic, or a lunatic, who must be cared for. Again, as when a boy in the Temple, and as at the marriage at Cana, Jesus has plainly to tell his mother that her relationship could not be permitted to interfere with his higher obligations. It is strange that, to this day, Roman Catholics should implore the Virgin's intercession with her Son, when the Gospel so explicitly how unavailing it was when he was on earth.

The s told of one man who suffered torture account. An evangelist, hearing sought him out and asked him thought he had committed the unpardon sin. "I have opposed the work of he said. "So did Paul," was the re have denied Christ." "So did Pet rejected the testimony of his ser "So did Thomas." "I have sinned light." "So did David." For 1 time in years, the man looked up in his face. "Do you think God give me?" "I know he will, if y it." The man sought and had th ane of forgiveness.

Another case did not end so happily. The minister who tells it believes the man had really committed the unpardonable sin. The conversation took place at a revival meeting, where one of the men was urged to give his heart to God. He replied: "It is useless; God would not do me." "Why?" "I do not want for one thing." The terrors of damnation were explained to him, but "Yes, I know it all, and I wonder how I can be so insensible, but I simply don't care. I will not make any effort to arouse him to a sense of his sin. It will be futile." The man sighed as he said: "I wish I had the desire for salvation. I came here hoping it would be excused. I have none." The minister, who was a good man, afterward learned that the man had once professed in a revival to have been saved, and had fallen away. He had sealed his doom by ridiculing his fellow sinners in worldly company. He had been in the habit of declaring that he had tested the influence of the Holy Spirit, and had found it a fraud. There was not power in it as in mesmerism, and much like mesmerism. "I believe," the minister who tells the story, "that God punished him by leaving him alone, so that he could not repent, because God did him the power to do so."

That kingdom cannot stand. The Jesuits who went to Germany to protect the interests of the Romish Church says the great historian Ranke, Spinoza who were at a great disadvantage unfamiliar with the language. I took possession of the universities and conquered us on our own ground in our own homes, and made a large part of the country their own. This, he goes on to say, sprang entirely from the want of understanding among the Protestant dissenters, and of sufficient enlargement of mind to tolerate unessential differences. We were united; we were separated. We were in violent opposition among each other and were an easy prey to these crafty strangers.

All sins shall be forgiven. So sinners have had a difficulty in realizing the truth of this promise. The difficulty was from the impossibility of fully comprehending the sublimity of God's love. The greatest natures among men, the most noble, like, which are the most ready to forgive. It is the small, weak men who cannot give. When the Duke of Argyll, taken in rebellion against the will of the meanest of all the Stuarts, James II., was brought into the presence of the king, James said to him: "You know it is my power to pardon you?" Argyll replied: "It is in your power, but it is not in my nature." He was condemned to death. On the morning of the execution, he came to his affairs, and then retired to a private room to pray. On being told that the hour of execution had arrived, he came with a cheerful face. "I know," he said, "God forgives my sins, and I die in peace."

DISCIPLES IN CONFERENCE.

Phases of Aggressive Christian Work at Home and Abroad Discussed at the Convention of the Church of the Disciples of Christ at Richmond, Va.

Recent issue of this journal we briefly outlined the work of the Church of the Disciples, and referred to the approaching national convention of the Church. We are now enabled, by the kindness of Rev. S. T. Willis, pastor of the second Church of the Disciples in New York, to publish the picture of the convention held at Richmond, Va., in which the convention was held, with portraits of three of the prominent leaders of the denomination. Rev. Jabez Hall, pastor of the second Church, who was elected President of the Convention; Dr. L. Loos of Lexington, Ky., President of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society; and Rev. John Wells Allen, President of the Home Mission Board, which in the Disciples' Church is known by the title of the General Christian Missionary Convention.

The convention received a cordial welcome from Col. John B. Cary, who referred to the presence of the convention from the North. He said: "Many of you who approached our fair city with the inspiration of that slogan of 'to Richmond,' with tattered banners, carried ranks; then we barred our gates against you. To-day you brethren, marching under the banner of the blessed 'Prince of Peace,' and to you our gates and take you into the city and homes." In replying to the address, Mr. Allen struck the keynote of the convention. He said in the course of his address: "The chief need in the Kingdom of God is not larger numbers, nor broader culture, nor a better organization of our forces, valuable and these are, but the possession in measure of the Holy Spirit."

The reports of the four great Boards of the Church showed, however, that the membership of the various churches, while recognizing the need of the Holy Spirit's aid as an essential factor in all religious progress, had not neglected to supply funds for the same. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions had the gratifying news to give that it had received during the past year a total of $64,582 from all sources. The Church Extension reported the increase on its record, larger even than the phenomenal year of 1891, when it received from unexpected sources a total of $21,902. The General Christian Missionary Convention, which has for the home missions, reported the increase for the year at $37,865. This was the result of the money raised by the mission for church buildings, etc., which during the total contributed up to $88,000 and the Foreign Missionary Society reported the receipt of $73,258, a gain of $16,000 over the receipts of the previous year. That so much money should have been contributed at a time when nearly all religious enterprises are suffering from a decrease of income, was very gratifying to the Convention, and the subject of sincere thanks to the Lord in whom all gifts come.

The reports of spiritual results were encouraging. In the home field the pastor said: "The year has been the most fruitful in the conversion of souls of our history of our people. Great inner revivals have been made on every hand. The work of our evangelists has been blessed. We have been able to convert evangelistic efforts into much new work." But there was no disposition to rest with past achievements. After speaker echoed the desire of the Convention for larger and more earnest aggressive work. "The Disciples are optimistic," said the Rev. A. B. Philpott of Philadelphia, "and I am glad of it; but we must not fear to look facts in the face, and see them, we should report them. Ten thousand dollars expended by our evangelists to evangelize a single city would be a very modest sum with which to plant the Gospel in the waste places of the United States. The time has come for a greatly enlarged work. Christ has promised to be with us, but we must go to the world. He is the power to shake the hand of corn shake like the ear of Lebanon. Sowing sparingly, we shall reap sparingly, and sowing abundantly, so shall we reap. 'Missionary zeal,' the speaker continued, "must have a broader foundation than rivalry. Missionary giving is a solemn duty, and the men sent out with the money given are winning souls to Christ. The great motive prompting our generous giving should be to capture America for Christ. Men love the larger fellowship. The power of the great Endeavor movement is in its broad, undenominational fellowship; and this is so captivating that he who once feels it will never be willing to go back again to narrow and selfish aims and purposes. We must learn to give as did faithful Abraham: give as the widow who cast in all her living; give as the blessed Son of God, who gave all, that we, through his poverty, might become rich. Our brotherhood needs the quickening that comes from fresh and larger victories in new fields. We must not only be able to tell what we believe, but we must show what we are doing. Not what do you believe, but what are you doing, is the watchword of the nineteenth century. This is the day of our opportunity, and the future is in our grasp."

One of the most eloquent appeals made at the Convention came from the Rev. C. C. Smith, of Masillon, O., on behalf of the full plea. They have great claims upon our sympathy; all the claim which the needy have upon those who have abundance; which the weak have upon the strong; which the ignorant have upon the cultured; which the fallen have upon the upright; which the sinful have upon the righteous; which the barbarian had on Paul, and which we have upon Jesus Christ. In us is their only hope, and as we deliver them from weakness and sin, we free our country from pollution and death."

This earnest appeal had immediate results: an offering was taken up in the Convention which amounted to over two thousand dollars.

Christian Endeavor flourishes in the Church of the Disciples, its broad platform and its inter-denominational fellowship being characteristics always appreciated by the Church wherever they are found. Rev. J. Z. Tyler of Cleveland, O., is Superintendent of this branch of the work and he like the other officers of the Church was able to report progress. He said that the aggregate number of Societies given in the report one year ago was 1,681, which was 364 more than were given the year previous. The aggregate number reported this year is 3,248, an increase of 563 over the number given last year. "These Societies," Dr. Tyler said, "are supporting pastors and foreign missionaries, are helping to build tion the result of his conference with Dr. J. B. Hawthorne of Atlanta, Ga., and other Baptist ministers on the possibility of union between the Church of the Disciples and the Baptists, and asked for the appointment of a committee to continue the negotiations. Dr. Tyler in closing his address said that the first sermon he ever penned, now old and yellow, was on the subject of Christian Union. He declared that if he knew when he was to die he would be glad that his last utterance should be on the same subject. He was sometimes called a hobbyist, but he that as it might, he would willingly live and die in attempting to bring about that union for which his Master had so earnestly prayed.

The Foreign Mission work of the Church occupied the large share of the attention of the Convention which it deserves. It has, as in other churches, a double agency in the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and in the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Stations are occupied by one or the other, or by both, in Turkey, India, Japan, China and other lands. Seventy-five missionaries are supported by the Church of the Disciples, besides those employed by the Woman's Board, among which latter are several lady physicians who are doing valuable zenana work in India in addition to regular medical work in the hospitals and homes. In addition, an orphanage is maintained in the Bilaspur District in which there are twenty children. There is also a hospital in course of erection.

The address at the Convention on Foreign Missions was made by Rev. J. H. Garrison of St. Louis, Mo., who made an appeal almost pathetic in its eloquence for union among the churches in this great work. As a minister of the Church of the Disciples which acknowledges no creed but the Bible itself he pleaded fervently for the co-operation of Evangelical churches in the evangelizing of the heathen world. In the course of his address he said: "Jesus Christ, foreseeing the mighty issues of this age, prayed for the unity of his disciples, that the world might believe on him. He clearly makes Christian unity a condition of the success of his mission."

"These facts—not theories—raise a tremendous solemn issue with the religious world—namely: Denominationalism, or the conversion of the world—which? If any man thinks that he must hold to his denomination at the expense of the world's evangelization let him go to the shadows of Gethsemane, and as he hears the Master lift up his trembling voice in the petition, 'That all may be one that the world may believe that thou hast sent me,' let him interrupt the prayer with the selfish request: 'No, Master, let me cling to my denominational dogmas, even though the division they perpetuate should mar the unity of thy body and prevent the conversion of the world.' If he dare not say this to the Master, let him gladly surrender whatever is an obstacle to the unity of believers."

"The darkness and idolatry of the pagan world, whose population is increasing more rapidly than our converts, call mightily upon us to close up our divided ranks, and send the glorious Gospel of hope and inspiration to the perishing tribes of earth."

The last act of the Convention was the decision to extend the Foreign Missionary work by establishing a mission in some part of Africa. The next Convention will be held at Dallas, Tex., in October, 1895.

THE CONVENTION OF THE CHURCH OF THE DISCIPLES.

REV. CHARLES L. LOOS, D.D.—The Richmond, Va., Church, the Scene of the Convention—REV. JOHN W. ALLEN.

work among the colored people of the South. The Church of the Disciples takes a deep interest in this field and last year contributed $5,396 to carry it on, besides supporting at a cost of $1,189 the Southern Christian Institute. Mr. Smith who is the Secretary of the Board said that they were frequently asked why such work should be continued. He answered: "Because the ignorant and pagan populations increase more rapidly than they can be educated and Christianized. At the close of the decade ending with 1880 there were 350,000 more illiterate persons in the South than at the beginning of 1870. The census of 1890, not yet complete, shows that there are many more persons who could not read and write than in 1880. After all that has been done for the negro's education only one in three can read and write. Not one in a hundred has a good common school education. Not one in three hundred has a normal training, and not one in a thousand has a finished education."

"Yes; for this class of ignorant and sin-church-houses, endow chairs in colleges, and are opening reading-rooms, and doing all other kinds of religious work. In Kansas alone $9,743.14 have been raised during the past year. It will be a mistake, however, if we come to look upon our Societies as merely agencies to bring money into our treasury. These Societies would better be preserved as schools for spiritual culture and training in personal service to Christ. Money is not our greatest need. We need a higher type of Christians, a more thorough and intelligent consecration to Christ. We need to be so possessed by the very Word of our Master that we will repeat his life of serving and giving. Let the production of this type of character be the chief aim of every Christian Endeavor Society among the disciples of Christ."

An important subject before the Convention was that of Christian Union. Dr. B. B. Tyler, of New York, is one of the most earnest of the Disciples' ministers in this matter. Indeed he acknowledges himself an enthusiast. He reported to the Conven-

THE DEAD EMPEROR.

BORN as I was, not in a palace nor in anything that looked at all like it, but in a plain, country home, it was to me a most unusual scene, when, two years ago last summer, at the invitation of the Emperor, I entered the palace of Russia. I had gone to that land on a mission of bread. At the call of the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, about $50,000 had been contributed by the readers of this journal toward the relief of the famine-struck of Russia, and with the Publisher, I went to see the arrival of the shipload of bread-stuffs at St. Petersburg. The home-scene I witnessed in the palace of Russia has made what has transpired within the last few weeks sadly impressive. The domestic life of the Emperor was something unique and beautiful. Confidence and cheerfulness, and fidelity, and the affections conjugal, parental and filial, there reigned. The Emperor could not speak of the Empress without joy and pride, and her devotion to him was not a matter of court arrangement, or a result of imperial necessity, but of old-fashioned love. Never in any house on earth did sickness and death make sorer ravages than those which have broken the hearts of the Imperial household of Russia. I am not surprised that the nervous shock produced paralysis, and that it is feared the Empress will never walk again.

What a congregation of troubles! Last summer the daughter, to whom the Empress introduced me, saying, "She is just seventeen," was on her wedding tour by frightened horses hurled down the banks, and taken up insensible. The second son of the Emperor, whom I did not see because he was away traveling for his health, is now dying of consumption, and the illustrious head of the household is put away from the home of which he was the benediction. What a loss for the younger children, the youngest a laughing, bounding girl of about ten years, and Michael the youngest son perhaps four years older, and as lithe, and hearty, and blue-eyed and flaxen-haired a boy as ever struck a ball, or flew a kite, or with his halloo woke the echoes of the playground. God pity the fatherless! The young man who now mounts the throne was in no haste to ascend it. In all his manners there was nothing ambitious. Without his father's wonderful physique which was the most rubicund and athletic I ever saw, the son has I think his father's virtues, and the name of the new Emperor will be a synonym for peace. His marriage with the grand-daughter of Queen Victoria means an alliance of Great Britain, Germany and Russia, and those three nations will command Europe into peace. Though amid the orange blossoms there must needs be some myrtle entwined all Christendom will pray that the new household to be set up may be as healthful and bright and Christian as the one now dropped into ruins. A young man of twenty-six years of age called to rule one-hundred and twelve million people belonging to one hundred different tribes, and speaking forty different languages, needs the sympathies and prayers of nations.

ABOUT WILLS.

SOME charitable wills have made bequests only to churches or theological seminaries; others, only to literary institutions and for mental culture; others, only to institutions for physical relief; but other wills recognizes body, mind and soul, time and eternity. These testators see that people have eyes and ears, and contribute to eye and ear infirmity; see that people have limbs, and contribute to the society for the crippled; see that people have intellects, and contribute toward colleges and universities and art galleries and museums; see that they have souls, and contribute to tract societies and mission societies and Young Men's Christian Associations. The amount of good such a man or woman does by her signature to such a document neither the short years of time nor the unending years of eternity can tabulate.

Moreover, the example is catching. There are in all parts of this land men and women of large estate who are embarrassed with the attempt to take their money with them when they depart this life. There seems to be no express company that can safely transport their monetary accumulations into the next state of being. If they could take ten per cent. of it with them it would not be to them so great an embarrassment. But they can take out of the world no more than they brought in, and to land in heaven without a cent suggests to them a state of eternal impecuniosity. But these noble wills suggest to people of large fortune a change of investment. The testators have put their estate where they will gather from it dividends through all eternity. What a greeting for them from those who come up out of the hospitals for the incurable and the blind and the lame which they established! What a salutation from those who enter the shining gates from the other side of the earth, saved through their missionary benefactions! What a throng to surround them as a result of the tens of thousands of people brought to God through the ministers whom they have educated! May we not hope that these last wills and testaments will be a suggestion to the affluent people all over the world, that they may, through such a document, change their earthly investments into eternal securities.

The good influence of one man or woman's greatness of soul must be continental through all coming ages. What an elevated idea of human nature such acts give! People see so much of the selfishness of the world and the mean side of humanity that they become soured with the human race; but deeds like these halt the slanderous impression.

There are many who would do this if they had the means. Human nature is on the rise. There are so many good men and women the world cannot count them. We have told us in careful statistics every year how many criminals there are in the world, but no statistics of how many people are good and neighborly and kind and beneficent and Christian. God only gets those statistics, but the day comes when all the acts of kindness, whether by multi-millionaires or people of small means, shall be rewarded, whether it be the endowment of a university or a cup of cold water given in the name of a disciple.

THE COST OF WAR.

WAR is an expensive thing, whether you count its outlay in coin or blood. Though many years have gone by since our civil war ended, we have not yet recovered from the financial exhaustion of that great struggle. We are still paying for the foundered mules and shoddy and spoiled hard tack of that war, which cost twice as much as it would have cost if all the sutlers and contractors of that period had been half the time moderately honest. Never since the world stood has there been a war that might not have been avoided if the spirit of arbitration had been allowed full swing. But the level-headed men are not in the majority in any nation, hence the page of war is a crimson page and the pen with which it was written is the steel pen of the sword.

In the thirteen years between 1853 and 1866 the Italian wars cost 45,000 lives and $350,000,000; the Crimean wars cost 785,000 lives and $1,700,000,000; our American civil war (adding together what the North and South suffered) cost 800,000 lives and $9,450,000,000. During fourteen years in various parts of the world war took 1,734,000 lives and $12,036,000,000. In the first half of this century the United States expended in Indian wars $400,000,000. Why, the earth is staggering drunk with human blood!

But the world seems gradually, although very slowly, turning a new leaf, and the honors are yet to be paid to those who saved life more than those who destroyed life. The inventive faculty which has been put to utmost tension in contriving things that will kill more men to the minute and blow up ships into smaller fragments and quicker burn bombarded cities, will be turned to discoveries and inventions for curing alcoholism and cancer and consumption and all the ills to which the human race is heir, and for bringing ashore the shipwrecked and saving rail-trains from collision and boilers from explosion and for halting epidemics. Arbitration will be more and more of a word among all civilized nations. May the God of nations, by a mandate from the throne, command peace universal.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

G. M., Philadelphia. On what authority do you make the assertion in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Oct. 10, that "the Tabernacle was set up within the walls of Gibeon, during the reigns of David and Solomon?"

On the authority of 1 Chron. 16: 39 and 11 Chron. 1: 3. In the latter chapter (v. 4) it is explained that the Ark remained meanwhile at Jerusalem.

Leon Brower, Manchester, N. H. Where can I find any account of the size and weight of the Tables of Stone?

The Nedarim, one of the most ancient of Jewish books, says the tables of Moses were six ells long, six broad, and three thick. They probably weighed over twenty tons. According to our measurements, they would each be nine feet long, nine broad, and four and a half feet thick.

Anna Lewis, Cleveland, O. In a book I am reading I find a reference to the Seven Champions of Christendom. Who were they?

The Champions, so-called, were: St. George, of England; St. Denis, of France; St. James, of Spain; St. Anthony, of Italy; St. Andrew, of Scotland; St. Patrick, of Ireland, and St. David, of Wales. Many strange and improbable adventures are attributed to them, and the greater part of their history is pure myth.

W. M. P., Newton, Ind. Please state size of the Bibles you offer as premiums; also whether they are reference Bibles. I wish to send for one, but would like a fuller description.

The International Teachers' Bibles offered as premiums are all complete reference Bibles, with maps, concordance, subject-index, &c. That given as premium with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $2 measures open, flaps included, 7x11 inches; that sent to $3 subscribers measures open, flaps included, about 8x12 inches.

Mrs. E. Seales, Harvard, Ill. My subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD expires Dec. 12. I desire to renew, and to have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and International Teachers' Bible premium (B-Three). Price combined, $4. I also want the book "Pathway of Life." What will be the price of all combined?

By sending $1 additional, or $4 in all, you can secure the extra premium "The Pathway of Life." This rate is established for the benefit of subscribers who may wish to take more than one premium with their subscription.

Subscriber, New York. A certain law was passed a few years ago, which has never been enforced (although it is known to be broken many times a day), for the reason that legal authority pronounces it an unconstitutional act, and that it will never hold good. Could a man do business contrary to a law that is looked upon in that light, and still be a Christian?

Obedience to lawful authority in secular things, and respect for the laws of the land, except as they offend God and the conscience of a Christian's duty. (See Luke Rem. 13: 1-7; Titus 3: 1; 1 Peter 2: 13-17.) If a law conflicts with our God, it should not be respected (see Acts 5: 29). Objections on our part, do not justify breaking it, save for the reason above stated, if that reason exists.

T. B. (a school teacher), Binghamton, N. Y. Languages were spoken in Palestine in the time of Christ?

Aramaic, Latin and Greek. The tongue of the language of the common people, that of the more educated classes. Publications, official records, etc., in the Christ were probably kept in Latin.

Subscriber, Fort Steilacoom, Wash. Are there any others who offer with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD new subscribers only?

No; every subscriber, old or new, is privileged to enjoy all the premium advantages offered with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, carefully the instructions for the guide subscribers on page 729 of this issue.

Annie N. Mullis, Luton, Iowa. What Psalmist mean by the swallow building on the altar (Ps. 84: 3)?

Two explanations are possible. One a custom which existed among several of antiquity may have been observed. Jews, of never disturbing the nests, which were built within or without the temple. They were regarded as under the protection of the Deity. The other and more explanation is that one line of the poem is lost. "The Psalmist's meaning was that as 'the sparrow had house and the swallow a nest' when was assured, so he had found such a place, 'even thy altars.'"

N. Smith, Binghamton, N. Y. Is there any of Paul's life in Arabia, to which he alludes in Galatians 1: 17?

No, there is nothing said about it. Acts. The visit probably took place soon after his conversion. It is improbable that the years which elapsed between his conversion and the beginning of his great work of ministry were spent in Damascus. The claim him from a persecutor to an advocate of Christianity was so radical that he may have needed seclusion, that he might find his new position. It is likely that he Arabia for the purpose and came back with a clear view of Christianity, as a development of Judaism, which forms so much of his epistles.

Reader, Philadelphia. Does philology entitle us to the language that our first parents spoke?

Unfortunately it does not. There are many things beyond the reach of human knowledge and the site of Eden language of our first parents are number. Some philologists have ventured to conjecture that the primeval language have been a simple vocabulary whose origin is indicated in Gen. 2: 19, and which strictly limited to the natural requirements of our first progenitors; in other words, sounds apprehensible by the senses. That speech, or the power of expressions, or desires, was coeval with the existence of man. The earliest monuments and monuments yet discovered do not reach as far into antiquity as the confusion of tongues at Babel (about B. C. 2200), previous to which (Gen. 2: 1), the Biblical record states that the whole earth was of one language and speech, although probably there were variations and dialects, each containing elements of the original tongue. Many utterances were probably what philologists term a "physical language," limited to the expression of simple needs and afterwards expanded to meet man's growing experience of his own nature and the world around him.

RUSSIA'S RULER DEAD.

FROM the beautiful palace of Livadia in the Crimean peninsula, there went out on November 1, the sad message that Alexander III, Emperor of all the Russias was dead. Two days previously he had been killed by his physicians that the end was near. He bore the blow with composure and immediately proceeded to settle his personal and family affairs. Then he calmly awaited the end. He sat in his easy chair, quiet and tranquil surrounded by his family and personal friends. On the day before his death he took a last, long, lingering look on the beautiful scene from the windows of his room. He was silent for a few moments and then said he was glad that he could pass his last hours on Russian soil. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered to him, his evident satisfaction and he spent some time in prayer. His last night was a sleepless one, broken by frequent coughing and hemorrhage. In the morning he was seized with spasms. There was a brief rally about noon, but soon after two o'clock his eyes closed and he ceased to breathe. The news of his death was received throughout the world with sincere regret. Genuine human sympathy with him had been felt everywhere. To monarchs and statesmen, the czar was the embodiment of the gigantic power of a region covering one-half of Europe and nearly one-third of Asia, the autocrat whose will was law to the hundred million souls. But ordinary people saw beneath the imperial purple a brave, strong man, struggling hopelessly in the grasp of relentless disease and they were sorry for him. He was in the prime of life, not fifty years old; a robust, stalwart man, broad shouldered and muscular; his life had been simple, his tastes simple and his habits domestic, a man who loved his wife and children as ordinary men. Such a man might hope for a quarter of a century of life; but he was stricken down and neither his illustrious station, nor the mighty power he wielded, could avail him in his death grapple with the insidious foe which had laid its unyielding grip on his life. The struggle was like that of a lion in the coil of a constrictor and the world watched it with pity. The mighty potentate must learn by actual experience the fact the Preacher declared long ago: "No man hath power over the spirit to take the spirit and there is no discharge that war." (Eccles. 8: 8)

Life for a Sword.

An interesting discovery has been made by Prof. von Eulenspiegel who is with the scientific party excavating the ruins of ancient Troy. It appears that they recently found an armorer's shop in which were a large number of sword blades in various stages of manufacture. They were badly corroded, but the steel had been of the best quality. Many tools lay about the shop which were examined with intense interest. But the great find in the place was a copper cylinder which had been used to preserve plans, memoranda and other documents. One memorandum was inscribed on parchment and its old Syrian characters were still distinct. The armorer had evidently secured in some way from Damascus the recipe for making the famous sword-blades for which the city was noted and had put the directions in the cylinder for safe keeping. Prof. von Eulenspiegel, in deciphering the document made the shocking discovery that everyone of the best kind of swords cost a life in the making. "An Ethiopian slave of fair fame," as to be dedicated to the God Bal-Hal, and being bound face downward on the block in the armorer's shop, the new sword certain stages in the process of its manufacture was to be buried in his body, and when finished it was to be tested by severing the man's head from his body. The weapon would then be so finely attuned that it would bend around a man's body without breaking and would be "the color of the purple of the king, a perfect weapon fit to be used in the service of the God Bal-Hal." It is sad to think that one man had to die that another might have a weapon wherewith he might serve his god by destroying other lives. How different is the service the Christian renders to his God! His commission is to save men not to destroy them. But he, too, has been equipped for effective service by the death of the Innocent. (John 3: 16.)

Killed by His Own Bullet.

A singular fatality occurred a few days ago in a large wholesale house in New York. One of the clerks whose duty it was to keep the stock in order was fond of pistol practice, and whenever his duties admitted of an hour's absence, he would go to a large room in the highest story of the building and spend his time shooting at a mark. His last visit to the empty room graph wire, firmly holding them to the guns. They might now be fired without danger. But the Colonel found that they would serve another purpose. A curved rail from a railroad track was connected with the breeches of the guns, making them look like a huge horseshoe. An electric current was applied, and the thing became a gigantic magnet. Some pieces of railroad iron were attracted to it when brought within a distance of several yards, and were so firmly fixed to its side that they were not detached even by a force of 22,500 pounds. But the most remarkable effect was that on the compasses of passing ships. It has been found that at a distance of three miles the compass of a ship is disturbed by the magnet, and at a distance of two miles the compass is useless. It is suggested that a still more powerful magnet would be an excellent addition to the defense of a port threatened by a hostile fleet. The mysterious, subtle, incomprehensible force we call magnetism might thus prove more potent than cannon in luring a whole fleet to destruction. But by an analogous force—the magnetism of love and self-sacrifice is humanity to be saved. Christ said: "If I be lifted up I will draw all men unto me." (John 12: 32.)

A Second Honeymoon.

In announcing the marriage of a wealthy farmer, a few days ago, a newspaper of Griffin, Ga., tells a romantic story in connection with the couple. The bridegroom was scarcely twenty years old when the war broke out and had just been married to no God, or that he did not care. It is always a mistake. The promise is sure, and the prophet's advice is sound: "Though it tarry, wait for it, because it shall surely come; it will not delay" (Hab. 2: 3).

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Talmage has returned from his Tour around the world in excellent health and vigor. He says that as his Brooklyn congregation has already built three great churches, he will not impose upon them the work of building a fourth. He will either take a permanent pastorate elsewhere, or enter the general evangelistic field, visiting all the cities of the country and preaching the Gospel to all the people without money and without price.

China's Imperial Canal is the Largest in the world, and the greatest in point of traffic. Its length is 2,100 miles, and it connects forty-one cities situated on its banks. It was commenced in A. D. 750, but was not completed until 1350.

The International Lesson Committee of the Sunday School Union assembled in New York, Oct. 30 to Nov. 2. On Thursday evening, Nov. 1, the Sunday School workers of the city were invited to meet the Committee in the Broadway Tabernacle.

Last Sunday was observed by many churches in New York as Bible Sunday, the pastors preaching on the influence of the Bible on the life of the present day.

After the Death of the Late Professor Swing of Chicago, the manuscript of an unfinished sermon was found on his desk. His pen had paused in the following sentence: "We must all hope much from the gradual progress of brotherly love."

The Addresses Delivered at the recent Conference for the deepening of spiritual life in the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., will shortly be published in book form. They may be obtained by enclosing fifty cents to Rev. S. V. Robinson, 369 Cumberland St., Brooklyn.

The Methodist Missionary Society receipts for the month of September were $29,162 against $161,012 for September, 1893. This makes the total receipts for eleven months $896,662, against $906,505 for the preceding year.

The Perseverance and Faith of the Moravians is nowhere shown more conspicuously than in Tibet. They have three stations there, and have been laboring for forty years. Only sixty-three converts, at the latest accounts, have been gathered as the fruit of their labor.

The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church is arranging to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of its history, in New York, by a ten-day conference in October, 1896. All denominations are invited to participate in the conference. Bishop Walters, is chairman of the committee.

The Cincinnati "Christian Advocate," referring to a prayer offered at a political convention raises an objection to the applause of the audience, which was evoked by the minister's petitions. The applause of politicians and the reverential "Amen's" of a devout congregation are very different ways of manifesting approval of a prayer.

The Evangelical Alliance has issued the following list of subjects for the Week of prayer, Jan. 6-13 next: Sunday, Jan. 6, Sermon, Isa. 40: 31; Monday, Thanksgiving and Humiliation; Tuesday, The Church Universal; Wednesday, Nations and Their Rulers; Thursday, Foreign Missions; Friday, Home Missions to the Jews; Saturday, Families and Schools; Sunday, Jan. 13, Sermon, 1 Cor. 15: 58.

Dr. L. W. Munhall and his Musical Colleague, Mr. Birch, have just closed a most successful three weeks' campaign in Danbury, Conn. Five churches united in the movement. A business men's meeting was held on October 23, when nearly all the stores closed from 10 A. M. till noon, in order that all might have an opportunity of attending. At the closing service of the campaign the statement was made that the number of persons professing to have found Christ at the services was nearly six hundred. From Danbury the Evangelists went to Hackensack, N. J., to hold services.

President Seth Low, of Columbia College, and his brother, Abbot Augustus Low, of Brooklyn, have just built for and presented to the mission station of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Wuchang, China, a well-appointed hospital for the use of the mission and the people of the town. The hospital has been erected to perpetuate the memory of their father, the late Abiel Augustus Low, who was for many years one of the leading merchants in the city of Canton. The new building takes the name of St. Peter's Hospital. Although it has been in course of construction for many months the Board of Missions in this city did not know who was contributing to the funds until a short time ago.

LIVADIA, THE PALACE IN WHICH THE CZAR DIED.

was a fatal one. He had fixed a penny on the wall as a target and was trying it from various distances. Below the mark an iron pipe ran clear around the room. One of his bullets went wide of the mark, struck this pipe, rebounded, hit a projection, and then struck the marksman on the forehead. He fell to the floor and one of his companions, supposing him to be stunned, went to raise him. He was unconscious and in a few moments breathed his last. The bullet had not penetrated his skull, but had given so severe a blow that acute congestion of the brain had ensued and the man was dead. The course of the bullet was almost a circle. Probably not more than once in a million times would a missile have taken this extraordinary flight. Generally, when any one is hurt by ricochet it is some one other than the shooter. It is not so, however, with the moral evil that men do. We know on inspired authority that slander and malicious wrong is very liable to return on the head of the perpetrator. (Psalm 7: 16.)

The Strongest Magnet in the World.

An officer in the Engineer's Corps at Willet's Point, L. I., has constructed an instrument which will probably be turned to account in the defense of strongholds in time of war. It is an enormous magnet, more powerful than anything of the kind in existence. The idea was the result of an accident. There were two large fractured guns at the fort. The Colonel had the broken pieces put in place, and wound around them several miles of insulated telea beautiful girl a few months younger than himself. He joined the Confederate army at the first call and served with distinction until 1863, when he was taken prisoner. He was separated from his company at the time and his comrades thought he had been killed. At the end of the war the prisoner set out for his home; but on the way he was prostrated by sickness and after his recovery was attacked by malaria. It was several months before, the mere shadow of his former self, he could resume his journey. On reaching his home he found but two or three persons whom he knew still remaining there and they did not recognize him. He learned that his wife, hearing nothing from him, had concluded he was dead and had married again. Almost heartbroken he made no attempt to trace her, but turned vigorously to business, feeling that only by incessant occupation could he keep himself from going crazy. He prospered and eventually bought a farm and settled down. He avoided the society of women and could never be induced to enter any home as a guest. About a month ago he attended the public funeral of a veteran officer and there to his amazement recognized his wife in the recently bereaved widow. After the other guests had departed he visited her; explanations were made and they were remarried. Not many of such cases end so happily. Even in this instance the wife must often reproach herself, as she thinks of the desolation her husband endured so many years, that she was so ready to believe him dead because he did not communicate with her. There are some who have acted so toward God. They have thought when some earnest prayer was unanswered, that there was

The City of Abraham.

Our Traveller Visits Hebron and Tells of its Famous Antiquities—The Reputed Tombs of the Patriarchs—The Cave of Machpelah.

"I MADE me great works; I builded me houses; I planted me vineyards; I made me gardens and parks, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits; I made me pools of water to water therefrom the fruit where trees were reared."

So writes the Royal Preacher in the preface to the cry of "Vanity of vanities!—all is vanity!"

"So I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem," was no unfounded boast.

The king who projected Solomon's Pools, on the road to Hebron, was so many generations in advance of his predecessors that, reasoning after the manner of men, we think that he might have excepted this gigantic enterprise from the sweeping condemnation passed upon the rest of his "great works." The three immense tanks, to visit which we have left the direct road to Hebron, are lined with hewn stone; and, in the opinion of wiser critics than my unlearned self, were constructed by Solomon's workmen to lead the living waters of adjacent springs to his pleasure gardens—the "orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits; cypress, with spikenard and saffron; calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices."

The enumeration is painfully incongruous with the ruined reservoirs and the serenity of the surrounding fields at this season. The air "nips shrewdly," despite our heavy furs and the clear shining of the sun. Midway between the highway—the finest in the length and breadth of Palestine—and the pools is the "sealed fountain" of Canticles, a square building, covering the source of the waters led by an underground aqueduct to the lower reservoir. Close to the walls enclosing the great cisterns, is another small building, with a domed roof, erected above a second well, reached by six or eight steps. The water is very cold, the steps are wet; it makes one shiver to look down into the dark cavity, but half-a-dozen women are passing down to fill water-skins, and then lugging them up. A water-skin, or bottle, is the whole hide of a goat, tanned inside and out, sewed up lengthwise, and filled through the throat at the well. It is carried by means of two cords tied about the front and back feet, then passed across the forehead of the bearer, a fold of her veil keeping the rope from cutting into the skin. As the skin is always of a goat three-quarters or fully grown, some idea may be formed of the weight of the burden. Two of the women with whom we speak at this well live a mile away, a third at Bethlehem, more than twice as far.

We have regained the road, when we catch sight of a man ploughing with a camel, the first instance of the kind that has come within our observation. The slight wooden plough and the undersized man contrast grotesquely with the unwieldy brute, but the incident leads us to note the increasing fertility of the country. The grapes of Hebron are noted for size and flavor, and clothe the upper terraces of the hillsides. Lower terraces are covered with fruit trees, the fig and mulberry being the most abundant. There is a proportionate improvement in the locks of the husbandmen: they are better clad, more alert in movement, and really work as if a motive lay back of action. Women are busy in the fields pulling up dried furze by the roots; donkeys, laden out of sight, except for their ambling legs and the tips of their noses, are met in droves; camels, hitching their clumsy bulk along under moving groves of a stouter shrub, that perfume the air as they brush us in passing; bearded Moslems, with white turbans coiled about shaven heads, and—as we never fail to think in contemplating the close fit of the head-gear—the few valuable papers they possess in the world stowed away between the inner and outer linings of the turban,—are indices of thrift and a fair degree of prosperity.

Our guide points to a level stretch a mile

The cave purchased from the children of Heth as a burying-place, where the dead wife could be buried out of the husband's sight, was in "the field of Machpelah before Mamre. The same is Hebron in the land of Canaan."

Besides the Prince of Wales, his sons and their attendants, including Dean Stanley, but five or six people, not Moslems, have ever been admitted to the interior of the Mosque of Abraham. Gen. Lew Wallace, by special permit of the Sultan, obtained this privilege, and took with him several particular friends of his own, among them Dr. Selah Merrill, the resident in Jerusalem. Their report was of six mock tombs of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Sarah, Rebekah and Leah, each wife lying opposite her husband in the sealed crypt below. Beyond these, the mosque contains little to interest Jew or Christian. "Father Abraham" occupies an exalted place among saints revered by the Moslems, and their jealous hatred of the Jews—never absent from the creed and feelings of the worshipper of Mohammed—is at fever-heat at Hebron. Nowhere else in the Holy Land, or out of it, are they regarded with such intolerant suspicion as in the ancient city in which David reigned over Judah seven years and six months. Hence the approach of an Israelite to the tomb of the patriarchs is even more abhorrent to the "believers" than that of the "Christian dog." On our way to the mosque, we see certain money-changers of the despised race sitting in the Bazar, and learn how cunning is their revenge upon the masters, who would drive them clean out of the land if it were possible. Traders and usurers everywhere, the Tomb. The ceremony must be some sort of sad satisfaction to them in their disreputable homelessness in a land once deeded to them by the Judge of the whole earth for, we are told, that many avail themselves of the poor right.

A wall of comparatively modern masonry shuts in the Mosque from profane eyes. B mounting a heap of rubbish across the street, we can see the quadrangular building reared above the Cave of Machpelah. The gray walls are of the stones we have learned to recognize as belonging to the early Jewish period, and identical in finish with those in the house of David's Tower in Jerusalem. The Crusaders consecrated and used the Mosque as a church. A write of the period during which it was occupied by the Christian invaders describes the cave as divided into three chambers, the last containing the six tombs of which I have spoken. He relates, also, that it was the habit of Jews to bring hither in tubs or boxes the bones of their dead to be laid near the sepulchres of the patriarchs. The desire to sleep with one's fathers and the custom of the survivors of carrying out the wish were even then extremely ancient. Witness the oath exacted by Joseph from the children of Israel that they would carry his bones out of Egypt with them, a promise kept two hundred years afterward.

A narrow alley leading to the Mosque, alleged by tradition to be the scene of the murder of Abner by Joab when "he too him aside in the gate, to speak with him quietly and smote him there under the fifth rib that he died." Assassination so dastardly that every reader sympathizes in the bitter outbreak of the nominal king then reigning in Hebron: "These men, the sor of Zeruah, be to hard for me!"

Our next halt is at the "pool in Hebron. It is a large, shallow tank, occupying about half as much space as a modern city block of average size, and surrounded by a wall of solid masonry. The water is stagnant and coated with green scum, but women are coming down the steps at one corner with skins to be filled. The water, such as it is, shallow, leaving exposed above it some twenty feet of water. We try to guess whereabouts we nailed the feet of the hands of Rechabab, Baanah his brother the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, who after killing the sleeping Ishbosheth, "took his head and gat the plain all night and brought the head of Ishbosheth unto David to Hebron." Instead of the expected reward, they were put to death and the hands and feet hung over this pool as a terror to other evil-doers.

Our luncheon is spread in the house of the only missionaries in Hebron, Mr. and Mrs. Murray. They are moreover the only Christians in the home of Abraham and David, with the exception of an English family resident in the hospital lately erected here by the Church Missionary Society.

Mr. and Mrs. Murray are under the care of no one denomination or society, and lead the simplest, happiest "life of faith" it has ever been my privilege to behold. In our room is collected a class of twenty-two little Moslem girls, who are instructed in knitting, sewing and reading by Mrs. Murray and her Bible-reader. I sit down among them and make friends with the well-bred, haved pretty little creatures, by knitting row upon a red stocking, "turning off" garter, and hemming a few inches of ruffle.

The school began with two children and not one dollar. More than twenty are now in regular attendance, and daily mean have come with daily strength for daily needs. Even in bigoted Hebron the Master has given this pair of trusting laborers great favor in the eyes of the people.

away from the road, and we cease to note or consider anything modern.

"Mamre!" he says, "and with this glass you can make out the old oak, the only tree of the kind in many miles."

Not "the" oak, of course, although we talked last week, in Jerusalem, with a man who argued earnestly for the possibility of the existence, through thousands of years, of the tree under which Abraham "dwelt in the plain of Mamre, and built there an altar unto the Lord." But we gaze in the direction indicated with intense and devout interest. From that plain, or plateau, Abraham sallied forth at the head of three hundred and eighteen servants, born in his house, to overtake and defeat the kings who had taken captive his brother's son; there he had the vision of the smoking furnace and burning lamp passing between the "pieces" laid in order for sacrifice, and received the exceeding great and precious promise of the son to be born of his old age; there, from the home where life had grown intolerable, Hagar fled into the wilderness, to be sent back by the Divine command; there, "the Lord appeared unto Abraham, in the plains of Mamre, as he sat in the tent-door in the heat of the day," and, upon the next day, from the elevated table-land, the anxious patriarch looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah "to see that the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace."

they grow rich in the neighborhood of Abraham's tomb by becoming money-lenders and pawnbrokers to poorer citizens, and especially to the tarming peasantry. One, in whose physiognomy the characteristic racial features are conspicuous, is examining a set of silver ornaments belonging to a farmer's wife, her husband standing anxiously by her side.

"He will lend her one-tenth of what they are worth," says David, "with the certainty that she can never redeem them. Or, he will buy them out-and-out at one-fifth of their value. I know his reputation. He has no mercy. And indeed it is not strange that he should be hard with these people who despise and insult him."

A flight of broad, low steps conducts the faithful from the street to the main entrance of the mosque. Beyond the fifth step none but a Moslem may go upon penalty of death. We ascend to the forbidden line, and look defiantly up, then aver that there is nothing within the walls worth our seeing, and enact the King of France's celebrated retrograde movement, stopping on the way "down again" to peer into the deep crevice between two of the old stones of the wall into which, under the easy tolerance of the present government, the descendants of Abraham may, when they like, thrust their arms at full length to drop written petitions to their great ancestor. This is the Hebron Wailing-Place, and their nearest approach to

MARION HARLAND.

PREMIUM ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has succeeded in arranging for a remarkable series of premiums. First of all, or course, is the International Teacher's Bible, with all the Helps and Maps, set in type, Divinity circuit binding over at the ends, with red under gold. This eminently serviceable and pretty Bible is again offered, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at $2. When ordering please mention Premium Offer: B-Five.

Next in order comes that most beautiful Bible known as the International Emerald Teacher's Bible, London Clear Type, leather bound and leather lined, silk book-mark and silk head-bands, and sewed. There were times when a like this would cost $8. To-day it can be bought everywhere even at $5; THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers it, together with a year's subscription, at $3. The book will last a lifetime. When ordering mention Premium Offer: B-Three.

Also continue to offer Dr. Talmage's marvelous book, "From Manger to Throne," which has proved of infinite value, to thousands of people, presenting a new view of the life of our Saviour magnificently illustrated, with many pictures based on photos brought from Palestine by Dr. Talmage, while journeying in the Holy Land with a view to gathering material for his latest and greatest work, "From Manger to Throne" with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, mention Premium Offer: B-Four.

Next to a Teachers' Bible, the "Gospel of Moody and Sankey" sung by Moody and Sankey in their great evangelistic services throughout America and England, are dearest to many Christians' heart. Never before has it been possible to secure these 739 Hymns, including the books usually known as "The Hymns 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 all in one book," but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has succeeded in obtaining a large edition of these marvelously soul-stirring hymns in printed form, without a duplicate and without an omission, printed from large type and set to music, and beautifully bound in cloth, with red edges and gilt. A former hymnal has never been put on the market, and these "Six volumes of Song, complete in One," are offered to subscribers with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. If you are truly pleased, send it back, and we will return your money. Messrs. Moody and Sankey in commending the volume say:

"Hymns in this book have been greatly blessed to many in our meetings as well as outside of them. May they in this combined form continue to bless the blessing of Him to whose honor and glory they have been sung in this and other lands."

Is very desirable Premium contains 600 pages, each page measuring 5 1/2 by 8 inches. When ordering this Premium, mention Premium Offer: B-Two.

Finally, we offer Dr. Talmage's great "The Pathway of Life," a large book of which has been specially prepared by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Dr. Talmage kindly consenting to waive all claims of royalty. This great book containing 544 pages, having for a frontispiece a picture of Dr. Talmage recently taken in Australia, and embellished by 200 beautiful engravings, in a uniquely handsome binding of cloth and leather, and sent out into the world to make it more useful and more serviceable, is offered in connection with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $2. The book weighs three pounds and measures, when open, from tip to tip 9x15 inches. This book has been read with interest by Her Majesty Queen Victoria, ex-President of the London Convention, Major-Gen. O.O. Howard, Sec'y of the Anti-Slavery Society, Bishop Vincent, Joseph Cook, Sir John Lubbock, Miss Frances Willard, Senator Sherman, John G. Whittier, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Neal Dow, and many others all of whom unite in cordially endorsing it. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-One.

Combination Premium Offers: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and any one of the above premiums—except the International "Emerald" Bible—for two dollars and any two for three dollars; or any three for four dollars, and any four for five dollars. Whenever the Emerald Bible (Offer B-Three) forms part of the selection one dollar must be added to the amount named.

Remember that all our Premiums are sent all charges fully pre-paid.

THIS DAY.

DEAR Father, list to my pleading,
And teach me to pray.
Help me to follow thy leading,
Give me the help I am needing,
Give enough bread for my feeding,
Just enough for this day.

Knowing the crosses I'm wearing,
And why they must stay.
Knowing the labors I'm sharing,
Knowing the burdens I'm bearing,
Thou wilt give courage and daring
Needed this day.

Thou who dost know every sparrow
That falls on its way.

Help me no evil to borrow
From the storehouse of to-morrow,
For there will be enough sorrow
Coming this day.

When evil bids me surrender,
I need not obey.

Thou art my mighty help-sender,
Thou art my present defender,
Thou art my loving befriender,
Near me this day.

THE END OF THE WAY.

MY life is a wearisome journey:
I'm sick with the dust and the heat;
The rays of the sun beat upon me
The briars are wounding my feet.

But the City to which I am journeying
Will more than my trials repay:
All the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

There are so many hills to climb upward,
I often am longing for rest;

But he who appoints me my pathway
Knows just what is needful and best.

I know in his Word he has promised
That my strength shall be as my day;

And the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

He loves me too well to forsake me,
Or give me one trial too much:

All his people have been dearly purchased;
And Satan can never claim such.
By-and-by I shall see him and praise him.
In the City of unending day;
And the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

GIVING.

SEE the rivers flowing,
Downward to the sea,
Pouring all their treasures
Bountiful and free:
Yet to help their giving,
Hidden springs arise:
Or, if need be, showers
Feed them from the skies.

Watch the princely flowers
Their rich fragrance spread,
Load the air with perfumes
From their beauty shed:
Yet their lavish spending
Leaves them not in death,
With fresh life replenished
By their mother earth.

Give thy heart's best treasures:
From fair nature learn:
Give thy love—and ask not Wait not a return.

And the more thou spendest
From thy little store,
With a double bounty,
God will give thee more.

BE TRUE.

THOU must be true thyself.
If thou the truth wouldst teach:
Thy soul must overflow, if thou
Another's soul wouldst reach:
It needs the overflow of heart
To give the lips full speech.
Think truly, and thy thoughts
Shall the world's famine feed:
Speak truly, and each word of thine
Shall be a fruitful seed:
Live truly, and thy life shall be
A great and noble creed.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Why Christ's Advent is Expected Before the Millennium.

BY DR. HARRY GUINNESS.

WHILE there is much difference of opinion as to the details of unfulfilled prophecy, there are certain clear outlines of the great events which are surely coming sooner or later, about which the majority of students of prophecy are agreed. Let me sketch some of them briefly.

The advent of Christ is to be a personal one. The promise, "Surely I come quickly," does not refer to the imminence of death, as some think. In fact, the coming of Christ is positively antagonistic to death, as indicated in 1 Thess. 4, where we find that when he comes, Christians who are alive will escape death, and those who sleep are to be raised from the dead. Some people try to spiritualize Christ's advent away and make us believe that Christ only comes back to the world in so far as through his spirit he inspires each believer. How impossible from such a standpoint as this to explain the passages which foretell his second advent.

Not only is Christ's coming personal, but it is pre-millennial. We are not to look for the millennium, but for the Master. "The King, ere the kingdom, shall appear." This is a matter in which there is practically no room for controversy. There are many people who think that legislation, education, and modern improvements are likely to bring about the millennial era apart from the advent of Christ—as, for instance, if only universal arbitration could be introduced, and local option or prohibition given. If only educational advantages were universal, and slums abolished—according to some, the millennium might be brought about apart from the advent of Jesus.

But if we look at those very places where these conditions already obtain, one still finds that the millennium has not arrived. There is sin there, in spite of education and legislation, and there can be no sin in Christ's kingdom. Education and legislation do not change the heart.

We are called pessimists for disbelieving that, with the present agencies at work, the world can be converted, but it seems to us that we are the optimists, and that those who are anticipating the introduction of the golden age by the present agencies ought themselves legitimately to be the pessimists. How can they be hopeful when they view the present condition of things in spite of all that has been done to evangelize our country! Those who have experience that reaches below the surface, fail entirely to understand the optimism that conceives it possible to regenerate the world apart from the advent of the Son of Man. No; we look not for a millennium introduced by human agency, but we look for the Lord from heaven, who himself shall put right the wrongs of time, and reign both with a rod of righteousness and of iron. In spite of all the unbelief of men, in spite of the "peace, peace," that is uttered by the world in spite of the universal cry, "Do not all things continue as they were from the foundation of the world?" yet his advent is at the very threshold. Evangelical Christians throughout the world are awake to the sense of the nearness of Christ's advent. Political events foreshadow it. Fulfilled prophecy indicates it. Earnest students of Scripture, who have devoted their lives to the study of the more sure word of prophecy, believe it, and we may hold with absolute confidence the conviction that we are living in the "time of the end," and pray for the speedy arrival of the day when the last shadows shall flee away, and Jesus himself fulfil the eager expectations of his people waiting for his advent.

Some say that this theme is not a practical one; on the contrary, it is one of the most practical we can conceive. It affects each one of us whatever our station in life or work for God. Do we sorrow? Let us not sorrow as those who have no hope. Jesus is soon coming, and will bring our dear ones with him. Are we laboring? Let us not be weary in our toil, for Jesus will soon be here. Are we cast down and oppressed by the burden and heat of the day, by the disappointments of life, and by the sense of his long delay? Let us lift up our heads with holy expectation, for the Master is at the door. Are we unable to explain the many questions that the world asks us on every hand? Let us be still and strong in the deep-rooted conviction that Christ himself will soon appear, and solve for ever the problems which we cannot answer.

THANKS-LIVING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning Nov. 25.
Eph. 5: 15-20.

GRATEFUL lives need not be joyless lives. It would be a grievous misconception of God's will to imagine that gloom and austerity are pleasing to him. Christ's presentation of God as a Father and his remark to his disciples that they were not servants, but friends, were intended to set them at ease in their relations with the Deity. The portion of a child happy in his home, loving his father and acquiescing cheerfully in the rules of the household, is not associated with gloom and sadness. The Christian owes it to his Father in heaven to be bright and glad. Otherwise he suggests the inference, that is sure to be drawn, that his religion is an irksome restraint and that he would like to indulge in worldly pleasures if he could do so with impunity. The familiar reproach that the Christian denies himself pleasure now, that he may have a better time later on, is an evidence of the utter failure of the world to comprehend the situation. The Christian is having his good time now, although it is alloyed with trial and worries and sorrows. He is finding out how much his religion can do to support him under adverse circumstances and he expects that in the good time before him, the same religion, which is his best treasure now, will bring him still more happiness. Thus he has abundant reason for thankfulness, for his joys are those which death does not annihilate but enhances. Death is to him truly the gate of life, opening the way to fuller and freer life and so, looking forward, he sees at the end of the vista of his life on earth, not the grim spectre which appals the worldling, but the kindly guide who will conduct him to the better country. There the sources of happiness are unchanged; his life is simply continued under more congenial conditions. Can such a man be other than thankful? But his thankfulness should be of an order different from that of the man who is simply satisfied with his lot and congratulates himself on not being plagued as other men are. Paul's admonition to "walk circumspectfully, not as fools, but as wise," intimates the kind of life the thankful Christian man should live. The light, frivolous hilarity of the worldling is not the demeanor of the thoughtful Christian. Deep, strong happiness, such as his should be, does not find its best expression in silly jokes and idle nonsensical talk, but in a cheerful, equable, kindly manner, rejoicing with those who rejoice, and sympathizing with those who mourn. More than that the thankfulness to God, with which his heart overflows, should find expression in active helpfulness to all who are in need, especially to those who are his brethren in Christ.

THE B. Y. P. U. OF IOWA.

Two days devoted to the Baptist Young People's Union at the anniversaries of the Iowa churches recently held at Webster City, were occasions of congratulation and encouragement. Fifty delegates and a large number of members of the Unions of the State attended. The Convention elected as officers for the year: President, Rev. R. A. Smith of Cedar Falls; Secretary, Rev. A. E. Clemens of Seymour; Treasurer, Mr. E. E. Jenkins of Villisca; Superintendent of Junior Work, Mrs. F. W. Parsons of Marshalltown. The great speech of the Convention was that of Rev. R. F. Y. Pierce, who illustrated the various departments of the Union's work with emblematic articles and chalk drawings. For two hours he held his audience entranced and left them unwearied and longing for more of his bright inspiring lessons. Dr. Perren, of Chicago, occupied the place of President Chapman. Mrs. E. P. Bartlett and Mrs. E. H. Griffith read papers on the practical working of the Union and its influence on the advance of Foreign Mission work. It was mentioned incidentally as an illustration of the helpfulness in small things which is developed by Christian association, that the children of the missionaries at the home in Morgan Park were now the possessors of a fine Alderney cow, the gift of the Baptist Young People's Unions of Southern Iowa.

THE MERCY AND HELP WORK.

At the recent meeting of the Epworth League Board of Control, Vice-President Haven made an address which dealt with every name. In the course of it he said: There are four divisions of the useful work of the League. First, there is the work of visiting the sick and poor and any that may be in special need of the sympathy of Christian young people. Second, the work of reform, like interesting the young people in the temperance cause, social purity, and in matters which are commonly described under the head of reform movements. Third, the work of neighborhood charities; that is, almsgiving, looking after special needs, and interesting young people in all sorts of local charitable work. Fourth, the work of awakening an interest in specific charitable movements. It would be impossible to tell you one-half of the things which the young people have done under one or the other of these general divisions. For instance, I have a letter which tells of one man who was converted after fifty-two years of non-appearance at church. He was a widower and a hermit. A young mercy and help worker, by practical kindness, found her way to his heart, and won him over to Christ and the church. These are simply illustrations which could be duplicated by the thousand.

MR. JAS. B. GERMAINE,
Donor of the Building.

Then a great deal has been done in temperance work. It has seemed to me that at the present time so much stress is being placed upon political and constitutional temperance action that we are forgetting the fundamentals in the temperance cause, i.e., raising up in our churches and communities large bodies of total abstainers. Among the first things I did was to ask for the publication of the Epworth League pledge card. Many of them have been distributed and used. This is important. Unless we pledge all the young people to total abstinence, we are going to be seriously crippled. Social purity has been a difficult work to promote. Yet it is of supreme importance. Young men and women are being undermined by temptations concerning which many of us think but little. Warnings are not as frequent and earnest as they should be. The orphanage question is pressing itself upon our attention. Then we have the hospital work. Another important matter is that of Epworth League houses. It is a modification of the "Settlement" movement which was begun in 1885 in Toynbee Hall, London. We have something on the same general plan in the Hull House at Chicago. But the first attempt of the Methodist church in this direction was made in Boston.

THE Y. M. C. A. AT ALBANY, N. Y.

The young men of the capital of the State of New York owe a deep debt of gratitude to Mr. James B. Jermain, one of Albany's most prominent citizens, whose portrait appears on this page. The Association is indebted to him for a building which with the lot on which it stands cost $125,000. Nor has Mr. Jermain been content with this magnificent gift. He takes a personal interest in the welfare of the institution he has so helped, and has added several improvements since the building was erected. The bathing arrangements have been almost entirely reorganized at great expense, and also at the cost of the original donor. That Mr. Jermain's liberality is heartily appreciated by the young men of the city there is ample proof in the fact that there are over nine hundred members on the books of the Association which is an unusual number in ratio with population. The religious, the secular and the athletic departments are each well officered and are in a very flourishing condition. Wealthy men who often complain of the rarity of good opportunities for the investment of their money might advantageously take a look at the Albany Y. M. C. A. Mr. Jermain's investment does not bring him in any return in money but in the satisfaction he must have in helping the young men around him, and the blessing which comes on him who serves his day and generation are no small compensation. Perhaps the personal satisfaction is greater than would be derived from those investments which pay large dividends. The experiment would surely be worth trying.

THE ALBANY BUILDING.

MECHANICAL DRAWING CLASS, Y. M. C. A., ALBANY, N. Y.

YOUNG WOMEN IN CONFERENCE.

An important convention of Young Women's Christian Associations was held recently at Cambridgeport, Mass. Delegates were present from Montreal and from the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York and Pennsylvania. The sessions extended over two days and were of a thoroughly practical business character. One of the papers which excited most interest was that of Mrs. C. N. Judson, the President of Brooklyn Y. W. C. A. It recounted the history of the Association from the effort of two young women in Brooklyn to help the self-supporting girls of the city through the succeeding years to the present time. The Brooklyn Association has been materially helped by the generosity of friends, but all the gifts would have been useless without the work of officers and members. The Convention listened with close attention to Mrs. Judson's description of this work and doubtless derived valuable suggestions from it. Mrs. John Doucett of Montreal spoke earnestly of the spirit work of the Association and Miss S. Gray of Worcester read a practical paper on the Educational Department. Miss D. Water of the Boston Association gave an address on the Association's protective, preventive, and employment work and Mrs. Wilcox of Wellesley College spoke of the need of religious work in colleges. Another paper of great ability was on Mrs. C. E. Bebee, President of New York Association, on the Social Element of the work. The Convention made a thorough inspection of the Boston Y. W. C. A., which is a model of excellent management.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Dr. E. A. Schell, General Secretary of the Epworth League, reports that there are now in the organization 13,500 Chapters and over Junior Leagues. The roll of membership is over a million.

In the Grand Island Baptist Association of Nebraska, there is a P. U. in every church but one, that has a flourishing Christian Endeavor Society. The Baptists of West are looking after the young people who attended their church.

A Christian Endeavor Society with 100 members and representing six different nominations, has been formed in the 1st Regiment of the National Guards of Pennsylvania.

The ninth annual convention of the Nebraska Christian Endeavor Union, held in Lincoln, October 12-14, was the largest and best in the history of the union. One hundred and sixty-five delegates registered.

A Mission Sunday School was recently organized in connection with the Baptist Church of Menominee, Mich. The school turned its management over to the Y. P. U., which at once supplied teachers and officers from its own ranks to conduct it.

A good suggestion is contained in the example of an Epworth League which has had a large chest built in the vestibule of its meeting-room. A tablet is affixed stating that parcels of clothing deposited there will be used by the Mercy and Relief Department in its work.

The King's Daughters of the Parish of Zion and St. Timothy in New York have opened a clothing depository at 33 West Fifty-sixth street. They solicit gifts of serviceable garments which they will mend and renovate ready for winter, when they will be sold at nominal prices or given away to the needy poor.

Chattanooga Methodists recently held a meeting to begin arrangements for the next International Conference of Leagues which meets in that city next June. A joint committee of twenty-two on arrangements was appointed, which committee subsequently organized, with John S. Martin, chairman; J. E. Annis, Vice chairman; T. M. Thomas, Treasurer; J. A. Patten, Secretary; and Miss Julia Aiken, Assistant Secretary.

The New South Wales Christian Endeavor Union has had a question put to it which has involved considerable discussion. It relates to amusements. Some members who saw no objection to cards and dancing desired an expression of opinion from the Union. The executive passed a resolution declaring that while, according to a plank of their platform, they could not legislate for the individual conscience, they did not approve of either amusement.

In an Indian Wigwam.

How the Red Men Live at Home on the Plains—A Squaw's Laborious Life.

IN the pioneer days of the West, when adventurous white men risked their lives in the effort to secure homesteads and build cabins on the rich fertile soil, there was no fiercer or more powerful enemy of the newcomers than the Blackfeet Indians. Numerous and well equipped with a splendid breed of wiry little horses, this tribe made the headquarters of its principal lodges in the State of Missouri, which was then a vast realm of prairie and woodland, rich in game of every description. Their wars and raids extended from the Missouri River to the Oregon, and no part of the country between those rivers was safe from their predatory excursions. Immediately after the great rush to the Montana mines, which attracted large numbers of whites from the east, the Blackfeet went on the warpath against the invasion of their territory, and many dark tragedies resulted. But in time, the opposition of the red men was overcome and their reservation was opened, not by treaty, but by force.

Great changes followed the new order of things, and although the Blackfeet were slow at first to accept civilization, they ultimately did so, and are to-day, in many respects, one of the most peaceful and prosperous of Indian tribes. The tribe is now most numerously represented in Montana, though there are large bands of Blackfeet in Canada as well. Other tribes related by blood are the Piegiens, the Blood Indians and the Small Robes, and as these are widely scattered, the Blackfeet "nation" may be said to be represented from Hudson Bay to the Yellowstone.

Our illustration shows a Blackfoot brave and pony beside a typical Indian wigwam, whose old and weather-worn aspect certainly does not give much assurance of comfort. Patched in many places, and held together by strings and sticks, such a habitation can only belong to an Indian who has not accepted civilization, but has rather preferred the free, roving, lawless life of the nomad. Yet the records of some of our Indian training schools show that the Blackfeet "nation" has some very bright and promising youths there, acquiring an education, and becoming acquainted also with practical Christian doctrines. In cases where all civilizing influences have been repelled by any considerable proportion of the tribes, it is generally found that the love of drink—that great enemy of the Indian—is at the bottom of the trouble.

Though now greatly reduced in numbers and influence, the Blackfeet are still a warlike people. They maintain an ancient and bitter feud against their mortal enemies, the Crow tribe, who, like themselves, are only partially civilized. It is an inspiring sight to witness a band of Blackfeet in full war paint and equipped for a foray against the Crows, their keen, copper-colored, aquiline faces set fearlessly toward the foe. They are medium sized, with strong and not unimpressive features, thin lips and straight noses, and they have the courage of a tiger and much of his cunning. On horseback, the Blackfoot is tireless and energetic, but at home, in his wigwam, he prefers to let his squaw do all the work. Indeed, he would rather spend his time in horse-racing, gambling, or some ceremonial dance than in providing food for his home. His squaw, who is his chattel, gathers the firewood, cooks, and in a word does everything except hunt and fight. These are pastimes which her "lord and master" reserves for himself.

Among the Indian tribes the belief in immortality and a future life is almost universal. Their legends and mythology contain traces of the story of the creation and of the deluge, and they have also a legend relating to the last day. Some of the tribes, previous to being Christianized, believed every part of the universe to be filled with invisible spirits, the greatest of whom was honored in their myths and legends under a variety of names, including Manitou, Wasi, Isokheha, &c. Their rude beliefs contained no trace of any conception of a system of rewards and punishment hereafter, and some tribes held that the "Master of Life" would be alike merciful to all, irrespective of their acts on earth. There are still a few tribes that indulge in sun-worship, and the orgies of the sun, fire, and snake-dances have been so widely described by writers of late years that they are familiar to most readers. But even these lingering traces of heathenism are rapidly passing away, as the red man is coming more and more under the benign influence of the Gospel of Jesus.

Japanese Beds.

Bishop Galloway, who is now traveling in Japan, gives this interesting bit of experience in a native hostelry:

"We reached Nava about eight o'clock, and I had my first night in a regular Japanese hotel. At the door we left our shoes, and in the rooms to be occupied we discovered and felt the conspicuous absence of the ordinary furniture in American houses. Probably out of consideration for the avoidance of ungracefulness of two of us, three chairs were after awhile brought in, and a table on which to place our evening meal. Beds were laid on the floor, and there we slept—or at least tried. I had a comparatively soft place for my weary head, but who except a native, can sleep on a Japanese pillow? It is almost as hard as the one on which Jacob dreamed a dream, but I have never heard of anyone who set it up for a pillar after a night of visions and revelations. It is a piece of wood six or eight inches long, two or three wide, and probably four inches high. It is scooped out somewhat on top, and used with or without a small, hard cushion—generally without. The argument for such a head-rest, I am told, is that it does not disarrange the ladies' hair—an important matter, as one readily appreciates, who has ever seen the elaborately arranged and pomaded hair of a Japanese lady."

Unspoken Kindness.

The world is full of kindness that never was spoken, and that is not much better than no kindness at all. In a family, love is what makes the parents and children, the brothers and sisters happy; but if they take care never to say a word of it, if they keep it a profound secret, as if it were a crime, they will not be much happier than if there was not any love among them.

Helpful Daughters.

There are many ways in which a girl can help her own future, each and all of them practical. The routine division of her day may seem of but slight importance, but the best division of the busy day of a housekeeper or a business woman, is of vast importance and comfort, or discomfort, to its divider. A regular time for arising—which deep into the ground, and stayed her downward course. There she hung, suspended in the air.

Moments seemed ages, until she heard a voice, which sounded very far off, saying in a firm, encouraging tone, "I am coming! Keep looking up!" Instinctively she obeyed. She never glanced downward, but clung faster to her only chance of safety. Again the voice—this time nearer—spoke hopefully, "I am coming! Keep looking up!" In another moment two strong hands had seized her own in a firm clasp, and she felt herself drawn gently and cautiously upward. Then she was lifted into great, loving arms and closed her eyes upon her father's breast. Children, "keep looking up!"

A LESSON ON A CHURCH WALL.

NEAR the entrance to Old Blandford Cemetery in Petersburg, Virginia, (writes Mr. Edward Wright, a reader of this journal) there is an old church, which was used as a place of worship until 1792. It is slowly crumbling to dust. The outside of this church is completely covered with ivy. A prettier sight cannot be seen anywhere, than this old cemetery where all is so quiet, save the singing of the birds and where many true Christians lie awaiting the resurrection. On the interior walls of the old church are written the following beautiful lines:

Thou art crumbling to the dust, old pile?
Thou art hastening to thy fall,
And round thee in thy loneliness,
Clings the ivy to thy wall.

And sadly sighs the wandering wind,
Where oft' in years gone by:
Prayer rose from many hearts to Him,
The Highest of the high.

The tramp of many a busy foot,
That sought thy aisles, is o'er;
And many a weary heart around,
Is still forever more.

How doth ambition's hope take wings?
How droops the spirit now?
We hear the city's distant din,
The dead are mute below.

The sun that shone upon their paths
Now gilds their lonely graves.
The zephyrs which once fanned their brows
The grass above them waves.

Oh! could we call the many back:
Who've gathered here in vain—
Who've careless roved, where we do now,
Who'll never meet again—

How would our very hearts be stirred,
To meet their earnest gaze,
The lovely and the beautiful—
The lights of other days.

To Dispel the "Blues."

"The blues," so-called, are the result of peculiar and abnormal physical conditions. No day should pass without some active exercise in the open air; not merely a leisurely stroll along crowded streets, or a half day's shopping in crowded, heated stores; but a quick, brisk walk of several miles. Women, as a rule, stay in-doors too much, worry, dream and grieve over many trials, losses and crosses, stitch them into scarfs, curtains and doyleys, and become languid, lifeless, colorless and sorrowful thereby. Sorrow seems to be woman's inheritance, and between her and her longed-for Eden, there stands ever the guarding cherubim with the flaming sword; but if she would wrestle with the grievance as Jacob wrestled with the angel, until it bring her a blessing—make her sorrow a servant which should minister to her strength and nobility of character, she would ultimately win a permanent victory over "the blues." The best of all cures is activity in some useful way.

Along the path of a useful life
Will heart's-ease ever bloom;
The busy mind has no time to think
Of sorrow, or care, or gloom.

The Good-Night Kiss.

There are young men and women, still at their childhood's home, who look for their mother's coming to give them her good-night kiss, with no less of interest and grateful affection than when they were little boys and girls. And there are many more people—both young and old—away from their homes, who thank God with all their hearts for the ineffaceable memories of such tokens of their dear mother's love, while yet they were with her.

MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

CHAPTER XVII. A Blotted Page.

ANNIE'S own words recorded in her diary best describe the events that followed. She writes:

"Oh, the agony of the past months! No one in all the broad earth can be so miserable as I am. I would die and rid myself of this trouble were it not for Ernest. Sometimes the maddening thought flashes that we can die together, he and I, and not be parted in life, in death, nor in the narrow grave—narrow, but wide enough to hold us two. My beautiful boy! Am I crazy? There are moments when my brain grows wild with thoughts that press like mountain weights, and then I am afraid of myself. Many a time have I risen from my bed at night and thrown all knives and scissors out into the darkness for fear morning would come and find us—where! I shudder, I seem like some dead thing dragging about a living body. Oh, how fearful it is to live! Would, Oh, would that baby and I were in the grave by those I love. How sweet and quiet the grave seems to me to-night! How would I love to tell my hands and slumber with those so dear, papa and Clarence! Yes, Clarence, for he is sleeping, too.

"Hush, my heart, stop thy wild throb- bings, while I record all that has passed.

"They tell me that three months have passed since this terrible thing took place. I well remember that it was March, that the wind was sighing and wailing through bare trees. Now the forests are in full leaf, and flowers are blossoming everywhere—but why speak of flowers? They are fit only to deck the dead, they smell to me of graves, earthy, damp, musty—I hate them.

"Well, they say it is three months since life went out of me. Dear Clarence had been abstaining from almost all intoxicating spirits and only occasionally giving way to the fierce, insatiable, demoniac thirst. Debts were rapidly paid, but they were heavy, far heavier than he at first supposed, but I kept saying 'take all,' and so he went on paying and paying. At last he came home one night saying nothing was left except his silent partnership and our half interest in our home. What now should we do?

"I replied, 'let us sell to Roy and buy a small home of our own, perhaps we might still save enough for a support.' Roy readily agreed to purchase, and we sold out our interest, though we still remained with them at his and mamma's earnest solicitation. Rumors then were rife of the failure of our firm. It was true. They had failed, and it was discovered that their liabilities were heavy, far heavier than their assets could meet, then, to save honor, perhaps our little all must go. Clarence rushed downtown only to hear the appalling news confirmed! We were absolutely penniless. Mamma begged that we take her few thousands, but she had retained only enough for her own individual necessities, and it would have been nothing to us. Roy insisted upon lending Clarence money, but he positively refused. It was too much for his proud spirit and loving heart. Ah! I could have borne it. I was brave, he did not know his wife. Alas! Alas! Then he drank and drank again, scarcely one sober breath did he draw. One sad, bitter night a friend saw his condition, and brought him home in his carriage after dark. He was able to get out with help, but he sank heavily at the gate—they brought him in—up to my room—laid him on my bed. He gasped once—twice—and—was gone!

"Oh, the horrors of that hour! I can write no more. Penniless, friendless, and a widow—a drunkard's widow!"

Blotted and defaced was the page with tears. It brought them to our own eyes as we read the tragic end of a noble man. Death had truly held his assize in the St. Clair family where once was wealth and mirth. Two deaths, both sudden, not a single moment for reflection, yet so death often comes, like a thief in the night when least expected.

Roy begged his sister to remain with him, imploring her never to leave him, telling her he would gladly share his fortune with her. Mrs. St. Clair was in deep distress, and she and Roy were untiring in their attentions. It was a noble family, sprung from noble sires, and, underneath love for gain, there was much unselfishness which constantly prompted to aid the unfortunate. This Col. St. Clair had shown in offering to relieve his sister, Valeria's mother, at her husband's death, and Roy, forgiving and forgetting old animosities had, immediately upon hearing of Carlisle's loss, offered to lend him the sum required without interest for as long a time as he desired.

After the terrible death of her husband, Annie became unconscious and lay for weeks hovering between life and death. It was a hand-to-hand conflict, but life conquered, and she slowly recovered. She came back to life with regret, and no one but her child Ernest could draw a smile from her sad lips. Some friends were kind, yet her fashionable friends stood aloof, nor condescended to speak a comforting, cheering word to the penniless, drunkard's widow. She had been up, now she was down, and how easy to trample upon the fallen! There were some who pitied, but generally it was in a patronizing way and their sympathy was most condescendingly offered. Had not grief petrified her, this would have stung her more than open slights. Roy was a true brother though his wife was not very sisterly, indeed knew little more than how to take care of herself and pet her six months' old boy. Ernest, a noble specimen of childhood, was now two years old. The nurse who always had charge of him was with him still, and had been faithful in her care of him during Annie's long illness.

As health returned, there came renewed strength, and as she sat in her easy chair, many hours were spent by her in thinking and planning. When Roy came up one evening to see her, she said:

"Roy, will you do me a favor to-morrow? I dislike to ask it of you, but I know no other way to accomplish my resolve."

"Annie, my precious sister, don't you know that I would be willing to go to the ends of the earth for you?"

"This will not require so arduous an undertaking; it will only necessitate a visit or two on your part. Roy, I cannot be dependent—"

"Stop, Annie, you shall not talk to me in that strain."

"Yes, Roy, please listen to me. You do not know what an immense load you will lift off my heart."

"Go on, then, if it will make you feel any better and I will hear all you have to say."

"Well, my dear brother, now don't stop me when I say I cannot be dependent. I am penniless and I must support myself. I cannot let you do it, and mamma is not able."

"Annie!"

"Stop! you promised to hear me through. Now I want you to see Mr. Nixon, the president of the Female College here, and get a situation for me in his music department."

"You? My sister teaching school, when her brother is rich! Annie, you are crazy!"

"Never was in a more lucid frame of mind. Roy, please do this for me. You do not know how my heart is set upon it."

"I will not, Annie. I never will. I don't know what mamma would think were she to hear of this unheard-of favor you asked of me. Get you a situation, indeed! You who have been the leader of the ton. You now wanting to turn school teacher! You distress me beyond measure. Are you not as welcome here, as much so as my own wife or boy? Has anything occurred, one word been spoken to make you think otherwise? Just let me know and I'll stop it."

"No, Roy, no. On the contrary, every possible thing has been done for Ernest and me, everybody has been gentle and kind, but Roy, we St. Clairs are an independent race."

"Dependent or independent, you shall not teach. I will not see the president for you, and you shall not get any situation through me or any one else. What would become of Ernest, dear little fellow?"

"Why, you see, it you wouldn't let me pay my board—"

"Oh, Annie, you wound me deeply!"

"Roy, I said 'if you wouldn't,' for I knew you wouldn't, why then I could still hire Aunt Liza to watch over him. Mamma has paid her hire every month, but I must not permit this. Then the college is not far, she could bring him over to my music room; and you see with what I would obtain for my services I could pay her hire, and still have enough left to purchase our clothes."

"It you haven't gone into this thing in a calculating, business way! Actually are counting the dollars and cents. Annie, my darling sister, drop all thought of such a foolish thing. You shall not teach, that is a fixed thing, but Liza shall stay and relieve you of all care of Ernest, and neither mamma nor you shall be troubled with her hire. I shall manage it so she will think it comes from you. What is mine is yours, remember this, and now not one word of thanks if you love me. Good-night. Go to sleep, and don't let school-rooms and refractory girls enter into your night dreams, for they shall not into your day, that I am determined on."

The door closed and Annie was alone.

CHAPTER XVIII.

God's Methods.

Roy's decision put a veto upon Annie's teaching, so she said no more upon the subject. In some respects her life moved on in the same aimless way, with but little to do or think of. Some old society friends called occasionally, but they were not so full of demonstration and gushing affection as formerly, when wealth and position were hers, and she led the fashion of the city. Often in riding out with Ernest in Roy's carriage, the splendid equipage of a rich neighbor would dash by, with only a cool nod of recognition. Annie saw and felt this deeply. She was still in heavy mourning, and looked in it more beautiful than ever before, but though her face was sad, still underneath she carried a worldly heart, and no one would feel these slights more keenly, yet she did not complain. In some measure life had lost its zest, but there were times when the thoughts of the days that had been were pleasant memories, and she loved to live in retrospection. Val's warning often rang in her ears, and her reply would come back to her, that "love would secure her against trouble," but now she had found that love was not such a potent power, held not such a puissant sway as she had once believed. What a hallucination!

Roy had put a costly monument over her husband, and often she carried little Ernest to this spot, and as he dropped from his baby fingers the white flowers she had gathered for him, she would talk to him of "papa, dear papa." "Oh!" she said to herself, "he will never know that his father fills a drunkard's grave. My baby shall love this spot, shall love, honor and revere the memory of his sainted father." She said "sainted" because it was a popular word to apply to the dead. What it meant she did not stop to inquire, and if she had, she would have used it all the same.

Two years passed away. Roy's family consisted of two children, a boy nearly three years of age and a little baby girl, Annie. They were spoiled children, of handsome appearance, always elegantly dressed, and when inclined to be domineering toward Ernest, his mother always quieted him by saying:

"They are so little, darling, they do not know any better. I wouldn't care at all. You are mamma's little man."

So the child, naturally sweet and yielding, grew more and more lovely as days passed by. He was his mother's idol. At night she bent over his pillow while he slept and watched every breath. He must lie right upon her arm, and often in her dreams she sprang up, dreaming some evil had befallen him. Every thought, night and day, revolved around this one centre.

He was nearly five years old when that dreadful scourge of children, diphtheria, made its appearance in the city. 'It is contagious,' said some; 'infectious,' said others, so Annie kept Ernest closely at home, feeling that he was safest when right before her eyes. Then the disease was pronounced epidemic, and physicians were losing patient after patient. In some families every child, in others there would be two coffins side by side, and in many there was one. The exceptions were those who recovered. Roy's eldest child, his little boy, took it. Annie was almost bereft of reason, and though she nursed the little fellow day and night, yet she studiously kept Ernest upstairs. Poor little boy, how he suffered day after day, but at last he grew better and gradually recovered; so did the baby, whose attack was comparatively light.

"My throat hurts me, mamma."

This from Ernest's lips, was the death knell of Annie's hopes. Then she argued with herself and hoped, but there were the ominous white pustules, the feeble pulse, the fever—what mother does not know the symptoms. Annie did the physician's bidding, vacantly, with strange look and composure. Night after night she bent over her child pressing kisses upon his hot lips, or she would hold him in her arms, press him convulsively to her bosom, as though she could not get near enough. Every moment intensified her sufferings and hope died. Despair with its raven wing seemed to envelop her and shut out the light of the spring bursting forth in fresh beauty.

Once when she thought him better, she was startled by his opening his eyes and saying: "Mamma, I wish I was a little angel."

"My darling! Who told my precious one of angels?"

"Nurse did, mamma, she says they are so pretty, all dressed up in little white dresses, and they have gold harps in their hands and gold crowns on their heads, and play such lovely music. I wish I was one, don't you, mamma?"

Hush, Oh, hush, my darling. You can't be an angel. You can't go up there. You shall not leave me, Ernest, my life, my love—don't talk so. You will kill me, you will kill your mamma."

A bright smile lighted his face as he answered:

"Then we'd be angels together, wouldn't we, mamma, and we'd play and sing so sweet," but she kissed him rapturously over and over again, hushing his words and looking so pained the child raised his hot hand and patted her cheek, saying:

"Poor mamma! Poor, sweet mamma."

She caught his hand, held it to her lips in a spasm of grief, then pressed it to her bosom, while the child, seeing her pent-up suppressed grief, which came in quick convulsive sobs, kept saying tenderly:

"My poor mamma! Poor, dear mamma!"

Ah! here was her last link to life, a life begun in a sunshine of brightness, without a single cloud on the fair horizon, without a shadow across the sun's glorious disk! Here was her link, the others had snapped asunder. The flood had been at its greatest flow at the beginning, but for past years it had ebbed and ebbed, and now it was carrying all away in this its last reflux, hope, joy, life, all, all. Going! Her darling was surely going. She had never had one ray of hope. All else had eluded her eager grasp, why not this? She felt herself to be the deadly Upas tree which blighted, poisoned, killed all within its reach. Here was her hold to earth—oh, surely going! She would have grappled with Death hand to hand. Gladly would she have encountered him in human form, and with the strength born of a mother's love, she would have vanquished him, wrenched her darling from his icy grip. With arms thrown wildly forward and upward she would pace the floor as her child slept and challenge Death, challenge heaven and all the heavenly powers in language dreadful to hear, and then she would sink a pale, feeble woman by her baby's side, powerless, perfectly helpless, and she knew it. All she could do was to watch and wait, strain him to her wildly beating heart and press countless kisses everywhere.

The sun was setting behind a bank of clouds, and the air was still. Nature seemed to hush her many voices in sorrow for a broken-hearted mother in an upper room. "The only son of his mother and she was a widow." Close to her heart she held her child, her eyes fastened to his face. Presently a murmur "Poor Mamma," a pause—a gasp—and little Ernest was dead.

"Suffer little children to come unto me," said a minister standing by, but the words sounded hollow, mocking, in such a death chamber as that.

A SICK BOY'S REQUEST.

Now working for Christ in Liberia is a young man named Walters who tells in his "Spirit of Missions" a touching story of his boyhood. He was one of Bishop Penick's boys in the school at Cape Mount Liberia when one of the numerous tribal wars across the frontier broke out. Several fugitives took refuge in the school and among them a boy who had been badly hurt and was half starved. Walters took care of the lad and did all he could for him; but, he says "he grew worse and worse; but, boy as I was, I never suspected anything serious. But one evening he sent for me, and, after thanking me profusely for what I had done for him, with tears in his eyes and faltering voice, said: 'Joe, I am going to die, and I want you to pray for me.' Judge of my surprise and confusion, since I was not a Christian, and hence knew not how to point a dying heathen boy to the Lamb of God who keth away the sin of the world. I tried to persuade him that he was getting better, and that this was only a sickly frenzy which would wear off after a good night's sleep. But to no purpose. He assured me that he was about to die and begged me to kneel down by his bed and pray for him. I finally consented, knelt down by his bed and said the Lord's Prayer. He thanked me heartily and asked if I would still grant one last petition. I consented. He said, 'My last request is that you will give me a prayer to die with.' After hesitating, I told him to say: 'Kambah Im bowle,' 'Lord forgive me.'

"I left him thinking that after a good sleep he would be better by morning. But about four o'clock next morning I was awakened and told that he had just died, and that he died repeating 'Kambah Im bowle.'

"Since then I have been to the United States to learn how to be a missionary and am now I trust better qualified to point a seeking soul to Christ."

We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

TALKS WITH MOTHERS.—No. 3. HAPPY BABYHOOD.

Every mother wants her baby to thrive, because a healthy child is a happy child. The question of how the baby shall be fed is demanding the attention, as never before, not only of the mothers in the land, but of the entire medical profession also, because this now realized how much the health of a child can be influenced by proper nutrition during the years of babyhood. As the result of the improper feeding of the infant, the vitality of the child is impaired, and he grows up weak and puny. In these days when artificial food is being so generally resorted to for infants, the demand for a substitute for mother's milk has brought out many foods for which great claims are made. Gustav Mellin, an English chemist, was the first to discover and combine the requisite properties necessary for an artificial food, and with his discovery the rational feeding of infants commenced. Mellin's Food is the only perfect substitute for mother's milk, and it has done more to make babies strong and healthy than anything else that has ever been invented. Mellin's Food possesses all the requisite meat and flesh producing and bone-forming constituents necessary to give a child health, vigor and vitality. Infants are exceedingly fond of it and thrive upon it when nothing else can be retained upon the stomach. If they have been weak, fretful and troublesome they become happy, healthy and active; bright eyes, rosy cheeks, firm muscles and a strong constitution are the inevitable results of using his excellent preparation. Mellin's Food, being highly nutritious and easily digested, is also perfectly adapted to the wants of invalids and convalescents.

A GUEST BECOMING A BENEFACTOR.

Everyone will remember Tolstoi's story of the poor cobbler, who, in entertaining several poor persons, entertained his Lord. That was a beautiful parable, but here is an historical fact conveying a similar lesson. Haydn, the famous composer, when a boy, was employed by the organist of the cathedral at Vienna; but when his voice broke, his master dismissed him from the choir, and afterwards turned him into the streets at seven o'clock one evening in November, with tattered clothes and without a coin in his pocket. A poor but friendly musician of the name of Spangler discovered him the next morning, and though he himself lodged with his wife and children in a single room on a fifth story, he offered the outcast Haydn a corner of his garret and a seat at his table. A miserable bed, a table, a chair and a wretched harpsichord were all that Spangler had to give in a garret which had neither windows nor stove; but this act of charity of the benevolent Spangler was welcome, and most readily accepted by Haydn, who at a later date nobly repaid the kindness by appointing Spangler as the principal tenor singer in the chapel of the Prince Esterhazy.

HEARD IN A PRISON.

In a recent letter to the Baptist Missionary Union, of Boston, Mass., the Rev. G. J. Geis, describing a tour he has just taken among the Kachims of India, relates a significant incident. He says that he was preaching one evening under a tree by a river bank, and noticed one of the men who waited to listen, looking at him with a kind of pleased surprise. After he had finished preaching, this man came to him. He said that a year before he had been in prison at Bhamo. There, a fellow-prisoner, who had afterwards been proved innocent, had told him the same story of Jesus that the preacher had just been telling. He had often wished to hear more, but until that evening he had never had an opportunity.

THE CAVES OF ELEPHANTA

Gigantic Rock-Sanctuaries of India, Visited by Dr. Talmage During His Recent Tour —Sacred to Heathen Gods—The War Against Opium.

TRAVELER finds nowhere else in the world more striking evidences of the ruin of ancient religions than in India. Splendid even in decay, the innumerable temples and sanctuaries, triumphs of a glorious architecture, stand as mute witnesses of the tremendous power once wielded by a heathen worship, in Asia, that spread over the greater part of the world.

who were the first white men to visit and explore it. Near the statue, and a little distance up-hill, is a cave, with an entrance sixty feet wide and eighteen feet high, supported by pillars that has been hewn out of the solid rock. Within, the great cave is divided into different halls or chambers, each of which contains a number of remarkable sculptures, representing different Hindu deities, but nearly all more or less defaced by time or the vandalism of curious visitors, eager for relics. There are no more imposing specimens of religious architecture of the colossal type, to be found anywhere in the great mosques or temples of the globe, than those that arrest the eye of the pilgrim as he enters the huge, oblong hall. Boldly yet symmetrically carved, the enormous pillars seem quite capable of supporting the great masses of rock above them, and the gloomy beyond. Even in their mutilated state, these figures produce a powerful effect upon the spectator and impart an air of majesty to the surroundings. On a wall immediately opposite the entrance, and in a recess, are three great panels of sculptured rock, the central panel being a representation of the Hindu Triad: Brahma, the Creator; Vishnu, the Preserver; and Siva, or Mahadeva, the Destroyer. The heads of this strange trinity are each nearly twelve feet in height, being lengthened by the tiaras, or royal head-dresses, and the expression of the features is that of power and dignity. Vishnu holds in one upturned hand a lotus flower, Brahma a gourd, and Siva a "sacred" snake—the cobra, most deadly of all serpents. That this idolatrous manifestation of deity, which is known in Hindu theology as the Trimurti, was in times past skillfully used by the priests to impose upon the credulity of the people, is evident from several indications. There are marks on the rocks which would seem to show that the recess in which the figures are carved, was closed by a veil or screen, placed there by the other faces of gods. In the immediately the triple a hollow, excavated visible from tries, triumphs of a glorious architecture, stand as mute witnesses of the tremendous power once wielded by a heathen worship, in Asia, that spread over the greater part of the world. In the remote coasts of China to the borders of Syria. Theological sculptures in India and in the temples and pagodas, crumbling with age or rudely defaced by the fanatic zeal, are found everywhere, also numerous are the ruins found in these places that can almost credit the assertion of investigators who have made a special study of Hindu theology, that over 300,000,000 deities of potential inferiority, lie at different times been worshipped by the people of Hindostan! During a recent tour of the globe, Rev. Dr. Talmage, while in India, visited many of the sacred places, including the famous "Caves of Elephanta," which lies between Bombay and the mainland. Immediately opposite the landing-place is a colossal statue of an elephant, from which it received the name "Elephanta Isle" from the Portuguese,

This was used as a place of concealment for the priest who would delude the worshippers by simulating the tones of the god, or in other ways impress them with the belief that the image of stone was capable of interpreting and answering their prayers. On either side of this monstrous trinity of idols are other carved figures of less magnitude, some human size, others dwarfs, and in a smaller cave to the right, there is a still greater variety of sculptures, the largest being a double figure of Siva and Parvati. There is also a four-faced representation of Brahma, on a lotus flower, and near it still another of Vishnu. A third cave or compartment contains a gigantic, rock-cut symbol of Mahadeva or Siva, and there are two further caves, also containing sculptures, many of them defaced by the disintegration

THE SICK GENERAL.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: 2. Kings 5:1, "He was a leper."

HERE we have a warrior sick; not with pleurisies or rheumatisms or consumptions, but with a disease worse than all these put together. A red mark has come out on the forehead, precursor of complete disfigurement and dissolution. I have something awful to tell you, General Naaman, the commander-in-chief of all the Syrian forces, has the leprosy! It is on his hands, on his face, on his feet, on his entire person. The Leprosy! Get out of the way of the pestilence! If his breath strike you, you are a dead man. The commander-in-chief of all the forces of Syria! And yet he would be glad to exchange conditions with the boy at his stirrup, or the hostler that blankets his charger. The news goes like wildfire all through the realm, and the people are sympathetic, and they cry out: "Is it possible that our great hero, who slew Ahab, and around whom we came with such vociferation when he returned from victorious battle—can it be possible that our grand and glorious Naaman has the leprosy?" Yes. Everybody has something he wishes he had not. David, an Absalom to disgrace him; Paul, a thorn to sting him; Job, carbuncles to plague him; Samson, a Delilah to shear him; Ahab, a Naboth to deny him; Haman, a Mordecai to irritate him; George Washington, childlessness to afflict him; John Wesley, a termagant wife to pester him; Leah, weak eyes; Pope, a crooked back; Byron, a club foot; John Milton, blind eyes; Charles Lamb, an insane sister; and you, and you, and you, and you, something which you never bargained for, and would like to get rid of. The reason of this is that God does not want this world to be too bright; otherwise, we would always want to stay and eat these fruits, and lie on these lounges, and shake hands in this pleasant society. We are only in the vestibule of a grand temple. God does not want us to stay on the doorstep, and therefore he sends aches, and annoyances, and sorrows, and bereavements of all sorts to push us on, and push us up toward ripper fruits, and brighter society, and more radiant prosperities. God is only whipping us ahead. The reason that Edward Payson and Robert Hall had more rapturous views of heaven than other people had was because, through their aches and pains, God pushed them nearer up to it. If God dashes out one of your pictures, it is only to show to you a brighter one. If he sting your foot with gout, your brain with neuralgia, your tongue with an unextinguishable thirst, it is only because he is preparing to substitute a better body than you ever dreamed of, when the mortal shall put on immortality. It is to push you on, and to push you up toward something grander and better, that God sends upon you, as he did upon General Naaman, something you do not want. Seated in his

Syrian mansion—all the walls glittering with the shields which he had captured in battle; the corridors, crowded with admiring visitors who just wanted to see him once; music and mirth, and banqueting filling all the mansion, from tessellated floor to pictured ceiling—Naaman would have forgotten that there was anything better, and would have been glad to stay there ten thousand years. But O, how the shields dim, and how the visitors fly the hall, and how the music drops dead from the string, and how the gates of the mansion slam shut with sepulchral bang, as you read the closing words of the eulogium: "He was a leper! He was a leper!"

There was one person more sympathetic with General Naaman than any other person. Naaman's wife walks the floor, wringing her hands, and trying to think what she can do to alleviate her husband's suffering. All remedies have failed. The surgeon-general, and the doctors of the royal staff, have met, and they have shaken their heads, as much as to say: "No cure; no cure." I think that the office-seekers had all folded up their recommendations and gone home. Probably most of the employees of the establishment had dropped their work and were thinking of looking for some other situation. What shall now become of poor Naaman's wife? She must have sympathy somewhere. In her despair she goes to a little Hebrew captive, a servant girl in her house, to whom she tells the whole story; as sometimes, when overborne by the sorrows of the world, and finding no sympathy anywhere else, you have gone out and found in the sympathy of some humble domestic—Rose, or Dinah, or Bridget—a help which the world could not give you.

What a scene it was: one of the grandest women in all Syria in cabinet-council with a waiting-maid over the declining health of the mighty General! "I know something," says the little captive maid: "I know something," as she bounds to her bare feet. "In the land from which I was stolen there is a certain prophet known by the name of Elisha, who can cure almost anything, and I shouldn't wonder if he could cure my master. Send for him right away." "O, hush!" you say. "If the highest medical talent in all the land cannot cure that leper, there is no need of your listening to any talk of a servant girl." But do not scoff, do not sneer. The finger of that little captive maid is pointing in the right direction. She might have said: "This is a judgment upon you for stealing me from my native land. Didn't they snatch me off in the night, breaking my father's and mother's heart? and many a time I have lain and cried all night because I was so homesick." Then, flushing up into childish indignation, she might have said: "Good for them: I'm glad Naaman's got the leprosy; I wish all the Syrians had the leprosy." No. Forgetting her personal sorrows, she sympathizes with the suffering of her master, and commends him to the famous Hebrew prophet.

And how often it is that the finger of childhood has pointed grown persons in the right direction. O Christian soul, how long is it since you got rid of the leprosy of sin? You say: "Let me see. It must be five years now." Five years. Who was it that pointed you to the Divine Physician? "O," you say, "it was my little Amie, or Fred, or Charley, that clambered up on my knees, and looked into my face, and asked me why I didn't become a Christian, and, all the time stroking my cheek, so I couldn't get angry, insisted upon knowing why I didn't have family prayers." There are grandparents who have been brought to Christ by their little grandchildren. There are hundreds of Christian mothers who had their attention first called to Jesus by their little children. How did you get rid of the leprosy of sin? How did you find your way to the Divine Physician? "O," you say, "my child—my dying child, with wan and wasted finger, pointed that way. O, I never shall forget," you say, "that scene at the cradle and the crib that awful night. It was hard, hard, very hard; but if that little one on its dying bed had not pointed me to Christ, I don't think I ever would have got rid of my leprosy." Go into the Sabbath school any Sunday and you will find hundreds of little fingers pointing in the same direction, toward Jesus Christ and toward Heaven.

Years ago the astronomers calculated that there must be a world hanging at a certain point in the heavens, and a large prize was offered for some one who could discover that world. The telescopes from the great observatories were pointed in vain; but a girl at Nantucket, Mass., fashioned a telescope, and, looking through it, discovered that star, and won the prize, and the admiration of all the astronomical world, that stood amazed at her genius. And so it is often the case that grown people cannot see the light, while some little child beholds the star of pardon, the star of hope, the star of consolation, the star of Bethlehem, the morning star of Jesus. "Not many mighty men, not many wise men are called; but God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty; and base things, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are." O, do not despise the prattle of little children when they are speaking about God, and Christ, and heaven. You see the way your child is pointing; will you take that pointing, or wait until, in the wrench of some awful bereavement, God shall lift that child to another world, and then it will beckon you upward? Will you take the pointing, or will you wait for the beckoning? Blessed be God that the little Hebrew captive pointed in the right direction. Blessed be God for the saving ministry of Christian children.

No wonder the advice of this little Hebrew captive threw all Naaman's mansion and Ben-hadad's palace into excitement. Good-by, Naaman! With face scarified, and ridged, and inflamed by the pestilence, and aided by those who supported him on either side, he staggers out to the chariot. Hold fast the fiery coursers of the royal stable while the poor sick man lifts his swollen feet and pain-struck limbs into the vehicle. Bolster him up with the pillows, and let him take a lingering look at his bright apartment, for perhaps the Hebrew captive may be mistaken, and the next time Naaman comes to that place he may be a dead weight on the shoulders of those who carry him—an expired chieftain seeking sepulture, amid the lamentations of an admiring nation. Good-by, Naaman! Let the charioteer drive gently over the hills of Hermon, lest he jolt the invalid. Here goes the bravest man of all his day a captive of a horrible disease. As the ambulance winds through the streets of Damascus, the tears and prayers of all the people go after the world-renowned invalid.

Perhaps you have had an invalid go out from your house on a health-excursion. You know how the neighbors stood around and said: "Ah, he will never come back again alive." Oh, it was a solemn moment, I tell you, when the invalid had departed and you went into the room to make the bed, and to remove the medicine-phials from the shelf, and to throw open the shutters, so that the fresh air might rush into the long-closed room. Good-by, Naaman! There is only one cheerful face looking at him, and that is the face of the little Hebrew captive, who is sure he will get cured, and who is so glad she helped him. As the chariot winds out, and the escort of mounted courtiers, and the mules, laden with sacks of gold, and silver, and embroidered suits of apparel, went through the gate of Damascus and out on the long way, the hills of Naphtali and Ephraim look down on the procession, and the retinue goes right past the battle-fields where Naaman, in days of his health, used to rally his troops for fearful onset, and then the procession stops and reclines a while in the grove of olive and oleander; and General Naaman so sick—so very, very sick!

How the countrymen gaped as the procession passed! They had seen Naaman go past like a whirlwind in days gone by, and had stood aghast at the clank of his war-equipments; but now they commiserate him. They say: "Poor man, he will never get home alive; poor man!"

General Naaman wakes up from a less sleep in the chariot, and he says to the charioteer: "How long before we shall reach the Prophet Elisha?" The charioteer says to a wayside: "How far is Elisha's house?" He says: "Two miles." "Two miles?" Then they whip up the lathered and fagged-out horses. The procession brightens up at the prospect of a speedy arrival. They drive up to the house of the prophet. The charioteers shout to the horses, and the hoots and grinding wheels cease shaking the earth. Come out, Elisha, come out, you have company; the grandest company that ever came to your house has come here now. No stir inside Elisha's house. The fact was, the Lord had informed Elisha that the sick captain was coming, and just as he was to treat him. Indeed, when you are sick, and the Lord wants you to get well, he always tells the doctor how to treat you: the reason we have so many bungling doctors is because they depend upon their strength and instructions, and not on the Lord God, and that always makes bad practice. Come out, Elisha, and attend your business. General Naaman and his retinue waited, and waited, and waited. The fact was, Naaman had two diseases: pride and leprosy; the one was as hard to get rid of as the other. Elisha sits quietly in his house, and does not go out. For awhile, when he thinks he has humbled his proud man, he says to a servant: "Go out and tell General Naaman to bathe seven times in the river Jordan, out yonder seven miles, and he will get entirely well." The message comes out: "What!" says the Commander-in-chief of the Syrian forces, his eye kindling with an animation which it had not shown for weeks, and his swollen foot stamping on the bottom of the chariot, regardless of pain. "What! Isn't he coming out to see me? Why, I thought certainly he would come and utter some complimentary words over me, or make some complimentary passes over my wounds. Well, I don't think he knows who I am. Isn't he coming out? Why, when the Shunammite woman came to him, he rushed out and cried: 'Is it well with thee? is it well with thy husband? is it well with thy children?' and will he treat a poor unknown woman like that, and let me, a titled personage, sit here in my chariot and wait, and wait, and wait, and not endure it any longer. Charioteer, drive on! Wash in the Jordan! Ha! The slimy Jordan—the muddy Jordan—the monotonous Jordan! I wouldn't be enwashed in such a river as that. Why we watered our horses in a better river than that on our way here—the beautiful river, the jasper-paved river of Pharpar. Besides that, we have in our country another limpid river, Abana, with foliaged banks, and torrent ever swift and ever clear, and the flickering shadows of sycamore and oleander. Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?"

I suppose Naaman felt very much as Americans would feel if, by way of medical prescription, some one should tell us to go and wash in the Danube or the Rhine. We would answer: "Are not the Connethe Hudson just as good?" Or as an Englishman would feel if he were told, by way of medical prescription, he must go and wash in the Mississippi or the St. Lawrence. He would cry out: "Are not the Times and the Shannon just as well?" The fact was that haughty Naaman needed to learn what every Englishman and every African needs to learn—that when God tells you to do a thing, you must go and do it, whether you understand the reason or not. Take the prescription, whether you like it or not. One thing is certain—unless the mighty Naaman does as Elisha commands, he will die of his awful sickness. And you see you do as Christ commands you—you are seized upon by an everlasting waste-away. Obey and live—disobey and die. Lying over-arching, under girding, stultious alternative!

Well, General Naaman could not stand the charioteer. The charioteer gives a jerk to the right until the bit snaps in the horse's mouth, and the whirr of the wheels and the flying of the dust shows the indignation of the great commander. "He turned and went away in a rage." So people now often get mad at religion. They vituperate against ministers, against churches, against Christian people. One would think from their behavior that the kind and loving God has been studying how to annoy, and exasperate, and demolish them. What has he been doing? Oh, trying to cure their death-dealing leprosy. It is all. Yet they whip up their horses, and they go away in a rage. But, after all, it seems that this health excursion of General Naaman is to be a dead failure. That little Hebrew captive must as well have not to him of the Prophet, and this long journey as well not have been taken. Poor, sick, dying Naaman! Are you going away in high dudgeon, and worse than when you came? As his chariot halts a moment, his servants clamor in it and coax him to do as Elisha said. They say: "It's easy. If the Prophet had told you to walk for a mile on slip spikes in order to get rid of this awful disease, you would have done it. It is easy. Come, my lord, just get down and wash in the Jordan." "Well," he says, "to please you I will do as you say." The retinue drive to the brink of the Jordan. The horses paw and neigh to get into the stream themselves and cool their hot flanks. General Naaman, assisted by his attendants, gets down out of his chariot and painfully creeps to the brink of the river, and steps in. He wades once into the flood, and and shakes the water out of nostril and eye; and his attendants look at him and say: "Why, General, how much better you do look." He bows a second time into the flood and comes up, and the wild stare is gone out of his eye. He bows the third time into the flood and comes up, and the shrivelled flesh has got smooth again. He bows the fourth time in the flood and comes up, and the hair that had fallen out is restored in thick locks again all over the brow. He bows the fifth time into the flood and comes up, and the hoarseness has gone out of his throat. He bows the sixth time and comes up, and the soreness and anguish have gone out of his limbs. "Why," he says, "I am almost well, but I will make a complete cure," and he bows the seventh time into the flood and comes up, and not so much as a fever, or a scale, or an eruption as big as the head of a pin is to be seen on him. He sits out on the bank and says: "Is it possible?" And the attendants look and say: "It is possible?" And as, with the health of an athlete, he bounds back into the chariot and drives on, there goes up from all his attendants a wild "Huzza! Huzza!"

Now, this General Naaman did two things in order to get well. The first was—he got out of his chariot. And you have got to get down out of the chariot of your pride if you ever become a Christian. Never, until we get down on our knees will we find mercy. That is the journey we have to make on our knees. It is our infernal pride that keeps us from getting rid of the leprosy of sin. Dear Lord, what have we to be proud of? Proud of our scales? Proud of our uncleanness? Proud of this killing infection? Bring us down at thy feet, weeping, praying, penitent, believing suppliants.

For sinners, Lord, thou cam'st to bleed,
And I'm a sinner vile indeed;
Lord, I believe thy grace is free,
O, magnify that grace in me.

But he had not only to get down out of his chariot. He had to wash. "O," you say: "I am very careful with my ablutions. Every day I plunge into a bright and beautiful bath." Ah, my hearer, there is a flood brighter than any that pours from these hills. It is the flood that breaks in a torrent from the granite of the eternal hills. It is the flood of pardon, and peace, and life, and heaven.

ALFRED S. DYER, EDITOR AND MISSIONARY.

That flood started in the tears of Christ, and the sweat of Gethsemane, and rolled on, accumulating flood, until all earth and heaven could bathe in it. Zechariah called it the "fountain open for sin and uncleanness." William Cowper called it the "fountain filled with blood." Wade down now into this glorious flood, deeper, deeper, deeper. Plunge once, twice, thrice, four times, five times, six times, seven times. It will take as much as that to cure your soul. O wash, wash, wash, and be clean.

I suppose that was a great time at Damascus when General Naaman got back. The charioteers did not have to drive slowly any longer, lest they jolt the invalid; but as the horses dashed through the streets of Damascus, I think the people rushed out to hail back their chieftain. Then music woke up the palace, and the tapestry of the windows was drawn away, that the multitude outside might mingle with the princely mirth inside, and the feet went up and down in the dance, and all the streets of Damascus that night echoed and re-echoed with the news: "Naaman's cured! Naaman's cured!" But a gladder time than that it would be if your soul should get cured of its leprosy. The swiftest white horses hitched to the King's chariot would rush the news into the eternal city. Our loved ones before the throne would welcome the glad tidings. Your children on earth, would notice the change in your look and the change in your manner, and would put their arms around your neck and say: "Mother, I guess you must have become a Christian. Father, I think you have got rid of the leprosy." O, Lord, God of Elisha, have mercy on us!

of the rocks. Among all the figures that of Siva is the most prominent as it is the most popular in Hindu devotion. The panels are believed, by some critics, to represent the human-divine life of Siva, his marriage, his abandonment of home and kindred, his conquest and slaughter of his enemies, his retirement into meditation, and his ultimate absorption into "Brahm"—a panorama of the progress of the soul of man as it appears to the unenlightened minds of those who formulated the ancient Hindu religion. This strange cave-temple, which was dedicated to Siva, is believed to have been excavated and its sculptures fashioned about the 10th century A. D.

If India is the "Mother of Religions," as some writers have called that land of ruined temples and palaces, it is also the birthplace of a multitude of vices. In Bombay, almost within sight of the cave shrines of Elephanta, there is one predominant vice that signalizes it among all the cities of the East—that of opium-smoking. Recently a strong effort was made by the authorities to suppress the evil, and this course was supported by many devoted missionaries and by a portion of the In-me to view some of the samples in Bombay of the licensed facilities which the British Government in India provides for those subject to its rule. Centrally situated, close to a large municipal market, we pause before a dingy building, and pass into a large, dark, stinking room, dense with poisonous opium smoke. It is a veritable Black Hole. The first objects that are visible in the semi-darkness are two little children, of about five and six years of age respectively, lying on a dirty mat near the door in a comatose state. A man is fanning one of them, who seems to have been over-dosed, and is as still as a corpse. We penetrate further. Human forms, in all stages of opium stupor, including two or three women, are lying thickly together on benches, with only a narrow passage between. One of my young missionary companions counts eighty-eight, doubtless missing some in the obscurity. Several of these are emaciated by the vice almost to skeletons. But we can stand this suffocating opium atmosphere no longer. We all make for the street. It is a beautiful, bright, balmy night. As I stand again in the fresh open air, I wonder how many Christian people know of the massacre of humanity that is being wrought in India and Burmah.

"I say it deliberately, that the opium habit is the most imperious vice that has fallen upon humanity. Medical missionaries in China testified to me again and again that, probably, as much as ninety-five per cent. of the victims of opium who go through missionary opium refuges and leave as cured, relapse into the habit. This habit pre-eminently destroys the power of the will. For that reason I have been repeatedly implored by opium slaves in Bombay licensed opium dens to implore the Government to stop the supply of the drug. They have said, in substance, that it is by this means only that they can get free from the fetters of the vice that is damning them."

Portraits of Messrs. Dyer, Prantch and Lal, the martyrs who submitted to imprisonment to forward the cause of humanity and to bring the opium curse more prominently before the eye of the civilized world appear on this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Their brave battle against this hideous vice deserves the sympathy and approval of Christian people all over the world.

A ZULU POLYGAMIST'S TRIAL.

From Rev. Charles Johnson, a missionary in Zululand, comes a remarkable story of domestic self-sacrifice. A native Christian won the friendship of Dugusa, an Induna, or head man, of a Zulu tribe, and labored hard to get him to attend the mission services. But he was a great man in his way, with a high position, had a large household, and eight wives. Dugusa, at last, paid a visit to the mission, and, after a time, came regularly and brought his wives with him. They were all very attentive, and seemed deeply interested. One day Dugusa astonished the missionary by remarking, with a good deal of feeling, that it was better for a man to have one wife than eight. "How can a man be a Christian," he asked, plaintively, "who has eight wives?" However, he continued attending the services, and he and his wives paid close attention. One day four of his wives went to him of their own accord, and told him that they wanted to be separated, taking up the position that the Zulus call "the mothers," which is equivalent to supernumerary wives. The four remaining wives continued to live with him, but they talked the matter over with each other and with him. Finally, one of the four was chosen to stay with him, and the other three left his kraal, never to return. Nothing was said to the missionary about what had been done for several months. Then Dugusa presented himself, and asked for baptism. All the eight women did likewise, at the same time informing him how the polygamous difficulty had been settled. The missionary adds, "no one knows what it cost in sorrow and suffering."

dian press as well as by many white residents. Prominent in this laudable movement were Mr. Alfred S. Dyer, editor of the Bombay "Guardian," Mr. A. W. Prautch, a missionary long in the service of Rev. J. M. Thoburn, the Methodist Missionary Bishop of India, and Man Sukh Lal, a native Christian. These three, having made public protest against the open disobedience of the Viceroy's order, closing the opium dens, were prosecuted by one of the leading opium contractors and a fine was imposed, but rather than pay, the three together submitted to a month's imprisonment for conscience sake. Their imprisonment excited great indignation in India and England and has been the means of arousing the government to such activity that there is now an excellent prospect of the vice being thoroughly suppressed in Bombay at least.

In conducting his own defence, Mr. Dyer gave this realistic picture of the condition of affairs in the native quarter of Bombay:

"Grant and Duncan Roads are two of the great arteries of traffic in Bombay. The spot where these two main thoroughfares cross each other resembles a square, or open market or meeting-place, on account of the two eastern water-tanks, which give breadth to the junction of the roads. Here in the morning may be seen laborers waiting to be hired (Matt. 20: 3); and usually in the evening, a multitude listening to a native orator. The neighborhood is densely populated. It is within a few steps of this junction of main roads that a Chinaman has received from the Government a license to open an opium-smoking hell. It is new ground for the satanic business. It has not been carried on before, so far as we can learn, in this locality. The teeming thousands of this quarter of the city also, are to be tempted to their ruin by a fascinating temptation—the teeming thousands whom it is the mission of the Christian Church to save.

"On Christmas Eve, two newly-arrived missionaries, and two others, accompanied

CHRIST'S TESTIMONY TO JOHN.

S.S. Lesson for Dec. 2. Luke 7: 24-35. Golden Text, Luke 7: 27. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE active ministry of John the Baptist, Christ's faithful forerunner, was accomplished, he had turned "many of the children of Israel . . . to the Lord their God;" he had gone before his face, "in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just: to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." (Luke 1: 16, 17.) Now, he was needed no more, and the remainder of his days upon earth must serve God's purpose for the further education for a higher service of this most honored and precious instrument. But John

Could not Understand

God's dealing with him. He had been chosen at birth to the high vocation where-with he was called; his father and mother before him had understood, as few did in their day, the purposes of God; and they had helped to develop in their son the solemn and intense ministry which took him apart from other men to be a sacred Elijah, "in the deserts, until the day of his showing unto Israel." When the word of God came to him in the wilderness, without taking counsel with flesh and blood, without any hesitation or drawback, he "came into all the region round about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance unto the remission of sins," having understood from Isa. 40: 3-8, that which was written in the Scripture regarding him, and yielding all his being, spirit, soul and body, to fulfil this Scripture which was as his very life. It was no hardship to John that his food and raiment were of the most meagre and of the coarsest kind; he lived not for things temporal. He was a man of his vocation; a voice to deliver an unprecedented message from God; a servant, a herald to introduce the Son of God into his life's ministry.

Popular, for a few years, as no other man in his day, the instrument of the greatest religious movement in his own generation, perhaps in any generation, up to his time—yet his popularity and his ministry were only preparatory, and from the time when the climax of his testimony was reached, and he could bear witness of Jesus and say: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," his power and his usefulness must decline. He himself said, "He must increase, but I must decrease." Yet this blessed man of God was perhaps little prepared for the fulfilment of this, his own prophecy. He did not know through what depths of nothingness he must go, or how terrible and intense would be the suffering which he had yet to bear. His disciples forsook him to follow Jesus. This perhaps he had calculated on, and might heartily rejoice in. But his popularity declined. He had been "a burning and a shining light," (John 5: 35), and many who had hung upon his words were "willing for a season," but only for a season, to "rejoice in his light." And just when the supreme moment of his life had arrived, his light began to wane, and instead of being called, as probably he expected, to take a large part in the ministry of Jesus, his disciples were called to follow him and

He was Passed by.

Still faithful to the ministry committed to him, he had rebuked King Herod for his sin, and without any intervention on the part of Jesus, he was cast into prison and left there. It was the literal fulfilment of his words: "He must increase, but I must decrease." And Jesus was all this time growing more and more popular. Not only were his words with power, but they were also accompanied by mighty deeds. These the disciples of John recounted to him. The raising of the widow's son, outside the city of Nain, had just taken place, and this work of power was related to the imprisoned prophet. There are times in the life of a child of God, when the enemy is permitted to make a special assault, when he succeeds in getting the eye off God, and the situation seems to be impossible and past endurance. It was probably so with John at this moment. As far as he knew, he had been faithful; he was conscious of no departure from his God, his one anticipation had been the joy of announcing to the world the Lamb of God, who should take away sin. He had understood the sacrifice of Christ, no other living man, perhaps, understood the Lord as he did; and yet he, of all others, was passed by and ignored! What could be the reason?

It was an Awful Moment.

Those only who have passed through such moments will understand the inexpressible agony which must have laid hold upon him, until some ray of light from God should visit him. What should he do? He did the only thing which a soul thus situated can do; he appealed to Jesus. Sending two disciples to him, he inquired: "Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?" (Luke 7: 20, R.V.) Jesus had no word of reproach with which to crush the bruised reed, but he recalled John to the true proof of his identity, and thus drew his eyes off himself to his Lord. "In that hour he cured many diseases and plagues and evil spirits; and on many that were blind he bestowed sight. And he answered and said unto them, Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard: the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, the poor have good tidings preached to them." (R.V.)

Thus far there was nothing to help John: the very fact that Jesus did all this, and yet so completely ignored him, was the cause of all his trouble. But the Lord added that which was the clue to the whole situation: "Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me." There is a blessedness beyond the blessedness of fellowship in ministry, the blessedness of confidence that, understood or not understood, the ways of the Lord are right. John had, during his sore temptation, been measuring the ways of Christ by the way in which they affected him personally. Self is aglance through which everything that is seen is distorted. There is another, and a clearer glass; and this was that which the Lord put into the hands of his servant. Look at all things in the light of what I am, not in the light of how these good things touch you. It was the last word of Christ to John before his death, and we may well believe that it

Nerved Him for His Martyrdom.

But why should such a faithful servant of God be thus dealt with? John's education was very precious to his Lord, he had to learn, from Isa. 60: 6-8, how "all flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of grass; the grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the Word of our God shall stand forever." All that would pass away, his popularity, his energy, his zeal, etc., must fade; but all that he, as a voice, had ministered, all that he, as a messenger, had fulfilled of the Word of God, would stand forever.

The messengers departed, and now the veil is drawn aside, and the real value in the eyes of Jesus of his honored forerunner becomes apparent. At the very time when John had been crushed under the sense of being ignored, Jesus could say to the multitude concerning him: "What went ye out into the wilderness to behold? A reed shaken with the wind? But what went ye out to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? Gorgeous apparel and delicate living are not to be found in the wilderness, and John is not to be found in kings' courts. "But what went ye out to see? A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet." Holy Scripture was written concerning this man and has been fulfilled in and by him: "Among them that are born of woman there is none greater than John: yet he that is but little in the kingdom of God is greater than he."

O, child of God, tempted almost to despair and yet unconscious of any departure from God, accused by the enemy until every foothold of faith may seem ready to give way, fear not! He who permits such a furnace has gauged its strength before he called thee to enter it; he is surely with thee in the midst of it; only learn the lesson of seeing everything in the light of what he is, and refuse to judge for a moment of God, of things, of persons, in relation to what thou art and then, in the deep darkness thou mayest "trust in the name of the Lord" and stay upon thy God. (Jer. 1: 12.)

AN ORIENTAL FORERUNNER.

QUESTION and answer and comment, as all three stand in the passage, are worthy of close study. The question was a natural one. John the Baptist imprisoned in his dungeon was evidently perplexed. With the ceremonies of the dying dispensation about him, he was looking for the protection and prosperity promised to the God under that dispensation. God did not rescue him from the wicked Herod and the more wicked Herodias. His work was stopped, the work God gave him to do and God made no sign. Jesus too, whom he had baptized and announced as the Messiah, did not interfere. John, lying there like a captive eagle, fretted in his enforced idleness and longed for the open proclamation of the kingdom. His disciples came to him in his prison and told him that Jesus was still teaching and had made no effort to claim the kingdom. An awful doubt seems to have momentarily crossed his mind. Was it possible that he had been under an awful mistake? Could he have been deluded in supposing himself the Forerunner, who was to announce the approach of the coming King as the servant of an Oriental potentate to this day runs before the royal chariot, to warn the people in the crowded streets to make way? So he sends two of his disciples to ask the question of Jesus.

Jesus purposely delayed giving an answer. John's disciples remained in the throng that followed him, witnessing all that was done. Then Jesus apparently be-thinks himself of them and bids them go and tell John what they have seen, and adds to the list of miracles, the fact that the poor have the Gospel preached to them. John was to form his own conclusion from the facts. He had asked if Jesus was "the coming One," using the current phrase by which the Jews designated their expected deliverer. Here was one performing miracles with every attestation of divine power, yet taking an interest in the poor. That combination was rare. Let John know and he could judge. The same answer must now be given to men who question Christ's claims. Changes are wrought in character, the drunkard becomes sober, the vicious becomes virtuous, the selfish becomes benevolent and the poor are cared for. A religion which produces those effects must be of divine origin. And the beatitude with which Jesus closed his message applies also to us, as it did to John. The religion of Christ demands humility and self-sacrifice. Blessed are they who do not, like Naaman, turn away in a rage, but Christ's comment on John, after the men had set out for the prison, was proof to the mixed audience around. Some had gone to see John out of curiosity, wanting to see the fanatic, to look at the man who had caused a national sensation, wondering what he would do. Others had gone with expectations that they would attain power and would bring the kingdom for which they were looking and restore the glory of Judea. Others had come to see a real live prophet, such as there in the old days. They had found more than they sought. John had made demands of them which they were reluctant to yield, they turned from him with the flippancy mark that he was possessed. They had a different objection to Christ. The trouble was not with the teacher but with the pupils, as it is with people in the present day who criticize the preacher and pay no attention to his message.

I send my messenger before thy face. This is an allusion to an Oriental custom which still prevails. Dr. Trumbull in his "Story of Oriental Social Life," says that he was in a narrow street, in which children playing, shop-keepers squatting and naked cripples, blind beggars and women were moving lazily about, when a loud shout was heard. It came from a lithe young Egyptian, gaily dressed, his loins girded, and running at full speed. He was crying, "O-ha" (Take care, Yameenak! Shomalak!) (To thy left!) and repeating his cries to the crowd, pushed them one way and the other to make way for those who were to follow. Close behind him came a pair of white horses drawing a carriage containing an officer of the government. "During my stay," the eminent writer continues, "one of the commonest sights was the carriage of a pasha, or of some members of the sultan's household, preceded through the crowded streets by one of these forerunners running ahead as fast as the horses could and calling to the people to clear the way."

Who shall prepare thy way. "At Jerusalem," says a distinguished American traveler in the Holy Land, "as our party arrived from the desert we were told that an Austrian prince was just before us. At this our dragoman was delighted, as he was sure we should find the road in excellent condition all the way northward. And again he said gratefully: 'This prince has been prepared for the prince. I have seen there was always a prince before us. A brief experience on the wilderness and desert roads of Egypt and Arabia, and only of the roads of Palestine, would be sufficient to show the need of special preparation for those roads were to be passable, and the value of such preparation when it has been secured.'

Not a greater prophet than John the Baptist. It is remarkable how often in history great movements have been led by two friends, each of whom paid eloquent tribute to the other. Two such friends were Luther and Melancthon. They were in distinct contrast the reverse of each other, Melancthon being as gentle as Luther was fiery, each honored and loved the other. "I am the rough woodsman," said Luther, "who has to make a path; but Philip goes quietly and peacefully along it, builds and plants, sows and waters, at his pleasure." Even some of Luther's friends, comparing the two men, disparaged Melancthon as "only a grammarian." Luther rejoined: "He is doctor of philosophy and theology, I am never ashamed to yield a point if this grammarian thinks differently from myself. I have done so often already, and I do the same daily; because of the gifts with which God has so richly filled this fragile vessel, I honor the work of God in him. Philip is a wonder to us all."

He that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he. He enjoys the light which John did not have. John knew but vaguely, and as in symbol, the way by which through Christ's death and resurrection the world might be reconciled to God. He humblest member of Christ's kingdom is therefore far in advance of John the Baptist in knowledge of God, and by so much greater than he. When Professor Silliman of Yale, was an old man, he was once sitting among the students listening to a lecture by his son. At the close of the lecture he overheard some one near him saying that the son was a greater man than his father had been. Silliman turned to the group and said: "He ought to be, for I stand on my shoulders."

AT MAR SABA.

Traveler Visits the Oldest Convent of the World—Sturdy Peasant Women in Austere Brotherhood.

A SHEIKH'S DAUGHTER.

A PALANKEEN has been made ready instead of a horse for my use in the journey from Jerusalem to Mar Saba, said to be the oldest convent in the world. I acquiesce the more willingly in the arrangement that the memory of a succession of "Jerusalem ponies" does not incll me toward the experiment of undertaking a long ride upon what I heard an Elishman describe in a Christmas talk Bishop Gobat's school on Mount Zion, as that most unhasty beast, the ass." I do not take kindly to the donkey, nor, to judge from his behaviour when honored by being my weight, does he to me.

David demurs when a horse, a sturdy and amiable creature and gentle of manner, is proposed. The way is steep and rough, he represents, and much time would be lost by a certain traveler's habit of alighting to walk up or down particularly high heights. The mules and donkeys are sure-footed as cats from long training and madame has faith in his muleteers. Madame, growing indolent, and maybe a trifle weary in nearing the end of her many varied journeyings, seconds the motion.

We leave the Jaffa gate at noon of a lovely day that has in it a promise of Spring to the bare earth. Already pale purple and bright yellow blossoms show brave heads above the withered turf on sunny terraces and in sheltered nooks looking southward. A cool wind below the bluffs beyond Siloam, but up with the mean huts of the leper settlement, we see upon the right, the Pottery Field, or Aceldama, in which, it is said, Judas hanged himself. A tree that must be nearly, if not quite, fifty years of age, is pointed out as that which refused to bear the traitor's weight.

A little further on we meet a party of a dozen women laden with enormous bundles of the dried furze or low thorny growth, which serves them for kindling wood, and in a mild weather, the only fuel used by many of the poorer peasantry. They resemble nothing else so much as ants plodding along under burdens many times larger than their own bodies, but this company is unusually merry, talking, laughing and shouting gaily to each other as they take the side of the road to give us the middle. One is really pretty, bright-eyed, plump, a light of foot, although she carries, besides her great bunch of prickly stuff, a bag slung between her shoulders in such a way as we bought from "Martha of Bethanias." She does not stoop under the load, but glances laughingly in at the window of the palankeen from the stony bank that backs her face to a level with mine, calling out something to which David replies good-naturedly.

What did she say to me?" I inquire in natural curiosity.

That you are blessed among women," is the translation given to me, but presently Massoud appears at my side, and Alcides supplies the rest of the young mother's salutation.

"She asked if you wouldn't get down and give her a ride. Human nature on one side of the world doesn't differ much from human nature on the other."

I comfort myself by the belief that the brown beauty's challenge was mere banter. The tone was too cheery and her smile too free for envy.

The route is all new to us, and after passing the fields outlying Jerusalem, we decide that we have seen no more desolate and brings her near enough for me to see her more plainly, I perceive that she wears a dark blue cotton tunic, reaching to her ankles, which, like Maud Muller's, are "bare and brown," as well as her feet. The tunic, or undress, has wide flowing sleeves; over it is a long sleeveless jacket of red woolen stuff; an embroidered and fringed veil, once white, now dirty, drapes her head, one end bound about her burden, which is composed of the refuse leaves of cabbage and cauliflower. Without casting a look at our party, she holds on her way, never quickening or slackening her fleet walk, down hills and across torrent-beds, springing from crag to crag like a chamois, until I see her near a gap in a ledge, hardly wide enough, apparently, to afford a foot-hold to a mountain goat. The shelf, or rock, follows the face of a bare granite shoulder of the mountain, towering above us until the whole valley is darkened by the shadow. We have never seen another woman walk so gracefully and fast, and call upon David to find out who she is and upon what errand she is bound.

The dragoman gallops forward and intercepts her where his practiced eye has seen hill, near the summit of which is a cluster of black tents, with moving figures about them.

"I hope she will not get a beating for her bad luck in not buying the cloth," says David, solicitously, and when we admire her strength and staying-power—"O, she is used to walking all day, and to fasting."

Wilder and gloomier grows the way, but now we are in a veritable road, winding up and along the heights, a low parapet of loosely-laid stones guarding it upon the other edge. The sun still sleeps upon the heads of the gray and reddish mountains, but in the depths of the defiles night is settling. This is the wilderness in which John the Baptist spent his novitiate; these are the deserts in which he "grew and waxed strong in spirit till the day of his showing unto Israel."

And the same John had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins, and his meat was locusts and wild honey."

The rude figure, thus portrayed, harmonizes perfectly with the naked gorges, where not a leaf of herbage or blade of grass clings to sides that are honeycombed with caves. These natural dens and grottoes were, before the forerunner of Our Lord sought their awful solitudes, the resort of fanatics and world-weary hermits. In the early ages of the Christian church, literally thousands of refugees from persecution, and men sickened out by the corruptions of society, fled to the "Wilderness of Judea," and dug cells in the cliffs in which to hide themselves for prayer and sacred meditation and fastings innumerable. About 460 A.D., the leading spirit of the strange colony, a Greek hermit by the name of Sabas, established at the head of the gorge the monastery that bears his name. In time, repeated attacks from predatory bands, and early in the seventh century, a terrible invasion of the Persians, in which 3,000 monks and anchorites are said to have been massacred, made it necessary to fortify the retreat and it became almost impregnable.

The sun is near the horizon as we gain a plateau behind the ancient edifice which hangs dizzily over the "Valley of Fire," four hundred feet below the foundations laid in the solid rock. We do not ask for admittance. By an inviolable law of the establishment no woman can pass the outermost gate, and while, in a detached tower, removed by some fifty feet from the forbidden precincts shelter and food would be given me upon application, I prefer the luxurious independence of our camp. Seated, as usual, in the tent door, we hearken to stories of the stringent austerities practised by the holy brotherhood. They eat no meat, and are allowed one egg apiece on Sunday; black bread, vegetables, a scanty allowance of fruit and sour wine forming their diet all the year around. There are seven services in the twenty-four hours, the first long before daylight, and, the vows once taken, the monks seldom quit the convent.

Yet, the loftiest mountain of the range separating them from the world of active labor, is believed to be the Hill of the Scapegoat, down which the hapless animal bearing upon his head the iniquities of the people, was thrown yearly by the hand of the "fit man" who had led him into the wilderness.

I think of the ceremony and its significance as, awakened in the dense darkness of a winter morning at four o'clock by the vibrant call of the bells to prayer, I put out my hand for the extra blanket laid across the foot of my bed, and nestling down in the warm comfortableness of my nest, picture the shivering monks kneeling for two long hours upon the stone floor, intoning prayers to Him who, like as a Father, pitieth His children and has given them all things richly to enjoy.

forbidding country. For awhile our course lies in the pebbly bed of the Brook Kidron, now as dry as dust, and glaringly white. Then we begin to climb by a narrow, twisting path, where the horses walk in single file; and the palankeen, scraping naked rocks upon one side, overlooks, upon the other, sheer precipices, from fifty to two hundred feet deep. Looking forward, I am often bewildered to guess where, amid the heaps of stones and the criss-crossing of projections that seem to close up the route, my faithful mules can make their way; but they do not slip once, even when their small, nimble hoofs displace loose pebbles and larger stones and send them clattering into lower ravines.

There is so little to amuse me, and we pass so few noted points ("places" there are none) that I fall to watching a woman with a mass of something green upon her head walking on the hillside in a straight line in the same direction with ourselves. As the route she holds, with something of the crow's instinct in determining the shortest distance between two given places, that she must keep our path for awhile, and we see them talking together for a hundred yards or so, the girl actually lessening her speed to keep back with Dervish's walk. Next, both have stopped to wait for Serkeese, who is trotting along in the gravelly "bottom," atop of hampers and luncheon-tent. When Palankeen and Massoud come up with them, the woman is still walking beside the mounted dragoman, devouring a loaf of bread drawn from Serkeese's stores, as incurious and impassive as ever. David falls back to my side and narrates.

The young woman went to Jerusalem this morning to buy some cloth in the name of her tribe, only to be refused credit by the merchant to whom she was sent. She had no money to buy food, and picked up the refuse greens in the market-place. Breakfastless and luncheonless, she set her face homeward, and has now walked more than fifteen miles since daybreak. While he speaks she looks back to wave her hand, and disappears around a hill. From the parting of our ways, we, by-and-by, see her swiftly climbing the long breast of the PROGRESS OF RELIGION.

THERE has never been a time that the religious tides have risen so high. Look out and see how all the agencies for good are multiplying the world over. The time was when the newspaper press gave but little recognition of any religious movement. Three or four lines of small type recorded a church dedication, or a pastoral installation. Now, all our great newspapers devote whole columns, and sometimes entire sides of their valuable space, to sermons and religious information. Editorial columns ably and reverentially discuss questions that once were left for the senior class of the theological seminary. Then the type of men and women is improving. The great stock-raisers of the country have been boasting a long while about the improvement of cattle and horses and sheep, but the mightiest improvement has been in the human race. There are more children who look as if they were not destined to an early heaven. Women, instead of cultivating languors and die-away expressions of countenance, go into gymnasiums, and walk out for regular constitutional, and make the care of their health a part of their religion. And there are more men who look as if they had come into the world to accomplish something worth accomplishing. Scoundrels enough, and homunculi here and there, but they are in the minority. Ignorance is becoming a curiosity. Great churches on all sides, and with a ministry far in advance of all other ages for talent and consecration. Prayer meeting red-hot in place of the old-style religious frigidities. Have faith in God, and go up and take the world for righteousness. It will have to surrender to the truth, and you and I can help hasten on the consummation.

Meanwhile, have you not noticed how that old book, the Bible, is gaining ground? Books never laugh. If they did, the Bible would laugh at its assailants. There were more Bibles printed and boxed and sent out on freight trains and steamships yesterday than copies of any other book. On what do they swear witnesses in our court rooms to-day?—the Bible. On what has every President of the United States, and every Judge of the Supreme Court put his hand when about to be sworn in?—the Bible. In other words, in this country the Bible is higher than President or Supreme Court. And the book is going to keep right on, until the fires of the last day are kindled. Some of those fires will begin on one side, and some on the other side of the old book. They will not find a bundle of loose manuscripts easily consumed, like tinder thrown into the fire. When the fires of the last day are kindled, some will burn on this side—from Genesis toward Revelation—and others will burn on the other side,—from Revelation to Genesis—and in all their way, they will not find a single chapter, or a single verse, out of place. That will be the first time we can afford to do without the Bible. What would be the use of the book of Genesis, descriptive of how the world was made, when the world is destroyed? What would be the use of the prophecies when they are all fulfilled? What would be the use of the Evangelistic, or Pauline, description of Jesus Christ when we see him face to face?

CONSECRATED RICHES.

WHAT a scroll of consecrated rich men we have had in this land! James Lenox, William E. Dodge, Peter Cooper, Abbott Lawrence, Moses H. Grinnell, George Peabody, of the past, and many of to-day whose names I will not mention. The former went out of palaces on earth into palaces of heaven. No one begrudged them their wealth, for they got it honestly and employed it generally. They lived not for themselves. The most of them, starting in poverty, never forgot the rock from which they were hewn, and, having found life a great battle for themselves, were in ardent sympathy with those who were in any kind of struggle. The more such rich men we have in this land the better. Look at the long list of asylums and institutions of mercy built by their consecrated wealth.

Would God a revival of charity might come to the hearts of men of large means, and that some of the wealth they are piling up to spoil their children with might be given to the cause of humanity, and that this wealth laid up in bonds, and stocks, and real estate might really tell how much God had permitted them to give for the relief of the world's suffering and ignorance. But, whether we have faculty to work on a large scale or are limited in resource, let us all do what we can, remembering that our time for work is being abbreviated, and that even a cup of cold water given in the name of a disciple, shall come to divine and heavenly celebration. Blessed are all those whose life is a holy industry. Blessed are they who die in the Lord: they rest from their labors and their works do follow them. Let us remember that a vast amount of work in the church is being done by men of small means. Let us go forth, each one doing his own work for God, remembering that, even though the world despises us, God knows the work we do. All who toil in Sunday Schools or other divine institutions remember that God will be the everlasting reward of your immortal spirits. You will receive the crown of eternal life that never fades away.

SUCCESSFUL CANDIDATES.

LET us wish for the successful candidates the happiest possible administration, and through them the temporal and moral advantage of all the people. The ballot-box under God in this country is to right all political wrongs, and is to be the basis of all political upbuilding. Nothing is more complimentary to our American institutions than the calm after the elections. "It is unsafe to give the free ballot to the masses of the people," said foreign despots and monarchists. "Republicanism is mobocracy; your ship of State will be wrecked on the ballot-box; you are a bubble-bursting nationality," said Lord John Russell. Indeed, before the election, it sometimes seems that anarchy is about to take possession of the people. How Republicans glare upon Democrats, and Democrats glare upon Republicans, and the atmosphere is hot with political imprecation; but by the time the people have read the Wednesday newspapers their pulse has begun to slacken. The political clubs are disbanded, and a few men left to pay the large expenses. The stump orators go home and eat troches for a sore throat. The victors for a little while feel jubilant, and the minority are somewhat depressed; but in a little while all is placid as though nothing of importance had happened. That is the grandest possible eulogy of American institutions. So we have again illustrated that republicanism is not mobocracy, and if this is a bubble-bursting nationality, it takes a great while to burst.

Starting out for the great future, let our two national characteristics be the intelligence and the virtue of the people. They who sit in the councils of city and State and nation are God's representatives in the government of the world. In the bearing of such a stupendous weight of responsibility, let all our rulers ask help of God. They will be assailed by hundreds of people wanting office. Be merciful in this direction. If you fail in securing what you ought to have, do not fail to maligning the character of the officials who deny you. The vast majority of political howling is from men who fail to secure office, or, having obtained it for a little while, were rotated out of it. There are in every city to-day a thousand men who are anxious to sacrifice themselves for the public good in some office. You may have fitness for the position, but remember that inevitably and always the vast majority of applicants must be disappointed.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

MANY letters have been received from different parts of Kansas, Nebraska and Texas, stating that widespread suffering exists in the agricultural districts of those States, owing to the almost total failure of crops during the last two seasons. Our friends in these States are requested to forward to THE MAIL-BAG, the name of one reliable person in each of the afflicted districts, who will consent to act as the distributor of any clothing, or supplies that may be sent to him for that purpose by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. All who wish to help in making up boxes for these sufferers should send us their names at once.

L. S. Fahnestock McPherson, Kans. Can you give me any reference to an author that will throw light on Jewish costumes in Palestine?

Simpson's "Ancient and Modern Costumes" will probably supply the information needed. Write to Scribner's, publishers, New York

Frances, Brooklyn, N. Y. What is the true meaning of "Calvary" and "Golgotha"?

"Calvary" is derived from the Latin word "Calvaria," meaning a "bare skull." It is not a proper name, but arises from the translators having adopted literally the Latin word which is the equivalent of the Greek term "Golgotha" and of the ancient Aramaic "Gulgulta" and the Syriac "Gogulta." "Golgotha" is interpreted "the place of a skull."

J. D. Kapp, Dysart, Pa. Where was Daniel when the three Jews were thrown into the fiery furnace (Daniel 3: 12-21)?

The question has often been asked, but no authoritative answer can be given as the Bible is silent. It may be that he was in some distant province of the kingdom. Nebuchadnezzar would know enough of Daniel's character to be aware that he would not bow to the image and as he valued his services may have purposely dispatched him to a remote part of the kingdom to avoid the risk of such a conflict as ensued with the other three Jews.

Mrs. E. Dawson, Reading, Pa. From what nation and country did the Queen of Sheba come to visit Solomon?

It is supposed by the ablest authorities that she came from Yemen, in Arabia Felix. In Matt. 12: 42 she is referred to as the "Queen of the South," who came from "the uttermost parts of the earth," a term applied by the ancients to southern Arabia. Not improbably she was a lineal descendant of Abraham by Keturah, whose grandson, Sheba, peopled that part of the then known world. The Arabic account of this queen gives her the name of Bilkis or Yelkamah, a monarch of the Himyarites; but their account is probably more legendary than accurate as to detail.

L. E. R., Charleston, W. Va. Who are the witnesses who according to Paul (Heb. 12: 1) surround the believer?

Probably the worthies referred to in the previous chapter, whose triumph through faith are recalled. The word witnesses has two meanings and it is not certain which of the two the writer of the epistle had in his mind. A witness may be a spectator, or he may be one who testifies as in a court of justice. If the word in this passage is used in the former sense, it implies that departed and glorified saints are observing the trials and victories of the Christian on earth. If the word refers to a testifier, it means that the Christian has good reason for making the effort mentioned in the passage, because of the testimony of the Old Testament saints cited in the previous chapter.

K. W. W., Weehawken, N. J. 1. If a friend does not believe the Bible is best to try to convince him by argument? 2. Is it right for two persons who love each other to marry if one believes the Bible and loves Jesus and the other does not?

1. Certainly argument may be used; we are told to be ready to "give an answer for the hope that is in us." It is seldom, however, that such persons are convinced by argument. We would advise you to pray for him that his may be opened to the truth. 2. There will be great risk of disagreement and unhappiness. The life of the Christian would probably be bittered by hearing and seeing much that would be painful and shocking. Read the opinion of the Apostle Paul on the subject (II. Cor. 6: 14, 15). It contains a warning which would be unwise to ignore.

Dr. W. J. Hall, American Missionary in Korea, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD enclosing a letter from Mr. H. N. Allen, U. S. Consul, Seoul, Korea, dated Sept. 26, which says:

There is no famine in Korea. The crops are usually good this year. The people have worried much less by the war than any of us supposed would be the case, and the prospects for winter are very good, considering the fact that the country is occupied by foreign troops. A considerable number of petty officers have been thrown out of employment by the recent changes in the government, but all the people who wish to work can find more work at better rates than ever before. It is unfortunate that the report of this fact should get out when none exists.

This is in further corroboration of the already published dispatch of U. S. Minister S. W. Henshaw, whose assurance that there was no famine was decided to take no action toward raising a Korean Relief Fund, although such a fund had been advised by the Korean Minister in Washington.

Mrs. G. Leonard, Danville, Ill. Some time ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stated that there was a circle to which one could send a petition. I tell me how to address the Circle?

Send your request to the Fulton Street Meeting, 113 Fulton Street, New York

D. U. W., New Bedford, Mass. I earnestly tried to find Christ during a recent religious revival; I was not converted. Do you not think it may have been because I do not sufficiently rely on my guilt to plead my case with that earnest which God is ready to honor?

We do not think the reason you suggest is the true one. There must be some other. The thing is so simple. If you wish to be saved and are willing to trust in Christ to save you, accepting him as your King whom you pledge yourself to obey, looking to him for grace to cleanse your heart and life, then nothing that need hold you back. Crying and groaning do not give you any merit in God's sight. As you seek more and more earnestly to follow Christ, you will probably feel a need more deeply your guilt, because you will see that to be guilty and yet not troubled about it would make the matter worse. However, it does not affect your salvation. You will be saved, if saved at all, because Christ died for you.

Subscriber, Alderson, W. Va. 1. How must I proceed to become a member of the Presbyterian Church? 2. Can one be saved who has been baptized? 3. Can one be a Christian yet not a member of any church?

1. Make your wish known either to the pastor, or one of the elders and you will be instructed. 2. Yes; but as it is one of the proved ordinances of the Church, it is the duty of all Christians to conform to it, unless prevented by circumstances they cannot conform to. 3. It is quite possible, and there are, no doubt, many Christians outside the Church, but where they are not so situated as to avail themselves of the means of public worship. No Christian is performing his or her whole duty who ignores Church privileges and the assembling of God's people (see Hebrews 10: 25). Church membership is an open, public profession before man of our allegiance to Christ and we ought to value very highly the opportunity it affords us of mingling with the people in his sanctuary, and joining our prayers and voices with theirs in prayer and praise.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

PEKIN IN PERIL.

CHINA'S helplessness is now apparent to herself as it is to the world. Her army appears to be utterly demoralized. Recent dispatches describe whole brigades as throwing down their arms and taking flight on the approach of the Japanese. As is now reported, Port Arthur has fallen into Japanese hands, there is no serious stand in the way to Pekin, which may be reached in sixty days. Port Arthur is one of the most strongly fortified positions in China, its batteries having been planned by German engineers and equipped with modern ordnance. With that port as a base for supplies, the Japanese forces may overrun all China. The fact is understood that the Chinese Emperor and his court are hurriedly preparing to quit Pekin for some more inaccessible city in the interior. Five centuries ago, when Pekin was made the capital, the Chinese Emperor might have felt safe there. It is surrounded by a huge wall, which is in some parts fifty-five feet high and forty-seven feet thick at the top. Square towers have been built at intervals of sixty yards, which are loopholed for convenience of defence. Modern artillery, however, would speedily make breach in such a barrier. The Japanese appear to be to march directly on the city, and there to dictate terms of peace. China has endeavored to avert the catastrophe by invoking the mediation of European powers. Hitherto no success has attended the effort. England has made no futile attempts to enlist the co-operation of other governments, but finds them disposed to interfere, and she is too wary to proceed alone. Japan has made it clear and understood that she will listen to no proposals unless they are made directly by China. It is evidently her intention to force her huge enemy the humiliation of suing for peace. She makes no secret of her intentions. She does not desire to possess any part of China, but will insist on the dependence of Korea and the payment of war indemnity. It would appear that the Chinese Emperor concedes these terms the better it will be for her. It is gratifying to learn on the authority of Yang Kiung Yen, a Christian Chinese clergyman now visiting America that the probable result of the disastrous war will be the opening of China to Christian influence. He expresses his conviction that his countrymen will learn from the war that Japan has succeeded because she opened her doors to Western civilization, and that if China is to make progress, she must do likewise. If she does not reach that conclusion, there will be a vast opportunity for missionary effort, and China may yet regard her disasters as a blessing in disguise, and say, as many an individual has had to say, "It was good for me that I was afflicted, that I might learn of his statutes." (Ps. 119:71).

Peddler's Blunder.

The annoyance of a family in Lewiston, Me., over a peddler's officious interference with a treasured relic is described by the Lewiston Journal. It states that a peddler who was going from house to house selling a patent soap, the cleansing properties of which, according to his account, were of a phenomenal order, called on a well-known family which traces its ancestry beyond the Revolution to William the Conqueror's time. The peddler introduced his article and was allowed to stand in the hall while the servant carried a sample to a lady of the house. A peculiar old coat of a light color was hanging there and he noticed that it was disfigured by a stain. Linking to please the lady and prove the power of his soap he removed the stain. According to the result of his work, when he came with the servant a few minutes later, he said, "You can see for yourself, madam, that this soap will remove stains of all kinds." The lady was horror-stricken. The coat was the doublet worn by a famous ancestor who died in one of the battles of the Revolution, and the stain upon it was the blood he had shed in defence of his country. It hung with a tattered flag and his sword among other grim curios in the hall and had been handed down from generation to generation. The peddler's mistake was natural to an ignorant, sordid man. He could not conceive of a garment having any value except as a coat for ordinary wear, and as it could not be put to that use with the stain upon it, he regarded it as spoiled. The world often makes a similar mistake. It regards the man who has been converted, by the application of the blood of Christ to his soul, as spoiled: having no idea that there can be any higher use for a life than to spend it in worldly business or pleasure. (1. Peter 1: 19.)

A Bed on a Boundary.

A hotly contested dispute for the possession of a citizen has been waged between two townships in Massachusetts. The man's house was so situated, that there was a difference of opinion as to which town it was for if any part of the body may be considered the man himself, it must surely be the thinking part. But it would be a sad thing for us if the brain, or any part of the body, were the real man. The Christian rejoices in the confidence of the ancient patriarch: "I know that although after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet without my flesh I shall see God." (Job 19: 26.)

Pardon from a Dream.

In the course of some reminiscences of an ex-warden of a jail in Indiana a characteristic incident of a former governor of that State was related. The governor, while on a visit to the jail, noticed among the prisoners a young man with an open, honest face. He asked the warden what his offence was, and was informed that he was sent up for murder and had still sixteen years to serve. Nothing more was said at the time, but about three months later the prisoner received a visit from the governor and after a long interview was granted a pardon. As the prisoner had no influential friends and as no petition for a pardon had been sent to the executive mansion, some surprise was expressed. To the warden the governor told the story. He said that on the night of his first visit the face of the man he had noticed came before him in a dream. It wore the aspect of pathetic entreaty. In the morning the dream haunted the governor and he ations a landmark in the neighborhood. In splitting up the great logs which the tree made he found in the butt log, five feet from the lower end, and near the heart of the tree, a lock of soft, dark-brown hair a foot long. One end of the lock was in a hole three and a half inches deep, into which it was fastened by an oak pin, which had been driven into the hole. Ninety successive rings, or layers, of wood in the tree had grown over the hair and the pin, showing that they had been driven into the tree ninety years ago, when the maple was less than a foot in girth. The lock of hair is as glossy and with as much apparent vitality as if it had just been severed from the head that bore it. Several theories, more or less romantic, have been suggested to account for its presence, but the one most likely to be true is that it was the result of superstition. The old pioneers had a theory that certain maladies might be cured if the sufferer stood near a tree, and a lock of his or her hair was driven into it with a plug and then cut off, the sufferer then to walk away to the eastward, and never look at the hair again. Probably the lock found in the old maple was a relic of such an experiment. In these more enlightened days, we know that disease yields only to remedies applied to the seat of it. But even now the lesson has not been learned as to moral and spiritual maladies. Many people still think that by church membership or by some rite or ceremony they may get salvation, in spite of Christ's assurance that only by the new birth can any one be made whole. (Matt. 13: 19, 20.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Thirteen English Ladies have Volunteered to proceed to India in connection with the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission. There are in India 14,000,000 of their own sex, to whom it would be impossible to bring medical aid apart from this Mission.

The American Baptist Home Missionary Society reports that receipts from the churches have fallen off, and that but for legacies the society would be very seriously hampered; as it is, the debt has increased to the sum of $128,000.

The next National Council of the Congregational Churches will be held at Syracuse, N. Y., October 9th to 14th, 1895. It had been expected that San Francisco would be selected, but arrangements for railway fares were not satisfactory, and, as Syracuse renewed her invitation, it was accepted.

The Ladies' Christian Union resumed their Devotional Meetings on Wednesday, Nov. 7, in the Chapel of the Broadway Tabernacle, corner Broadway and Thirtieth Street, New York, and these meetings will be held through the winter every Wednesday morning at eleven o'clock. A cordial invitation is given to all Christian women.

Dr. Loomis, who is now laboring in Yokohama, Japan, reports that there is reason to believe that American and British residents of Japan will be relieved in the course of a few days of all restrictions as to travel, which have so long existed. The missionaries will then be free to visit anywhere.

Rev. Leonard Weaver has been holding evangelistic services at Martinsburg, W. Va. The "World" of that city says: "Seldom or never has the city been stirred to its depths as it has been during these meetings." Three times a day the largest church in the city was crowded, and large numbers of persons made profession of conversion.

News of an Encouraging Revival Work comes from South Dakota. Messrs. Thompson and Gamble are going from town to town, preaching and singing the Gospel with signal success. At Huron and at Armour, movements were started which the pastors of the churches are continuing, and societies have been formed to encourage the converts.

Signors Vamier and Scuden who are laboring to evangelize the Island of Sicily write that, finding that they were unable to reach the great mass of the people through preaching in the churches, they decided to follow Christ's example of conversing with the people in the streets and in their homes. The result has been a large number of conversions.

A Native Chief of Kusae, Moronesia was invited to drink by the drunken captain of a trading vessel. He refused, and the Captain, in his fury, called two sailors, and told the chief that if he did not drink the sailors should throw him overboard. "Very good," said the chief, "the water will not hurt me, as I can swim—but the rum will."

The Seventieth Annual Report of the New York Bible Society has been issued. It appears that during the past year it has distributed among the churches Sunday Schools and missions 10,439 Bibles, and 14,175 Testaments and portions of the Bible. It also distributed 37,700 Bibles, Testaments andospels in twenty-one languages among sailors and immigrants.

A Movement for Sunday Closing of Stores has been started in Venice. It has the sympathy of the workmen and one or two newspapers. The leader of the movement was Vittorio Ravagnan, the head salesman in a large shoe-store. His employer required him either to abandon the movement or to give up his situation. He chose the latter. Some wealthy persons who admired his conduct have now set him up in business and he is doing a large trade.

Our Subscribers, who some months ago, contributed money to aid Madam Tel Seno to establish a Christian school for girls in Japan, will be pleased to learn that the school has been opened under most auspicious circumstances. In a Japanese journal, which Rev. Satori Kato has just received, is a report of the opening exercises. Rev. S. Wada, a native Presbyterian minister, offered prayer and other ministers addressed the audience. One of the ladies present was Viscountess Huzikata, whose husband is minister of the Imperial household. Many other distinguished ladies came and showed a deep interest in the movement. Thirty-six girls were enrolled as pupils.

UNDER THE WALLS OF PEKIN.

in and incidentally which town was entitled to receive his taxes. He had regularly paid taxes to the town in which he considered that his house stood, and when the other town made a claim, he naturally objected to pay a second time and asked that the authorities of the two towns settle the dispute themselves and he would pay the proper recipients when they should decide the matter. Surveyors were called in who, after careful measurement, found that the boundary line ran through the house. The next question raised was in which part of the house the man slept, as that would determine his residence. But he occupied a central room and the bed crossed the boundary line. It was, however, triumphantly pointed out by the surveyor representing the town which had already received the taxes, that the head of the bed was in that township and the citizen must be considered as sleeping there, although his feet were in the other town. After a long argument, the surveyor's ruling was adopted. The decision was logical from the legal standpoint, set one of his secretaries to make a private investigation of the case. He found that the crime had been committed under extreme provocation and that if the prisoner had been possessed of funds to hire an able lawyer and secure witnesses he would have escaped with a light punishment. The governor then interviewed the prisoner, and finding him contrite, pardoned him. "But he has no friends," said the warden. "No," said the governor, "it was that fact that seemed to give him a claim on me." It was so that the way to pardon was opened to the human race. The prophet represents God as surveying the lost condition of men and "wondering that there was no intercessor, therefore his own arm brought salvation" (Isa. 59: 16) by sending Christ the Friend of the friendless. (Matt. 11: 19.)

Hair in the Heart of a Tree.

A strange discovery was made by a farmer at Pike, N. Y., a few days ago. He cut down a large maple tree which grew opposite his house, and has been for gener-

SEEKING AND RECEIVING.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Robert Stuart MacArthur. Text: Matt 6: 33: "But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you."

HIS text is a part of the Sermon on the Mount. That sermon is one of the most solemn and instructive portions of the Bible. It lifts Jesus Christ above all other teachers of the world; it alone furnishes a strong argument for his divinity. If we deny his divinity, it will be impossible to explain his wisdom as a teacher, as seen in this wonderful discourse. The Christ of the cross does not appear very conspicuously here; but the Christ of the throne here reigns gloriously. He lays down the laws of his new kingdom; he places before us the exalted standard of ideal perfection which that kingdom demands. This discourse is, as I understand it, an exhortation to repentance. It is, in this respect, like the instruction which Christ gave the lawyer who stood up tempting him and asking: "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Before him Jesus lifted the standard of the ideal life and character. The design of the sermon is to lead all men to cry out with the disciples when in the storm on the Galilean Sea: "Lord, save us; we perish!" Every honest man who reads this discourse must feel that without divine help he can never attain to the

Perfection of Conduct

and character Jesus here enjoined. Men often say that they do not want doctrinal preaching; that they want the religion of the Sermon on the Mount. It must be said that these men do not know whereof they speak. The Sermon on the Mount does not lower the standard of life and duty—it exalts it. The thoughtful moralist who said, "God save me at the day of judgment from the Sermon on the Mount," better understood its high, broad, and deep spiritual teaching. This sermon is really designed to lead every reader to say, with the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

In studying this text let us notice, in the first place, what we are to seek—"the kingdom of God and his righteousness." In previous verses Christ prohibited in various ways the undue seeking after the things of the world. He earnestly rebukes all undue solicitude about the things of this life. But thus far his instructions on this point have been negative; now, however, he advances a step. These worldly objects are not to be avoided by a mere negation; for by simply attempting to abstain from unnecessary anxiety and unbelief no one will be likely to succeed. The best way to correct the evil rebuked is to seek to do the good here suggested. The best way to get rid of undue care about unnecessary things is to have a due care about necessary things. The best way to drive out darkness is to let in the light; the best way to keep evil out of the heart is to fill it with good.

Right Seeking

is the true remedy against false seeking. Christ was a wise teacher. He recognized the fundamental laws of moral and mental action. He needed not that anyone should tell him, for he knew what was in man. This is the principle which Dr. Chalmers emphasized when he talked of "the expulsive power of a new affection." If we subordinate the affairs of this life to the concerns of the other life, both lives will be brought into their proper relations, and both then will be taken at their true value. It will also be observed that the subordination of this life to the other does not exclude a proper consideration of the affairs of this life; on the contrary, it includes and emphasizes their right consideration and secures their fullest performance. Such subordination is true wisdom; but its absence brings chaos and ends in eternal loss.

We understand by "the Kingdom of God and his righteousness" the seeking and observing of the principles of that kingdom which Christ was about to set up. Righteousness here is not to be taken in the technical and theological sense of the imputed righteousness of Christ—at least, not primarily; it is, rather, seeking to do God's will, to observe what he esteems right. It is a constant subjection of our will to God's; a performance of right things in a right spirit. Seeking in this way to promote God's kingdom would at the same time most effectually promote spiritual and eternal, temporal and secular. So far as the disciples were concerned, Christ would say: "You are pupils in my school; continue to live for me; make my will the law of your life." So far as others in his audience were concerned, Christ here says: "Enter on my service; enlist under my banner; this is the great concern; this is the one thing needful; seek the purity of heart and the holiness of life which God requires and which you must possess in order to become the subjects of my kingdom." In a word, by the kingdom of God and his righteousness, I understand Christ to say to us, "Accept salvation through me; submit to my claims; give me the homage of your hearts." This is the demand which Christ makes of us to-day in this Scripture.

Notice again that this great good is to be sought—"seek ye first," etc. The word translated "seek" is a strong one; it means seek earnestly, intensely, again and again; it includes the idea of eagerness, solicitude, importunity. So elsewhere Christ tells us to strive, to agonize, as did the wrestler or the racer, to enter in at the strait gate. The gate is strait, and so difficult to enter; the way is narrow, and so difficult to continue therein. To be lost needs no searching for the way, for all are in it already. To go with the current is easy; to oppose it is difficult. Men who float with the tide have no proper conception of its force. A dead fish can float, but it takes a live one to go up stream.

This law of seeking in order to finding is in harmony with the rule of life in every department of effort. If a man wants money, he must seek it; if he wants learning, he must pay its price in hard study. Ignorance he may have without effort. To raise thistles, a man need not prepare the ground nor sow the seed; to raise wheat, he must do both. Toil is evermore the standard of value.

Cost and Worth

are close neighbors. Only by the rugged path of toil do men reach the heights of great attainments; only by paying the price of heroic effort do they write their names high in the temple of Fame. We are all familiar with the answer of Euclid to King Ptolemy Lagus when he asked, "Is there not a shorter and easier way to the study of geometry than that which you have laid down in your Elements?" His reply was: "There is no royal road to geometry." There is no road to heaven but that of sacrifice, that of cross-bearing; and we must go in this narrow way or not at all. But it is also a way of joy, a path of pleasantness and peace. You must not expect to become a Christian by accident. That blessed experience must be the result of deliberate determination, of intelligent seeking, and of faithful enduring. This truth is earnestly affirmed in many parts of Christ's teaching. Christ's honesty is everywhere conspicuous. He clearly lays down the conditions of discipleship; we must take up the cross and follow him.

We next learn in the text the order of our seeking: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." Here is declared the right order in which our seeking of earthly and heavenly things is to take place. The care of the soul is to take precedence of all other care; and the affairs of this life are thus to be made secondary to those of the life to come. Just here many make their fatal mistake. They give earthly things the first place in their thought; they set God and his claims aside entirely, or give them a subordinate place. They desire the advantages of religion, but they are unwilling to perform its duties. Like the rich young man, they wish to inherit eternal life, but they are not willing to take up their cross and follow their Lord. When the claims of religion are pressed upon them, like Felix, they say: "Go thy way for this time." Now, if religion be not worth everything, it is worth nothing. Look the matter squarely in the face; decide it like honorable men. If are just, they are supreme. Give him the first place in your heart. Dethrone every idol; enthroned the Lord Jesus. Let us stop shilly-shallying. Let us not be like the heathen colonists whom "the king of Assyria brought from Babylon, and from Cuthan, and from Avah, and from Hamath," and placed in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel. It is said of them, "They feared the Lord and served their own gods." This description is unfortunately true of too many who call themselves Christians. Oh, for a holy enthusiasm in Christ's cause! It is said that the artist Correggio, when young, saw with rapturous joy a painting by Raphael—it was probably that of St. Cecilia at Bologna—upon which he gazed in transports of delight. His soul drank in its beauty as flowers drink moisture from the dew. Artistic ambition was enkindled within him; the blood rushed to his brow, and the fire of genius flashed from his eyes as he cried out: "I, too, am a painter!" That conviction upheld him in his dark hours; it blended with his colors; it guided his pencil; it glowed on his canvas. His art was first in his thought and attainment. Success crowned his untiring zeal and his heroic toils. Titian, on witnessing his production, exclaimed: "Were I not Titian, I would wish to be Correggio."

Enthusiasm.

The word enthusiasm comes from a Greek word which means to be inspired or possessed of God. If Christ be in the soul a holy enthusiasm must mark our lives. If the love of Christ constrain us, we cannot but speak of what we have seen and felt of that mighty love. Away with lukewarmness! A half-way Christian is an object of contempt to devils and of pity to angels! Let us put God first. Around him let the affairs of this life revolve as do planets about the sun. Other things are to be sought in their proper time and place, but God first. He cannot, he will not share his glory with any. The first commandment thunders in our ears. "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." We may have other objects of love, but not before God; if we do, we are idolaters. The man who puts this world first is like the man who gathers pebbles while pearls lie unnoticed at his feet. Money, learning, position, power—these in their appropriate place and measure are right, these are to be sought. But each in its own order.

We are to seek God first in time. Let youth be consecrated to his service; let its first love be his; let it in its sweetness and freshness be laid on his altar. Seek God first in affection. I say, be a Christian to-day in every drop of your blood, in every thought of your heart, and in every act of life. Despise yourself that you have so long been double-minded and unstable. Break with the world;

Cleave Unto God.

To every temptation of sin and Satan give a ringing NO! Those are stirring words of Lord Macaulay, uttered during the agitation of a turbulent political contest at Leeds. He was anxious, of course, to secure the votes of the electors, but he would not stoop to play a double part. To the electors he plainly declared his opinions, but he would give no pledges. He thought it as improper that an Englishman should be courted and fawned upon in his capacity of elector as in his capacity of jurymen. Much as he might want their votes, he far more highly valued their esteem; and he concludes with this sentence: "It is necessary to my happiness that I should sit in Parliament, but is necessary to happiness that I should possess, in Parliament or out of Parliament, the consciousness of having done what is right."

Notice the reward which Christ gives those who seek aright: "And all the things shall be added unto you." Seeking God first you shall have the kingdom, and over and above you shall have all other necessary things.

A Great Problem

confronts every man; How shall I have both worlds? Christ here gives us the solution: Seek first the kingdom of God. Having done that, over and above you shall have food and raiment. Great wealth is not promised, but necessary things. If a man seeks God, he can then cast all care on him, leaving the bestowment or denial of worldly things to the allotment of his wisdom and love. An old writer illustrating this thought, says: "He who buys goods has paper and pack-thru given him into the bargain." Solon asked for wisdom, and God, pleased with his choice, said: "And I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, riches and honor; so that there shall not any among the kings like unto thee all days." Paul, in writing to Timothy, said: "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." What a blessing change would be wrought in the world if this truth were grounded in our hearts as illustrated in our lives!

It was a common saying among the Jews: "seek that to which other things are added;" and this truth was illustrated in the way: A king said to his particular friend: "Ask what thou wilt and I shall give thee." He thought within himself, if I were to be made a general, I shall get my quest; but I will ask something to which many and better things are added. Therefore said, "Give me thy daughter in law." This he did, knowing that all dignities of the kingdom would be added to his request. This was

A Wise Man.

They who think to serve God and mammon must fail utterly. It is impossible to use these two forms of service. God first; that is Christ's law. God's kingdom stands. They who live for Christ, live for the eternities. Their life takes hold of that which the veil. Not one jot or one tittle of Christ's promise shall fail. The audience that listened to this immortal discourse is going kingdoms have risen and fallen, Christ's words stand. It is eternally true that they that seek God first shall have mastery over both worlds.

Prepare in the heart, in the home, and the entire life the first place for royal mastery. Make room to-day for Jesus. Tear out every idol. His place is on the throne Room to-day for Jesus! At the heavenly door he knocks for admission. Ring the door. Draw back the bolt. Give Jesus welcome. He will be thy guest, and then he will graciously become thy royal host. All fulness dwells in Christ. To the sick he is a physician; to the hungry, bread; to the thirsty, water. In darkness, he is a sun; in beauty, he is a shade. Stars and pearls, rocks and hills are drawn upon to describe his glory. Earth and air, sea and sky bring their choicest treasures and lay them at his feet. Matchless Lily, O Fragrant Rose, O Clustering Vine, O Ineffable Christ, come! claim us to-day as thine own!

If Christ were the preacher to-day, in the pulpit the mount, and you his audience, of the fullness of his divine mind and tenderness of his loving heart, he would say: "But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all the things shall be added unto you." O help us all to do so here and now for our name's sake. Amen.

WISDOM IN OPERATION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Dec. 2. James 3: 13-18.

LUTHER used to say that the Epistle of James was "a right strawy work," and many since Luther's day have been of the same opinion. But if it were really of straw it would have been burned before this. There are so many expressions in it that are repugnant to the spirit of the times, that if it had been possible to eliminate it from the New Testament, it would have been done. The passage selected for the topic is one of them. James says there are two kinds of wisdom and they come from different sources and have different results. One of them shows itself in envying other people, and leads to strife, confusion and every evil work. This he brands as spurious wisdom—earthly, sensual and devilish. Whatever opinion the world may have of it, and however highly it may be applauded, James says it does not come from above, but has quite a different origin. It is easy, he avers, to recognize the true wisdom, that which does come from heaven. It is pure, gentle, peaceable, easy to be intreated, full of mercy, without partiality and without hypocrisy. Briefly, if any man claims to have wisdom, James advises that his claim be not admitted unless he shows it by a good life (R.V.). There is a common opinion that this is asking too much. If a man be orthodox, if he be eloquent, if he be regular at church, if his voice be loud at the prayer-meeting, if his testimony be clear and forcible, if he give liberally to religious and philanthropic enterprises—if he does all these things, is not that enough? James thinks not. He looks at the heart. For once he agrees with Paul, who declared that though a man had all gifts and all knowledge and all faith, and though he gave his body to be burned, if he had not love, he was nothing. So when James sees envy and bitterness in the heart, he concludes that true wisdom is absent. The genuine wisdom, then, is a practical thing, affecting conduct. Our modern educators, abetted by worldly parents, seem to have overlooked this inspired writer's idea of wisdom. One of the first things implanted in a child's mind is the desire to get ahead of others. He is encouraged to compete, and his childlike achievements are estimated by the failure of his competitors. He is applauded for standing up for his rights, and for being quick to seize an advantage. So the seed of self-seeking is sown early, which produces "envy and strife and every vile deed." Yet what a glorious, delightful world this would be if that other kind of wisdom were prevalent! How it would transform life, taking from it its bitterness, and filling it with love!

A SPLENDID GIFT.

On this page is a picture of the handsome building presented by Mr. Jones Ordway to the Young Men's Christian Association of Glens Falls, N. Y. It cost with the lot on which it stands $58,000 and is in all respects a building suited to the purpose for which it is to be used. The first floor is for the present rented to a business firm, space being reserved for an imposing entrance to the Association's quarters. On the second floor is the Auditorium, the Reading Room, Reception Room, Ladies' Parlor and the Directors' Offices. On the third floor are the large baths, the rooms of the Boys' Auxiliary, and a room for the use of amateur photographers. On the fourth floor is the Gymnasium sixty by sixty-one feet in area. The Association which is now so handsomely housed has 335 members which is a large number for a town of only eleven thousand inhabitants. It was organized about seven years ago and has reason to congratulate itself that after so short a time it has attained the dignity of owning its own home with all the prestige that gives. It has a small, well-selected library and four technical classes which are well attended. The record shows that the religious part of the work is not neglected. Over one hundred distinctively religious meetings are held during the year with conspicuous success. Mr. Ordway did a good deed in thus caring for the best interests of the young men of the town, who doubtless will know how to appreciate his munificence and turn it to account.

THE MISSIONARY EXTENSION COURSE

From a letter just received from Mr. J. Willis Baer, General Secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, we learn that a change has been made in the management of the Missionary Extension Course. The Board of Control which has hitherto had charge of it with offices in Chicago has asked the United Society to accept the transfer of the work and it has consented. The United Society, however, and profiting the audiences; and, further, they agree to place each speaker in the town at a maximum cost of five dollars a night (and his entertainment), this sum to be shared equally by all the co-operating societies.

This sum will pay the traveling expenses of the speaker, and will cover all expenses of the course, except such as the local societies may wish to spend for advertising or other preparations. The speakers' services are gratuitous, as they receive no fee from any source, and are paid only their actual expenses in reaching their appointments. The five-dollar payment is to be made not to the speakers, but to the State committee, by whom it is disbursed.

These payments comprise all the moneys handled by the committee. They do not receive nor transmit any contributions for the carrying on of missionary work in any place. All such gifts must go through the customary channels of the several denominational missionary boards. The sole object and purpose of this course of lectures so conducted is not to collect money for missions, but to arouse and develop an intelligent and practical missionary enthusiasm among the public.

THE TRAVELER'S AID.

The Young Women's Christian Association of Kansas City, Mo., has found a sphere of usefulness which is worthy of imitation in every large city. It might be possible for the Christian Endeavor and other kindred societies to unite in such work in some cases where the Y. W. C. A. is from any cause unable to undertake it. Mrs.

that a "cup of cold water" cannot be given "in His name."

Through this channel of work, many young girls, attracted to the city to find employment, and in hope of solving the problem of life more successfully than in their own town, without knowledge of the temptations that constantly surrounds her, of the dangers of falling into "evil hands" and being led to a life of sin and shame, rescued by the Young Women's Christian Association agent.

Pages could be filled with cases of young girls have been secured and returned to home and friends; others, with tears of confusion of face, have come to the matron for protection, and here is ground already for the sowing of "Gospel seed." Such need not the "advice of police," or "deed of officials," but of one who can be a mother to guide and direct them to a better life.

Truly, this is a noble work. Rescue young girls and helping the needy should be a work of every Young Women's Christian Association, and a Christian matron should be in every depot in every city in land.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The first hundred dollars pledged for new building of the California Avenue Congregational Church, Chicago, came from the Junior Christian Endeavor Society there.

The Eighth Annual Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the State of New York assembled in the Second Collegiate Reformed Church on Nov. 17. Mr. F. Morse, of Orange, presided.

The Karen Christian Endeavor Society at a college in Rangoon, Burmah, has grown so large that it has become necessary to divide it into sections, and to limit the number allowed for each member to take part in meetings.

Dr. E. A. Schell, general Secretary of the Epworth league, has prepared a Thar-giving missionary service for the use of Epworth leagues, entitled, "The Epworth League's answer to the world's cry of need." This service will prove useful to many leagues in the church.

The Epworth League is making rapid progress in the State of Missouri, as the following figures show: In the Southern Missouri Conference Rev. W. T. McCle reports 80 leagues, 3,195 members; Missouri Conference, Rev. S. P. Cresap reports 125 leagues, 4,433 members; St. Louis Conference, A. E. Whitter reports 62 leagues, 2,681 members. Total leagues, 267; members, 10,309.

The Secretary of the B. Y. P. U., of the State of Kansas gives the following report of progress: Societies in this State 159, more than last year 90; membership reported 4,613 (estimated 6,000) a gain of 3,000. Eleven societies took up the C. C. C. W. There are nineteen Junior societies, 542 members; 270 conversions are reported.

The "Epworth Era" the organ of the Southern Epworth League cautions its members against proselytizing. It says: "One of the main objects of the Epworth League is to teach our young people to know and love our doctrines. It would be wrong to try to get others under our influence, and draw them from their Church. We can invite them to unite with us in our meetings, and to join as far as they like in our work; but we would not bring them under the obligations of the pledge. There are plenty of considerations for us to work with. Indeed, we will find our hands full to take care of our young people. Never proselytize! It is sin!"

The following officers of the Baptist Young People's Union of the State of New York for the ensuing year were elected at the recent convention at Rochester, N. Y.: Pres., Frank Harvey Field, Brooklyn; Vice-Pres., Gilbert S. Graves, Buffalo; Mornay Williams, New York; Secretary, May M. Ivers, Brooklyn; Assistant Secretary, Rev. George T. Webb, Auburn; Treasurer, W. T. Coleman Carpenter, Yonkers; Managers, Rev. C. A. Barbour, Rochester; Rev. W. H. Main, Buffalo; A. S. Holt, D. D., Yonkers; Rev. B. L. Herr, Birmingham; E. E. Chivers, D. D., Buffalo; S. MacArthur, D. D., New York; W. S. Noon, Brooklyn; W. G. Parkes, Rochester; Rev. Philip B. Strong, Little Falls.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BUILDING, GLENS FALLS, N. Y.

is precluded from acting directly in the matter except as a Bureau of Information and therefore asks the co-operation of State, Territorial and Provincial Unions. Mr. Baer suggests the following plan which in outline has been adopted by the Missionary Extension Committee of New York and New Jersey:

The Christian Endeavor and other young people's societies of a town, village, or locality are to apply to the State committee in charge of the movement to give them the course. If such committee does not exist, the State officers are urged to appoint such a committee. Where State unions now have missionary superintendents, it is suggested that said superintendent take charge of the work. The societies promise, first, the maintenance of a union mass-meeting, —one each month for a period of four or six consecutive months; second, that the pastor of each of the co-operating churches be requested to preach a sermon on the Sunday previous to or following each lecture, on a missionary topic suited to the subject of the lecture, and that the same topic shall be considered at the weekly prayer meeting of each society next preceding the date of the lecture. On the part of the State committee, or superintendent, it is agreed to send to the town or locality, at intervals of one month, four or six different speakers, each of whom shall be an expert in the treatment assigned to him, and capable of interesting

Mary Chalfant thus describes it in the "Evangelist": The Young Woman's Christian Association made the experiment some time ago of keeping a Christian worker in the Union depot to give help, or advice, or comfort to any woman arriving or departing by train who might need it. Sufficient funds were raised in the association to pay her salary for six months. When the work had been tried and found to be such a "God send" to young girls traveling alone, to sick and weary women and children, to those of our own sex, in almost every condition of life, also to the men employed relieving them of a work they could not do satisfactorily, the depot officials took the matter in hand and assumed the responsibility of the salary, leaving the direction of the work with the Young Women's Christian Association. The depot furnished a small room with desks and chairs. The association furnished easy rocker, cot, comfort and pillow, where many a weary head has found rest, and scores of little children traveling alone have been made comfortable for the night on the floor of the matron's office. The association keeps the office supplied with medicines to be used in case of emergency.

It would be almost impossible to give a satisfactory statement of the work by writing, as it cannot be done by any set form or rule. It is as real a missionary work as any that could be done. There is not a day

Norway's Fisher-Folk.

Simple People who Live in a Land where Peace Abides and Fashions Rarely Change—Quiet Home Lives.

NORWAY, the ancient home of the Vikings or Sea-Rovers, the land of battle, song and heroic deeds, and once peopled by the most warlike and aggressive of European races, has become, in the revolution of the centuries, one of the most peaceful countries in the world. In recent years, travelers have given it much attention and artists have found in its noble mountains and lovely lakes attractions such as exist in no other part of Europe—not even in Switzerland. For the enter and the vigor it affords a magnificent field, and its fisheries are one of the leading industries of its people. Norwegian fishermen prefer to ply their vocation in the night time, and as night, in "the land of the midnight sun" is much longer than with us, they can work at their boats and nets to advantage during the greater part of the twenty-four hours. Our illustration on this page shows a group of these fisher-folk on their way to the market with their "catch." The fish sometimes hang in the boat and again in a "sh-tank" trailing behind and attached to the boat by a rope. The morning sun is just beginning to break through the mist as they reach the landing-place with their "catch."

Norwegian women are almost as skillful at the oar as the men, and it is a familiar sight to witness boat after boat coming up the landing-wharves impelled by the stout arms of merry-faced girls, laughing and singing as they row. Every stream, fjord and lake has its quota of fisher-folk who make the principal part of their living at the oar, and it would be strange indeed if Norwegian boys and girls, brought up amid such surroundings, were not fond of sailing and rowing. There are no finer seamen on the coast than Norwegian "tars" and the pilots among the most expert in the world.

With a rocky and comparatively barren soil, and much of its territory in close proximity to the Arctic circle, the soil of Norway is necessarily less favorable to agricultural pursuits than its more southern neighbors. The climate is rigorous, but healthful and bracing, and it possesses such recuperative qualities that many invalids are now attracted there. Its snow-clad hills, sparkling streams, and deep, dark-green lakes and fjords have for the adventurous all the charm of Switzerland, without the Alpine dangers of glaciers and avalanches.

Norway has more lakes, in proportion to size, than any other country, the largest being Mjosen, fifty-seven miles long. For considerable distances, the mainland does not come into direct contact with the sea, being girdled by a belt of islands, with numerous bays and rapids, so thickly set that they are known as the "skjærgaard," or "fence of skerries," of the outer coast. As all these inlets are filled with the comparatively warm waters of the Atlantic, the temperature along the coast is mild and agreeable, even in winter. In the fishing season the lakes are alive with salmon, "charr," trout and grayling, while perch, pike, bream, and a great variety of others are found in such abundance that the markets are well supplied. Off the coast, herring and cod are taken in immense quantities, and form an important source of the wealth of the nation.

Fair-haired, blue-eyed and ruddy-complexioned, the people of Norway are peaceful, industrious and progressive; happy in their simple home lives, and sincere in all that relates to their religious duties. They are a people of great missionary activity, cess may be purchased for three thousand roubles. In Tartary, a woman can be purchased for a few pounds of butter, or where a rich man gives twenty small oxen, a poor man may succeed with a pig. In Fiji her equivalent is a whale's tooth or a musket. Wherever the Gospel has reached, the condition of women has improved and her social status is better than before; but in places where it is unknown, she is in the same condition of degradation and servitude in which she has remained for centuries.

Mutual Forbearance.

It is probable that in a majority of households, one may be sure that, for every fault discovered or imagined in another, there is one to mate it in the self-satisfied critic. An early recognition of this truth, and a consequent humility and forbearance, would preserve happiness and give abundant harvest of blessing. But leaving general and unconscious influences, there are direct and definite questions which occur to wise, earnest and devoted parents in respect to the marriage of their children. Perhaps the daughter seems more easily guided, and the duties of a parent toward a son more difficult to understand and to perform, but the obligation to faithful care is as inexorable in dealing with one child as with another; and why should it not be so?

Would Have Given His Pillow.

Childish sympathy is very beautiful. A little lad of four or five years was one day reading to his mother in the New Testa-

HOME TOGETHER.

THE road is rough before our feet.
The hills are steep and high,
And clouds are gathering overhead
To shut away the sky.
Perhaps our paths may run apart.
In dark and stormy weather.
But at the nearing evening-time,
We'll all be home together.

O, friend of mine, I grieve to lose
The grasp of loving hands;
How much we need each other here,
Each fully understands.
But if our pathways meet no more
In meadow-land or heather,
Believe that when the night is come
We'll be at home together.

So here's a hand that's true, my friend,
And steadfast, come what may,
God grant our paths run side by side
And part not, all the way;
But if it be that part we must—
God only knoweth whether—
There's comfort in the thought that night
Will bring us home together.

A HUMANE ROYAL LADY.

THE higher one's station in life, the greater the opportunities for doing good. It is pleasing to record that an illustration of this fact is found in the case of Haruka, the Empress of Japan. This royal lady is a patroness of the Red Cross Society, and is personally engaged daily with her court ladies in preparing bandages, lint, etc., for the wounded Chinese as well as Japanese engaged in the war. Her activity in personally directing this humane work is a source of pride among the Japanese.

She secured the introduction of the Red Cross into Japan about twelve years ago. In peaceful times she practices silk culture in her house in order to share in the labor of the poor silk-workers of Japan. She leads also in many charitable and educational movements, the girls' normal school, the girls' high school and the Tokio charitable hospital. The Empress is highly intellectual and of great strength of character. She has jet black hair, her face is long and thin, her forehead is high and her head is finely formed. She is forty-four years old, two years older than the Emperor. They celebrated their silver wedding last February.

The Emperor in every way showed that he believes the wife's place is beside her husband and on a level with him. She is greatly loved by the whole Japanese nation and her influence has done much to elevate her sex throughout the Mikado's realm. Haruka's name is a household word in the homes of the "Land of the Rising Sun."

A Mother's Inner Life.

Canon Farrar gives this interesting description of the daily life of his mother: "It was her habit every day immediately after breakfast, to withdraw for an hour to her own room, and to spend that hour in reading the Bible, in meditation and prayer. From that hour, as from a pure fountain, she drew the strength and sweetness which enabled her to fulfil her duties, and to remain unruffled by all worries and pettinesses which are so often the intolerable trial of narrow neighborhoods. As I think of her life, and of all she had to bear, I see the absolute triumph of Christian grace in the lovely ideal of a Christian lady. I never observed in her any sign of a single sentiment unbecoming to a soul which had drunk of the river of the water of life, and which had fed upon the divine manna in the barren wilderness."

NORWEGIAN FISHERS ON THEIR WAY TO MARKET.

and have been energetic both in the home and foreign fields, and especially among the ignorant and neglected Finns, who occupy the extreme northernmost part of Norway, and who belong to a race entirely different from the Scandinavians.

Buying Wives.

There are certain countries where the custom of buying and selling wives still prevails. The price of a bride in British Columbia and Vancouver Island varies from twenty to fifty pounds' worth of articles. In Oregon, an Indian gives for her, horses, blankets, or buffalo robes; in California, shell-money or horses; in Africa cattle. A poor Damara will sell a daughter for a cow; a richer Kaffir expects from three to thirty. With the Banyai, if nothing be given, her family claim her children. In Uganda, where no marriage recently existed, she may be obtained for half a dozen needles, or a coat, or a pair of shoes. An ordinary price is a box of percussion caps. In other parts, a goat or a couple of buckskins will buy a girl. In Asia, her price is sometimes five to fifteen roubles, or at others, a cartload of wood or hay. A prin-ment, and when he came to these words: "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head," his eyes filled with tears, and with a child's unrestrained gush of feeling, he said to his mother, "I am sure, mamma, if I had been there, I would have given him my pillow." A childish utterance, yet full of love and tenderness. He would have given Jesus his pillow! Well, he, the blessed Son of Man, who consented to such amazing humiliation, should have the best we have—first, our hearts, and then our best service.

Siamese Marriage Days.

One of the many singular customs in Siam is that each year is named after an animal, and only certain animals are allowed to intermarry. A person born in the year of the elephant, for instance, cannot marry a person born in the year of the tiger; neither may the lion mate with the lamb. The law imposes penalties upon all who give false ages, or who represent that they are gay gazelles, when, in fact, they are mischievous monkeys; and therefore it is a law which would not be welcome in Western lands.

CHAPTER XIX.

Desolate.

THE death of her darling boy, the sole solace of her life, left Annie crushed and forlorn. She did not weep nor fall, as before, with unconsciousness. She was white, tearless, stony. By the side of the beautiful corpse she sat, and toyed with his curling hair and pressed his lips, but she was calm—scarcely a sigh escaped her. At the vault she stood close, looking in, nor turned away when the great key turned hoarsely in the rusty lock. Taking her hand, the minister said:

"Dear friend, God has dealt heavily with you—" but when he saw her blanched cheek, her dry eye, and emotionless face, he drew back, turned away and buried his face in his handkerchief. Everyone standing there wept but she who had most cause to weep.

Sleepless and tearless she spent her days and nights. Toys, little soiled clothes and warm shoes—such breakers of mothers' hearts—these she gathered, with her own hands, and packed away. She took no interest in anything, and scarcely a word ever escaped her lips. Up and down, in and out, she wandered, like one almost demented. It was a piteous sight to behold her. How death had revelled all around her, and she, who would gladly have embraced him, left behind! The wonder was she did not put an end to her own life, but this she seemed not now to think of, though once it had been her temptation. Roy would take her to the grave, hoping that her grief would find an outlet, the floodgates be burst asunder, and she relieved; but it was always the same. Tearless she went, tearless she returned.

Mrs. St. Clair was in genuine distress, for it seemed almost as though Annie had forgotten her presence upon earth, for, whenever she spoke of her trouble, it was always that her "last link to life was severed," leaving her mother out entirely. The family of St. Clairs had always been divided, for Annie clung to her father, Roy to his mother, and the parents had not chided the ownership each had claimed since childhood. It was not altogether unnatural, therefore, for Annie to feel that when her father, husband and child had passed away, her part of the household was gone. She loved her mother devotedly, and no sister ever loved a brother more than she did Roy, still she felt alone; indeed she seemed to prefer to remain alone in her room, doing nothing only sitting and thinking. In great alarm at her condition of mind, Roy consulted her physician, who, realizing at once her condition, said:

"You must arouse her mind. Unless this can be done, and she be put to work, mind and body, in some healthful channel, she is doomed to melancholia. I am sorry to say this to you, sir, but it is much better to be candid. Your sister must have food for her mind and activity for her body, or her fate is sealed."

"What can I do, doctor? She must be relieved. How would a trip do—anywhere, it does not matter where? Do cure her, doctor; money is nothing where she is concerned."

"My dear sir, neither your money nor my medical skill can be of any avail here. God has dealt severely and very mysteriously with her. I do not remember, in my career as a physician, to have known such afflictive calamities in so few years in one family,—a family without the taint of hereditary entailment. Consumption has often done more effective work, but there has been no line of consumption, no descending disease. Then, too, the circumstances were so trying. No, sir; money can do nothing here. In my opinion, no change of scene nor climate will do her any good. She must have, as I said, healthful exercise for her mind and her body."

"Both are at her command," said Roy. "She is free to do anything you suggest, doctor, and we will support you in your advice and urge her to follow it. Our trouble is that she does not care to make any effort. She seems to have lost all interest in life, and I believe that if you told her she would die to-morrow, she would be glad."

"I think she would," said Dr. Ripley, "and that is one of the most difficult features of the case. We physicians are a little out of our province when we attempt to deal with mental and spiritual ailments. Our sphere ends where the organs of the body are not affected. Now your sister is physically in perfect health. So we come into that debatable territory between the brain and the mind or the soul. Now on my side of that territory, the brain is at present in good condition. She is perfectly intelligent and could deal with any subject just as well now as at any past time. But after all, Mr. St. Clair, although we are reluctant to recognize the fact, there is something beyond the brain, the actual ego, which uses the brain and directs this way and that, as it will. Now if this ego declines to use the brain, is listless and benumbed, what can one do? The machinery is all there ready to its use and in good order, but it will not long continue to be so, if it is not used. It will spoil. In a case of this kind, the poor have an advantage over the rich. A poor woman who is left a widow, feels just as keenly as your sister does; but she does not brood over her trouble. She must work or starve. So she plans and arranges, and her thoughts are forced into a new channel. If your sister were obliged to go out and teach a school or do some such work, she would soon be in a normal condition."

Roy's face was sad, and after a few moments of thought, he said slowly:

"After Clarence's sad death and the loss of her estate, Annie begged to teach, but I put a quietus upon that at once."

"That's it!" said the physician, striking his hands together with a sudden concussion. "That is the very thing for her. In this sphere she will be compelled to think of others rather than herself."

"But, doctor, I don't see how I can manage it. I refused her positively before—told her that she should never teach; that all I possess is hers, and so I mean it to be."

Nobly said, my friend; but now you must make some sacrifice of feeling to save your loved sister."

"But how can I manage it? I don't see my way out of this at all."

"If you will allow it, I will take the matter out of your hands. What do you say to that?"

"And is this the only alternative?"

"It is, in my opinion, the only one. Chose between the school-room, a noble life there, and the Lunatic Asylum."

"I choose, Doctor. Manage it for me, but just as delicately as possible, and whatever you do, don't let her feel for a moment that she must support herself, to save herself from being a burden to me."

Roy dashed away a tear and continued:

"Please explain your plans to me, so that I can fall in with you and we can act harmoniously."

"Very well, this is my idea. Pres. Clarke, of the Female College in R—, of this State, is a personal friend of mine. It is far better for her to be removed from home and all home associations. I can confide to my friend the facts of the case, of your sister's former desire, and of her uncommon qualifications for any position in that Institution. I think, however, that the department of either vocal music or art would best please her, though I know the chair of Modern Languages she can fill as well. We must leave this somewhat to his judgment. She will be a grand acquisition to any College, and then her beautiful face and fascinating manners will win every heart. Now I shall tell my friend that he must make this situation for her, that if he cannot afford to pay her salary, that you will pay it. Will this meet with your approval?"

"Certainly, certainly. I prefer to pay it myself. Let this be perfectly understood at first, be one of the terms of the contract."

"Very well, then, you will pay her salary, $600 per annum and board."

"Yes, $1200 would be small for her. I am perfectly willing to go into the thousands if she must go."

"No, $600 is considered a good salary, especially if her board be thrown in. She must have a room well furnished, and it would be better for her to have a pleasant room-mate, but this I shall not insist on. I will write to my friend at once, and as soon as I receive his answer I will bring it up. You must oppose as you once did, but she and I must over persuade you. I will go with her myself, and my word for it, in a few months she will be herself again, and you will bless the day when you consented to this arrangement."

"Doctor, is this the only and the last chance?"

"The only one, my dear sir, I verily believe."

"Then, sir, I must consent, though it is like plucking out my eyes and tearing my heart-strings. I do thank you sincerely, Dr. Ripley, for your interest in our behalf, for it is not to the self aggrandizement of professional men generally to send their patients away. Yours is disinterested friendship, and I thank you for this proof. Come over as soon as possible and we will confer with Annie."

They parted, the Doctor walking rapidly to his office to write the letter, while Roy turned his footsteps homeward to prepare his mother for the result of the conference with their physician.

CHAPTER XX.

The Panacea of Work.

"Annie, Dr. Ripley is in the parlor and wishes to see you. Will you come down?"

"Dr. Ripley? Yes, I'll go, but I am not sick, Roy, I need no attention from him."

"He knows that, dear, he simply calls as a friend, and says he has just received a letter upon a subject, which, he imagines will interest you."

"Me? Received a letter?"

"Yes, he did not read it to me, but he told me this much. Come on, I am waiting to go with you, for he gave me this permission."

After the usual salutation and inquiry for health, Dr. Ripley said:

"Mrs. Devereaux, I have received a letter from a friend of mine in a distant town, and he mentions you very particularly, though I cannot conjecture whether or not you will like the terms he proposes."

"Me? Terms he proposes to me?"

"Yes, he is President of the Female College in R—, a town in the northern part of our State, as you know, though really it deserves the name of a city rather than town. He begs me to see whether you could be induced to accept a situation with him. He has heard of your gifts, and especially of your vocal powers and fondness for art, and he greatly desires to secure your services in these two departments. You sing finely, I know, and I think you love painting, do you not?"

"Yes, sir."

"I thought you might like to work out in the big world and make people wiser, better, and happier. Now, as it is, you only sit and think and think, and this is poor food for the body. You need something different. If you will take my advice as a physician, I prescribe good, healthful work for your mind and for your body."

"Doctor," and Roy spoke quickly and earnestly, "I don't want Annie to teach. Why should she? There is no necessity for it, I am very sure. If you think she needs recreation, why not let her take a trip to the seaside, to Europe or anywhere else, why will not this do? I will accompany and mother too. This will be a change, if nothing else, for mind and body. Alter your prescription to this, Dr. Ripley, and I will agree."

"No, Mr. St. Clair, this will not answer. I am seeking your sister's happiness, as well as my friend's advantage. I think your sister will be far better satisfied if she can be persuaded to undertake some useful work. It is right, my dear sir, for us to do all we can in this world for others, and, in working for others, it has a reflex influence on our own hearts and lives. Now, Mrs. Devereaux has many rare gifts, God given talent, that she should use for the benefit of the world, at least in her microcosm. She will be happier there working for, and with bright, young girls, than she is here. Her time, heart and thoughts will be filled, and this will be a great thing."

"Oh, to stop this eternal round of thinking!" exclaimed Annie.

Dr. Ripley saw the impression he had made, and continued:

"I know it, my dear friend. I can imagine your condition of mind, and if you will listen to my advice, I say work is the remedy you need. What say you?"

Looking at Roy, she answered:

"Roy opposed me once when I wanted to teach, but I think if it were left to me, I think I would like to go—to get away from these death associations—it's death, death nothing but death here!"

"And now you need some life associations," put in the Doctor, most opportunely. "This is what you would have among the mountains and bright girls. There is one thing I came near forgetting, and that is that President Clark authorizes me to offer you $600 and your board."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Roy, "if she must go out on a missionary tour among Hotte-tots, why that's no pay at all."

"That is very uncommon pay, indeed, Mr. St. Clair," said Dr. Ripley, "indeed, sir. He is expecting to secure a very superior woman in your sister, and so he is offering her very superior inducements."

"If it is philanthropy on her part, it might do; if it's a business transaction, it's a poor exchange. A year of brain-weariness, patience-tearing, nerve-shattering work, $600! Pshaw! that is no offer at all—it's nothing!"

"And her board, too, Mr. St. Clair; estimate that, put that to the $600, and you must acknowledge it to be a very fine offer indeed."

"Annie, I'll pay you more to stay," said Roy, with feeling. "Give up the thought of leaving us, and remain at home, where everybody loves you most tenderly, a you will have no trying work to do."

Roy was so dreadfully in earnest he seemed to have forgotten the part he was playing, for his natural aversion arose above his fears, so that the Doctor felt he was about to fail in his plans, his argument about to be overthrown. Annie sat for minute thinking, and then said:

"I care nothing for the money, I do need it; I have plenty of black dresses last me all my life, and I do not care much to eat."

There was something so touching in that simple speech that the physician had to turn his head away, and Roy brushed away a tear. The Doctor soon rallied, and said cheerily:

"Let's decide this matter at once. Will you go? I must write by return mail; a by-the-by, if you conclude to go, I shall be going that way soon—Monday, perhaps so if you will hurry I will take charge you right to the very door."

Annie sat looking on the floor, twisting a diamond ring round and round her finger, then suddenly looking up with something like a spark of animation, said:

"I will go, Dr. Ripley; I will be ready Monday."

"Annie!" exclaimed Roy in a reproachful tone; but she replied firmly:

"Roy, my dear brother, you stopped me once, but you must not interfere now. I will fly so much faster if I am at work, I care will drown thought, and it is far better so. I will go, Dr. Ripley. Please write to your friend that I accept, and will be at post next week."

Her spirits seemed to rise at once. She made her preparations quickly and Monday saw her on her way to her new home.

The scenery en route was very grand—mountains and dales, clear running streams and broad rivers hedged in by forest trees. Nature was a book that Annie always loved to read, and nothing so pressed her as mountain scenery, yet it is not from any holy associations, not because Jehovah so often selected mountains upon which to exhibit his glory, but simply because her artist's eye found here beauty and sublimity. Something like old life to her possession of her, when upon the second morning of their journey, clouds flooded down and caught like cobwebs on the mountain foliage, then rolled together to a fleecy curtain above.

The Coffee Habit

is difficult to throw off, especially if one's epicurean taste leads to the use of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk in this popular beverage. Inferiority to cream is admitted. Rich flavor and uniform consistency.

A HINDOO PERSECUTED.

A letter to the American Board, Mr. Perkins, of the Madura Mission, describes the fortitude of one of the native converts who has suffered heavily through becoming a Christian. He says: "This man Perumari is not a poor man or an ignorant man of a low caste, nor did he have any sinning motive in joining us. He had a good estate, lands, the respect of his neighbors, was of a social status as good as any of the eyes of the Hindoo—and no trouble. The first result of his conversion was not dispute with his wife and brothers. He said: 'A man's foes shall be those of his own household.' Perumari can explain to you fully the meaning of that. Then the villagers, through collusion with his brother, got into his house during his absence and stole a lot of his property. When there were certain portions of his property for which he did not have regular receipts, but because dealing with friends and relatives he had not deemed it necessary to have particular about his papers. Now he is a Christian the heathen are endeavoring to seize all lands to which he is no deed, and nobody will testify in his favor. The shopmen have been ordered to sell to him, and in various ways persecution is brought upon him. This has been going on now not merely for a few months, nor for a year or so, but for five years. And does he waver, do you ask? Not at all. I am amazed when I go there and see him sitting before me with a mingled look of sadness and joy on his face. The man has evidently got a new Jesus Christ different from that of the ordinary Christian. He takes his Bible in his hand and goes fearlessly among his caste people and preaches better than any a catechist, because everything he says about Christ and the Bible has been burnt into him by suffering. He is laughed at and scoffed at by his old friends because he goes to the Lord's Supper and drinks from the same cup with low-caste people. But they cannot laugh, scoff, nor persecute him out of his faith.

A KING CONVINCED.

One of the most resolute opposers of Christianity in Southern Africa was the King of Pondoland, which country was recently annexed to Cape Colony. He has recently been much impressed, and has gone so far as to say, "Up to this time I have not believed in the existence of a God; but now I must admit there is one." The occasion of the king's change of mind was the conversion of his chief officer, whose duties correspond to those of prime minister in other countries. The official was a drunkard and a polygamist. He had been truly led to Christ. On returning to his home he destroyed a large and varied collection of beer-pots, and taking all his wives but one apart, he made provision for them and sent them back to their homes. It was the news of what he did in these matters that caused his royal master to believe in God. The king was sure that none but God could have so changed the man.

Tired, Weak, Nervous

I was troubled with that tired and all feeling, had no appetite, had a cough and asthmatic symptoms. I have been troubled thus some thirteen years, and had to give up all work three years ago. Last spring I commenced taking Hood's Sarsaparilla and felt better from the first. My appetite returned and my cough left me. I had used half a dozen bottles and am a new man. I am in the best of health. I am 64 years of age, and doing a full day's work at blacksmithing.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but I must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decine, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cents, or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

AT EVENING TIME.

"At evening time it shall be light." Zech. 14:7.
For the Christian Herald.

WHEN the toil of the long, long day is ending,

And dark shadows herald the coming of night,
How sweet then shall come the assurance blending.

"At evening time it shall be light."

O pilgrim weary and worn with thy travel,
Wounded and fainting from many a fight,
Lo! all life's mysteries then will unravel,

"At evening time it shall be light."

All ye that sow precious seed with weeping,
Daily walking by faith and not sight,
With joy shall ye bring the sheaves of your reaping.

"At evening time it shall be light."

So when on earth-scenes the dim eyes are closing,

And the spirit spreading its pinions for flight,
On the arms of Eternal Love reposing.

"At evening time it shall be light."

San Francisco. M. S. DUDLEY.

A WELCOME INVITATION.

One Sunday afternoon," writes Rev. G. J. Geis from Myitkyina, Burmah, "a chief from the Chinese border came to see us, saying that he had heard of our work for the Kachins through friends. He had come to make friends with me and invite me to his village to tell his people of the true God. On three different occasions Kachins came to see us from six and seven days' journey north of us, who had heard of the true God through their friends and wanted to hear more of him and the Gospel."

A USE FOR THE KORAN.

In Moslem lands there is always a decided advantage for a missionary to be acquainted with the Koran, the Bible of the Mohammedans. Dr. Samuel Jessup gives in "Woman's Work" a remarkable illustration. Dr. Harris, Mr. Nelson and a native helper started on a tour north of their station. Outside a Mohammedan village they halted under the shade of some spreading trees. The native helper opened his Bible and read aloud, and soon a crowd gathered. The missionaries answered the questions of several among the audience, and the reading went on, the people listening intently. By and by the religious sheikh came out and joined the throng. "What book is that you are reading?" he asked. "God's Word," was the reply. "Stop," he cried; "it is the Christian Bible; it is not God's word." The missionary smiled at him in surprise. He said, "The Koran declares the Bible is God's Word. You not believe the Koran?" The sheikh denied that the Koran said anything of the kind and departed to fetch his copy.

An Old-Fashioned New England Thanksgiving

Is not complete without a rousing fire on the hearth. It is expressive of warmth, health, and cheer.

Far more than we are wont to realize does the warmth, health, and cheer of our physical life depend on the proper burning of the fire of health. This fire must have sufficient fuel, quite as really as the other.

Nothing burns so well in the body as oxygen. The Electropoise is, so to say, a coal yard for the entire family—a source of supply of fuel for the fire of health. It is a little instrument, which so polarizes the body as to make it capable of absorbing oxygen in far greater quantity than can be done naturally.

It is a sad day when the fire within begins to consume the body itself. Disease and death are the consequences. Electropoise keeps the body supplied with proper fuel, and so cures disease.

We call you attention to the variety of ailments relieved and cured by Electropoise, as well as to the unquestioned integrity and high standing of those who have certified to it, and challenge your unprejudiced investigation.

We would be glad to send you a pamphlet which will more thoroughly describe the Electropoise.

Chills and Fever

No. 12 St. Paul St.,
Baltimore, Md., Feb. 2, 1892.

I cannot speak too highly of the merits of the Electropoise. I have proved it and know whereof I speak. I was stiff and sore all over from inflammatory rheumatism. After two nights' use of the Electropoise I did not have a rheumatic twinge or pain. I tried it for indigestion with the same beneficial results.

I know that it "knocks" chills and fever, from experimenting on one of my boys. And I fear to say anything further in its praise lest my friends should think I am a crank, or that I am interested in its sale.

I believe in the Electropoise from experience. I know it has done me and my family good. We have no use for doctors or druggists any more.

Yours sincerely,
GEORGE GANTZ,
General Agent State Mutual Life Assurance Co.

Aug. 23, 1894. Mr. Gantz says: "My opinion of the Electropoise's curative powers increases with its continued use."

Insomnia Relieved

Cheshire, Conn., June 28, 1894.

Dear Sir: In answer to your inquiry, I reply, that by following your directions I have benefited in the relief the Electropoise has given me in insomnia. Its application is based on scientific principles, and the best results are obtained by thought and correspondence with you. Yours truly,

REV. EMERSON JESSUP, Episcopal Minister.

Electropoise
TRADE MARK.

A Distorted Cripple

Kansas City, Mo., Dec. 21, '93.

Last winter my daughter was attacked by la grippe, and, through the ravages of this mysterious disease, reduced to a helpless cripple. From a bright, rosy, handsome child, she became in three weeks so weak, emaciated, and, in shape, distorted, that words fail me to adequately describe her condition. By accident I learned of the Electropoise. I purchased one—more through desperation to leave no means untried than through belief in its efficiency. I confess I thought it something on the order of the liver pad, "made to sell," and a sort of mild humbug. It was with more than half-way skepticism that I applied it, in accordance with directions.

Day after day, as I observed the marked improvement in my daughter, my doubts vanished. In eight weeks after the first application of the Poise my little girl was fully restored, enjoyed sound sleep, a good appetite, and is now in the possession of vigorous health, and as to her figure, there is no trace even that she ever had the first stages of spinal curvature or la grippe, which causes it. I have recommended the Electropoise to many of my friends, and always shall, and I am glad to say, where my advice has been followed, and one purchased, good results have always come. Very faithfully yours,

HORATIO GATES,
Venerable Archdeacon of West Missouri.

Old Wound

Gen. R. G. Dyrenforth, ex-Commissioner of Patents, whose recent interesting experiments in "Rain-Making" are so well known, used the Electropoise for an old gun-shot wound.

Washington, D. C., March 8, 1892.

Dear Sir: I deem it a duty to inform you of the remarkable curative effects experienced by myself and by others under my view from the use of your instrument. You may not know that I am a regular M. D., and have been a practicing physician. From the course of my education and association as such, I had no faith in the treatment. Personal experience and observation have, however, convinced me of its wonderful and subtle effects. I ascribe the beneficial results of the instrument I used, and the curative effects of the others which I observed, to the establishment of a potential by thermo-electric action.

Yours truly,
R. G. DYRENFORTH.

THE GOSPEL ON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

Dr. Hall and his Missionary Comrades Visit the Field of Pyong Yang—Brave Work for Christ in the Hospitals—Heroic Chang Sikey, the Korean Convert.

CHANG SIKEY, A NATIVE CONVERT.

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are already familiar with the work of Rev. W. J. Hall, American medical missionary in Korea and his associates, through occasional letters in these columns. To-day we are privileged to print the first missionary letter re-over the mountain paths and his companions walked. On the way they met crowds of affrighted Koreans who told them alarming stories of the battle; but they pushed on and reached Pyong-Yang in time to do splendid service in the hospitals among the wounded, and to afford spiritual solace to many who were past mortal aid. In their work they seem to have encountered no serious opposition. Dr. Hall writes:

PYONG YANG, Oct. 8, 1894.—We had a pleasant trip, and experienced no difficulties along the road in procuring accommodations or food. We saw a great many dead horses and cattle as we passed along which had been used in conveying army supplies. Many of the villages were completely deserted, but the people were beginning to come back and settle down again. We had no trouble whatever, in making our way through the army lines. We met the first large detachment of the Japanese, thirty-three miles south of Pyong Yang at Whong Ju; they have 450 Chinese prisoners there. At Chung Wha, fourteen miles south of Pyong Yang, we saw the graves of seven Japanese scouts who had been killed there

The battle commenced Sept. 13; only a few shots were fired that day, and a few more upon the 14th. On Saturday, the 15th, the great battle was fought. The Chinese had entrenched themselves across the river on the south side in the old city, and on the north side of the city they had two forts, one on each side of the road leading to Wee Ju. The Japanese attacked the fort on the south side of the river in the morning, the forts at the north on the road to Wee Ju at noon, and the old city towards evening, driving the Chinese from each place into the city. Saturday night the Japanese entered the city from the north side, and the Chinese fled through the south gate. The Japanese were watching the gates and the road, but the Chinese made their way through and fled toward Wee Ju.

We have visited the battle-field; it is strewn with Chinese bodies, some still unburied, and the rest have a few inches of dirt thrown over them. The stench is terrible, and the sight indescribable. There were 14,000 Chinese and 10,000 Japanese in the armies.

We have met Mr. Creelman, reporter of the N. Y. "World," and Frederick Villiers, reporter of the "London Standard." They are roughing it also. Mr. Moffet's things are totally destroyed, even all his stores. I have not lost anything. The house think everything is clear for our remaining here. The Chinese army has gone into China and the Japanese are marching to Wee Ju.

The Japanese General was wounded and I have been sent for to visit him to-morrow morning, to consult with the Japanese doctors.

Pyong-Yang is almost deserted. The Koreans are just beginning to come back. They all rejoice to find us here, and we are expecting grand results from our work—we believe the soil has been made mellow and fertile and will bring forth much fruit.

As far as our work for the Master stands, it never looked so hopeful as now. I am glad we are here and I know God will protect us, his promises are sure—"a thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee." I will say of the Lord, "he is my refuge and my fortress; my God, in him will I trust." W. J. HALL.

lately occupied by the contending Chinese and Japanese armies. On hearing of the battle, Dr. Hall and his two missionary friends, Messrs. Graham Lee and D. A. Moffet, at once prepared to start for Pyong-Yang. Mr. Lee rode a bicycle by the Chinese. Three miles from Pyong Yang we reached the river, and were at once upon the field of battle.

The TABERNACLE PULPIT

Round-the-World Sermons, by Rev. Dr. Talmage. MARTYRDOM AT LUCKNOW.

Text: Deut. 20: 19. "When thou shalt besiege a city a long time in making war against it to take it, thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof by forcing an axe against them."

THE awfullest thing in war is besiegement, for to the work of deadly weapons it adds hunger and starvation and plague. Besiegement is sometimes necessary, but my text commands mercy even in that. The fruit trees must be spared because they afford food for man. "Thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof by forcing an axe against them." But in my recent journey round the world I found at Lucknow, India, the remains of the most merciless besiegement of the ages, and I proceed to tell you that story for four great reasons: to show you what a horrid thing war is and to make you all advocates for peace; to show you what genuine Christian character is under bombardment: to put a coronation on Christian courage; and to show you how splendidly good people die.

As our train glided into the dimly lighted station, I asked the guard, "Is this Lucknow?" and he answered, "Lucknow;" at the pronunciation of which proper name strong emotions rushed through body, mind and soul.

The word is a synonym of suffering, of cruelty, of heroism, of horror such as is suggested by hardly any other word. We have for thirty-five years been reading of the agonies there endured and the daring deeds there witnessed. It was my great desire to have some one who had witnessed the scenes transacted in Lucknow in 1857 conduct us over the place. We found just the man. He was a young soldier at the time the greatest mutiny of the ages broke out, and he was put with others inside the Residency, which was a cluster of buildings making a fortress in which the representatives of the English Government lived, and which was to be the scene of an endurance and a bombardment the story of which, poetry, and painting, and history and secular and sacred eloquence have been trying to depict. Our escort not only had a good memory of what had happened, but had talent enough to rehearse the tragedy.

In the early part of 1857 all over India the natives were ready to break out in rebellion against all foreigners, and especially against the civil and military representatives of the English Government.

It was evident in Lucknow that the natives were about to rise and put to death all the Europeans they could lay their hands on, and into the Residency the Christian population of Lucknow hastened for defense from the tigers in human form which were growling for their victims. The occupants of the Residency, or fort, were, military and non-combatants, men, women and children, in number about 1692. I suggest in one sentence some of the chief woes to which they were subjected, when I say that these people were in the Residency five months without a single change of clothing; some of the time the heat at 120 and 130 degrees; the place black with flies, and all a-squirm with vermin; firing of the enemy upon them ceasing neither day nor night; the hospital crowded with the dying; small-pox, scurvy, cholera, adding their work to that of shot and shell; women brought up in all comfort and never having known want, crowded and sacrificed in a cellar where nine children were born; less and less food; no water except that which was brought from a well under the enemy's fire, so that the water obtained was at the price of blood; the stench of the dead horses added to the effluvia of corpses, and all waiting for the moment when the army of 60,000 shrieking Hindoo devils should break in upon the garrison of the Residency; now reduced by wounds and sickness and death to 976 men, women and children.

"Call me early," I said, "to-morrow morning, and let us be at the Residency before the sun becomes too hot." At seven o'clock in the morning we left our hotel in Lucknow, and I said to our obliging, gentlemanly escort, "Please take us along the of the rooms with grain, without which the Residency would have been obliged to surrender. There were also taken by him into this Residency rice, and sugar, and charcoal, and fodder for the oxen, and hay for the horses. But now, at the time when all the people were looking to him for wisdom and courage, Sir Henry is dying." Our escort describes the scene, unique, tender, beautiful and overpowering, and while I stood on the very spot where the sighs and groans of the besieged, and lacerated, and broken-hearted met the whizz of bullets, and the demoniac hiss of bursting shell, and the roar of batteries, my escort gave me the particulars.

"As soon as Sir Henry was told that he had not many hours to live he asked the chaplain to administer to him the holy communion. He felt particularly anxious for the safety of the women in the Residency who, at any moment, might be subjected to the savages who howled around the Residency, their breaking in only a matter of time, unless reinforcements should come. He would frequently say to those who surrounded his death couch, 'Save the ladies. God help the poor women and children!' He gave directions for the desperate defense of the place. He asked forgiveness of all those whom he might unintentionally have neglected or offended. He left a message for all his friends. He forgot not to give direction for the care of his favorite horse. He charged the officers, saying, 'By no means surrender. Make no treaty or compromise with the desperadoes. Die fighting.' He took charge of the asylum he at that point, and when anyone of our men ventured across the road he would drop him by a rifle ball. Bob was a sure marksman. The only way to get across the road for water from the well was to wait until his gun flashed and then instantly cross before he had time to load. The only way we could get rid of him was by digging a mine under the house where he was hidden. When the house was blown up 'Bob the Nailer' was with it." I said to him, "Had you made your minds what you and the other sufferers would do in case the fiends actually broke in?" "Oh, yes," said my escort, "we had it all planned, for the probability was every hour for nearly five months that they would break in. You must remember it was 1,600 against 60,000, and for the better part of the time it was 900 against 60,000, and the Residency and the earthwork around it were not put up for such an attack. It was only from the mercy of God that we were not massacred soon after the siege. We were resolved not to allow ourselves to get into the hands of the desperadoes. You must remember that all the women had heard of the butchery at Cawnpore, and we knew what fate meant. If unable to hold out any longer we would have blown ourselves up, and all gone out of life together."

"Show me," I said, "the rooms where the women and children staid during the awful months." Then we crossed the street and went down into the cellar of the Residency. With a shudder of horror indescrutable I entered the cellars where 622 women and children had been crowded until the whole floor was full. I know the exact number, for I counted their names on a roll. As one of the ladies wrote in her diary—speaking of these women, she said, "They lay upon the floor fitting into each other like bits in a puzzle." Wives had been tained from their husbands the promise that the husbands would shoot them rather than let them fall into the hands of these desperadoes. The women within the Residency were kept on the smallest allowance that would maintain life. No opportunity of privacy. The death-angel and the evil angel touched wings as they passed. Flies, mosquitoes, vermin in full possession of the place, and these women in momentary expectation that the enraged savages would rush upon them, in a violence of club, and sword, and torch, and throat-cutting would be the milder forms.

Our escort told us again and again of the bravery of these women. They did not despair. They encouraged the soldiers, they waited on the wounded and dying in the hospital. They gave up their stockings for holders of the grape-shot. They placed each other when their children were in danger. When a husband or father fell such praise of sympathy were offered as only women can offer. They endured without complaint. They prepared their own children for burial. They were inspiration for the men who stood at their posts fighting till they dropped.

Our escort told us that again and again news had come that Havelock and Outram were on the way to fetch these besieged ones out of their wretchedness. They had received a letter from Havelock rolled in a quill and carried in the mouth of a disguised messenger, a letter telling that he was on the way, but the next news was that Havelock had been compelled to retreat. It was constant vacillation between hope and despair. But one day they heard the guns of relief sounding nearer and nearer. Yet all the houses of Lucknow were fortresses filled with armed miscreants, and every step of Havelock and his army was contested,—firing from house-tops; firing from windows; firing from doorways. "Were you present when Havelock came in?" I asked, for I could suppress the question no longer. His answer came: "I was not at the moment present, but with several other young fellows I saw soldiers dancing while two Highland pipers played, and I said, 'What is all this excitement about?' Then we came up and saw that Havelock was in, and Outram was in, and the elements were pouring in."

THE CITY GATE OF LUCKNOW, INDIA.

road by which Havelock and Outram came to the relief of the Residency." That was the way we went. There was a solemn stillness as we approached the gate of the Residency. Battered and torn is the masonry of the entrance. Signature of shot, and punctuation of cannon ball, all up and down and everywhere. "Here to the left," said our escort, "are the remains of a building the first floor of which in other days had been used as a banquet hall, but then was used as a hospital. At this part the amputations took place, and all such patients died. The heat was so great and the food so insufficient that the poor fellows could not recover from the loss of blood; they all died. Amputations were performed without chloroform. All the anesthetics were exhausted. Sir Henry Lawrence had been in poor health for a long time before the mutiny. He had been in the Indian service for years, and he had started for England to recover his health, but getting as far as Bombay, the English Government requested him to remain at least a while, for he could not be spared in such dangerous times. He came here to Lucknow, and foreseeing the siege of this Residency had filled many had established for the children of soldiers. He gave directions for his burial, saying, 'No nonsense, no fuss. Let me be buried with the men.' He dictated his own epitaph, which I read above his tomb: 'Here lies Henry Lawrence, who tried to do his duty. May the Lord have mercy on his soul.' He said, 'I would like to have a passage of Scripture added to the words on my grave, such as: "To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him"—isn't it from Daniel? So as brave a man as England or India ever saw, expired. The soldiers lifted the cover from his face and kissed him before they carried him out. The Chaplain offered a prayer. Then they removed the great hero amid the rattling hail of the guns and put him down among other soldiers buried at the same time.' All of which I state for the benefit of those who would have us believe that the Christian religion is fit only for women in the eighties and children under seven. There was glory enough in that departure to halo Christendom.

"There," said our escort, "'Bob the Nailer' did the work." "Who was 'Bob the Nailer?'" "Oh, he was the African who sat

"Show us where they came in!" I exclaimed, for I knew that they did not enter through the gate of the Residency, that being banked up inside to keep the murderer out. "Here it is," answered my escort, "Here it is—the embrasure through which the men came." We walked up to the spot. It is now a broken-down pile of bricks a dozen yards from the gate. Long grass now, but then a blood-spattered, bullet-scarred opening in the wall.

As we stood there, although the scene was thirty-seven years ago, I saw them come in; Havelock, pale and sick, but triumphant; and Outram, whom all the equestrian statues in Calcutta and Europe cannot too grandly present.

"What then happened?" I said to my escort. "Oh," he said, "that is impossible to tell. The earth was removed from the gate and soon all the army of relief entered, and some of us laughed, and some cried, and some prayed and some danced. Highlanders so dust-covered and enough blood and wounds on their faces to make them unrecognizable, snatched the babes out of their mothers' arms and kissed them, and passed the babies along for other soldiers to kiss, and the wounded men crawled out of the hospital to join in the cheering, and it was wild jubilee, until the first excitement passed, the story of how many of the advancing army had been slain on the way began to have tearful effect, and the story of suffering that had been endured inside the fort, and the announcement to children that they were fatherless, and to wives that they were widows, submerged the shouts of joy with wailing of agony."

"But were you not embarrassed by the arrival of Havelock and 1400 men who brought no food with them?" He answered, "Of course, we were put on smaller rations immediately in order that they might share with us, but we knew that the coming of this reinforcement would help us to hold the place until further relief should come. Had not this first relief arrived as it did, in a day or two at most, and perhaps in any hour the besiegers would have broken in and our end would have come. The Sepoys had dug six mines under the Residency."

After we had obtained a few bullets that had been picked out of the wall, and a piece of a bomb-shell, we walked around the eloquent ruins, and put our hands into the scars of the shattered masonry, and explored the cemetery inside the fort, where hundreds of the dead soldiers await the coming of the Lord of Hosts, at the Last Day and we could endure no more. My nerves were all a-tremble, and my emotions were wrung out, and I said, "Let us go."

On the following day about four miles from the Residency I visited the grave of Havelock. The scenes of hardship and self-sacrifice through which he had passed were too much for mortal endurance, and a few days after Havelock left the Residency which he had relieved, he lay in a tent a-dying, while his son whom I saw in London on my way here, was reading to the hero the consolatory Scriptures. He had received the message of congratulation from Queen Victoria over his triumphs and had been knighted and such a reception as England never gave to any man since Wellington came back from Waterloo awaited his return. But he will never again see his native land. He has led his last army, and planned the last battle. Yet he is to gain another victory. He declared it when, in his last hours he said to General Outram, "I die happy and contented. I have for forty years so ruled my life that when death came I might face it without fear. To die is gain." Indeed this was no new sentimentality with him. He once stated that in boyhood with four companions he was accustomed to seek the "seclusion of one of the dormitories for purposes of devotion though certain in those days of being branded as Methodists and canting hypocrites." He had in early life been immersed in a Baptist Church. He acknowledged God in every victory, and says in one of his dispatches that he owes it to the power of the Enfield rifle in British hands to British pluck, and to the blessing of Almighty God on a most righteous cause." He was accustomed to spend two hours every morning in prayer and Bible reading, and if the army was to march at eight o'clock he arose for purposes of religious devotion at six o'clock. What a speech that was Havelock made to his soldiers as he started for Cawnpore, India: "Over two hundred of our race are still alive in Cawnpore. With God's help we will save them from death. I am trying you severely my men; but I know what you are made of."

A plain monument marks Havelock's grave. But I said while standing at the sacred place, why does not England take his dust to herself, and in Westminster Abbey make him a pillow? In all her history of wars there is no name so magnetic, yet she has expressed nothing on this man's tomb. His widow reared the tombstone. Do you say, "Let him sleep in the region where he did his grandest deeds?" The same reason would have buried Wellington in Belgium, and Von Moltke at Versailles, and Grant at Vicksburg, and Stonewall Jackson far away from his beloved Lexington, Virginia. Take him home, O, England! The rescuer of the men, women and children at Lucknow! His ear now dulled could not hear the roll of the organ when it sounds through the venerable Abbey the National Anthem. But it would hear the same trumpet that brings up from among those sacred walls the form of Outram his fellow-hero in the overthrow of the Indian mutiny.

Some audiences, and some readers, are so slow of thought, and so stupid that they need an application made of every subject. But the people who get this sermon have made the application for themselves already. I challenge you to say whether or not I have kept my promise when in the opening of this discourse I said I would show you four things: what an awful affair war is: what genuine Christian character is under bombardment: what is the coronation of Christian courage: and how splendidly good people die. And here endeth my first sermon of the "Round the World" series.

A GALLANT CHRISTIAN HERO.

With the retirement of Gen. Oliver Otis Howard from army service, on account of age (as announced from Washington last week), the official career is closed of one who, for his Christian heroism, has been aptly called the "Havelock of America." Gen. Howard (whose portrait appears on this page), was born at Leeds, Me., in 1830, and is of Revolutionary ancestry. Early in life he gave evidences of strong Christian character. He studied at Bowdoin College and entered West Point in 1850. Throughout his army career, which has been a remarkably brilliant one, he has steadfastly adhered to lofty Christian principle, being noted even while a young man as an abstainer, a Bible-reading and praying officer and an inflexible foe of profanity and vice in every form. When the war closed, he was chosen by President Lincoln as Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. He has been for many years active in every kind of Christian work, conducting religious services in hospitals and prisons and even while in charge of the military station on the Pacific Coast, finding opportunity for the exercise of his rare talents in behalf of the spiritual welfare of his fellow-men. As soldier, writer, public orator or private citizen he has led an admirable and blameless life, and his example has been helpful to many thousands of young men.

Gen. Howard, released from army duty, will be more than ever active in the field of philanthropy and helpfulness. His is a nature that will not brook idleness and while life lasts he will cling to the work of the Master he has loved so well.

GEN. O. O. HOWARD.

The Gospel on the Battle Field.

In a letter of earlier date, written previous to his visit to Seoul, and which was received by the same mail as the letter of Oct. 8, Dr. Hall says:

"I remained at Pyong Yang until I received an order from our Consul to bring Mrs. Hall and our little boy to an open port. The steamer was filled with soldiers and upon reaching Chemulpo we found the harbor filled with men-of-war. On the morning of July 23rd we were awakened at five o'clock by the Koreans who were almost frantic with excitement. Detachments of Japanese soldiers were rushing to guard the city gates, and there was heavy and constant firing of guns on the Palace grounds about a half-mile from our house. The Japanese succeeded in taking the Palace in about twenty minutes. Since that time they have been assisting the Korean government in adopting measures of reform.

"The Chinese and Japanese armies both were now in Korea. China poured her troops in at the north and soon Pyong Yang was occupied by the Chinese. The Japanese next sent large forces north and on Sept. 14th the two armies met at Pyong Yang. A heavy battle ensued and on the 16th the Japanese were victorious and entered the city. A naval battle was fought near Pyong Yang in which the Japanese were also successful.

"Dr. Scranton and I have been very busy in the hospital since the war commenced. Here many precious lives have been saved and all have heard the glad tidings of the Gospel. Several have confessed saving faith in Christ, and many others have bought our Christian books and have gone away feeling that they wanted to know more about the 'Jesus doctrine.'

The seeds of truth are daily being scattered and we know they will be cared for by the Holy Spirit and bring forth a rich harvest. On Sept. 26th we received a letter from Pyong Yang written by our faithful helper Kim Chang Sikey, which stated that our Christians were all safe and well—that the Chinese had been defeated and the Japanese now occupied the city. He was very grateful to God for keeping them through such great danger. He remained at his post holding our little Christian flock together and caring for our property during the battle. Chang Sikey was led to Christ through Bro. Ohlinger and was in his employ until he went to America. Since then he has been my helper. He has shown himself a true Christian hero. Last spring he was imprisoned, had his feet wedged in stocks for two days and nights, was stoned and almost beaten to death, but would not give up Christ. I believe that there will be many such jewels found in Korea. Revs. D. A. Moffett and Graham Lee and myself start for Pvoing Yang over-land Oct. 1st.

"I have received hundreds of packages of cards and letters in response to my appeal. Many have asked for replies, but as the work here makes such pressing demands upon my time, will the dear friends please accept this as my reply. Let me thank you in behalf of the Korean children. I am printing in Korean the text John 3: 16 on the back of each card and I am sure God's blessing will follow them and they will be the means of planting the seeds of truth in many a little heart. Papers printed in English cannot be read by Koreans. Yours sincerely,

W. J. HALL."

Dr. Hall enclosed the following letter written by a native convert, Mrs. Esther Pok, aged eighteen, after her first sea voyage and trip into the north of Korea:

PYONG YANG, Oh-yang Tong.

I am in Pvoing Yang now. We all come here just to-day. I wish I could tell you all what I saw but I am afraid I don't know how. Pyong Yang is almost like Seoul, but people look and talk a little different. We been on steamer four days. O, we had a hard time! On Monday afternoon the boat stop at the harbor and then we came to the river boat. This boat has a little room, dirty like a pig pen. Dr. Hall and Mrs. Hall and baby and Sylvia and I slept inside, and Mrs. Pok and one of the Christians from Pyong Yang who came to meet us, they sleep top of the boat. The boatman was very old. We got to Pyong Yang the next afternoon, and came in our closed chairs to the house where Dr. Hall stops."

With much love,

ESTHER.

May 8, 1894.

Esther is Mrs. Hall's Korean helper in mission work at Pyong Yang. She studied Korean, Chinese, and English in Dr. Hall's Girls' School before her marriage, and is a most efficient and devoted worker.

Rev. Dr. Hall is 35 years of age and a Canadian by birth. In early manhood he was converted and joined the Methodist Church. He studied at Queen's University, Kingston, Ont., and after graduation, resolved to devote his life to spreading the Gospel in heathen lands. He was also a student at Dr. George D. Dowkontt's Medical Mission School in New York, and was for a time a medical missionary in the metropolis, doing good work among the tenement dwellers. After taking his diploma as a physician, he assumed charge of a Mission church on Madison street, New York, where he preached to the very poor on Sundays and on weekday evenings. The mornings and afternoons found him among the sick in the fetid Eastside tenements, administering medicines for their bodily ailments and spiritually consoling all who came within the reach of his kindly influence. He sailed for his present field in Korea in the winter of 1891, and has proved a most valuable and devoted Christian medical missionary.

Owing to native opposition his work at times has been attended with great peril, but he has been divinely preserved through it all up to the present time. It is probable that Seoul will be made a treaty port and the facilities for successful missionary work in Korea will soon be greatly improved.

Next Week's Mammoth Edition

A Million and a Half "Christian Herald" with a Magnificent Colored Supplement—A Marvel in Journalism.

NEXT week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be the special Premium Edition, and will consist of 1,500,000 copies of twenty-eight pages each, eight pages being printed in colors. This edition will require 500,000 pounds of paper. The mechanical work was begun three months ago and fifteen large cylinder presses have been kept busy since September 1, on the color work alone, and nearly forty additional presses will be in operation this entire month in printing the other part of the paper. At the time of this writing, fifty-three cylinder presses are at work.

As no edition of such mammoth proportions has ever before been issued by any daily, weekly or monthly publication in any part of the world, some details concerning its production will interest the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Ten of the largest printing establishments and binderies in New York City are now busily engaged upon it, one of these concerns alone having twenty-five presses at work on it exclusively. Among the printing establishments the largest is the American Lithographic Co., which has contracted to print 1,000,000 copies of the black-and-white pages, and 500,000 of the seven-color supplement, and of the binderies, the largest is Knopke's, which is folding and binding 700,000 complete copies of the Special Edition. The Moss Engraving Co., is printing 1,000,000 copies of the colored supplement.

The other work is distributed among six or seven establishments with facilities almost equal to those of the great firms already mentioned. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S own office 200 girls have been busy for weeks arranging the names, weeding out duplicates and addressing wrappers, and in our bindery fifty girls are employed in putting the papers into wrappers after they are folded.

Altogether, the Special Premium Edition will be a phenomenal one, and will be highly valued by all who receive it. In a literary sense, too, it will be unusually attractive. Margaret E. Sangster, the famous authoress, will make her first acquaintance with our readers in its pages, having contributed to the Special Edition a delightful short story, entitled "The Gospel Coach," the first of many to follow from her brilliant pen.

CHRIST'S TEACHING BY PARABLES

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 9. Luke 8:4-15. Golden Text Luke 8: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE critical and unfriendly Scribes and Pharisees whose presence was always thrust upon the Lord Jesus, were not his only hearers. He had also many appreciative hearers, who, out of the deepest gratitude, and out of real hunger after truth, followed him. "He went about through cities and villages, preaching and bringing the good tidings of the kingdom of God, and with him the twelve, and certain women who had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary that was called Magdalene, from whom seven devils had gone out, and Johanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, which ministered unto them of their substance." (Luke 8: 1-3, R.V.) We are glad to have this little glimpse of how the temporal needs of the Lord and his disciples were met, since he had left the carpenter's bench, and they had left their fishing. These were the days of Christ's popularity; a great multitude came together, "and they of every city resorted to him." In the parallel passages in the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, we learn that he was teaching by the seaside (Matt. 13: 1; Mark 4: 1), and that the multitude stood on the shore, while he taught the people out of a boat in which he was seated. But in all these Gospels we learn that he spoke by parables.

Light Brings Responsibility, and much light had dawned upon those who heard him; yet, as we have seen, the leaders of the people remained in darkness still. Repudiating the leading, both of John the Baptist and of Jesus, there was in them no response to God; "the word of hearing did not profit them, because they were not united by faith with them that heard." (Heb. 4: 2.) They had gone the awful length, in their impious daring, of attributing the work of Christ to Satan, and in his mercy he would not increase their responsibility and condemnation; thus, instead of speaking in unmistakable language, he spoke unto them in parables. The disciples, who could not see as he did, the unspeakably solemn issues which hung on the reception or rejection of his message, asked him: "Why speakest thou unto them in parables? And he answered and said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. For whosoever hath, to him shall it be given, and he shall have abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that which he hath." (Matt. 13: 10-12.) They and you alike have heard the Word; they have rejected, you have received it. You have made your own what you have heard, therefore more shall be given you. Whatever you have received of God's truth is but a preparation for more, a foundation for that which is to follow. These who have gone the length of criticising and condemning the Son of God, have trifled with the light, therefore darkness has come upon them (John 12: 35), and even that which they have, even the power to apprehend, shall be taken from them. "Therefore speak I to them in parables; because seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand." Unconsciously to themselves they are fulfilling the Scriptures. (Isa. 6: 9, 10.) It was a terrible revelation; but does it not appeal to those at the present day who hear, who know the doctrine of the Gospel, who pass for religious people, but who are like empty eggshells, all outside, all unreal? The truths they hold have not transformed their lives, their hearts remain unchanged, they have received nothing; their capacity to believe and obey has rusted from want of use, and judicial blindness, hardness, and a chronic unreality have laid hold of them!

"The sower went forth to sow his seed." One only is Sower: "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man." (Matt. 13: 37); others may "sow beside all waters" (Isa. 32: 20), but only as instruments of the one great Sower. "And as he sowed, some fell by the wayside." It is an awful thing when the heart of man becomes the wayside, the common pathway, open to all, man or devil; no hedge, no restriction upon that which enters in. The tread of many feet has hardened the soil until nothing can penetrate it, nothing goes below the surface. Paul speaks of the Gentiles who "walk in the purity of their mind, being darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them, because of the hardening of their heart." These he describes as "past feeling." It is an awful picture, but it is terribly true to life. The Word of God, his message to them falls on the hard outside, finds no entrance, and nothing is left but the historical fact that they have heard and rejected the message of God to them. The devil cometh "and taketh away the word from their heart, that they may not believe and be saved." (Luke 8: 12); "he that obeyeth [believeth, marg. R. V.] not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

"Other fell on the rock; and as soon as it grew, it withered away, because it had no moisture." Those on the rock are they which, when they have heard, receive the word with joy; and these have no root, which

and in time of temptation fall away." Are these converted, or are they not converted? This is the question which immediately arises. Why wrangle about questions and disputes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, etc. Surely the solemn declaration of our Lord is enough that these "for a while believe," and in time of temptation fall away. The "powers of an endless life" have not taken possession of them, they are still living in the flesh, the very "goodliness whereof" is as the flower of the field and withers under the breath of the Lord. They have not taken their place at the Cross as condemned, equally by God's holy laws and by themselves; their own life has not been yielded up; they sought their own enjoyment and comfort, not the glory of God in their temporary faith; the foundations were not deeply laid, the soil of their natural heart was not broken up. When temptation arose and they were not appreciated as they expected, when the joy they had, ceased to be a novelty and things did not look quite as bright as at first, then they fell away. It is the history of thousands in the Church of Christ. As long as they were prominent as young converts, petted and noticed by everybody, their joy lasted; but when they were put to the proof, and they must learn to fall back upon the Lord himself, the superficiality of their religious life was laid bare; they fell away. They had no life "hid with Christ in God."

"And others fell amidst the thorns; and the thorns grew with it, and choked it." These are they that have heard, and as they go on their way (not God's way), they are choked with cares and riches and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection. Their heart is divided; life is in them, but it is a life which Does Not Answer its Purpose.

Fruit there is, but it is poor fruit, disappointing fruit, had specimens of the plant on which it grows. Christians, but un-Christ-like; called to be "not of the world," and yet found in the world; set in the world as witnesses that they have a heavenly Father who careth for them, and yet as much overwhelmed with care as though they had not such heavenly Father; believing in Christ, and yet yielding in numberless tests to a spirit of unbelief; uneasy to be claimed by the world, and yet afraid to come out of the world; these are the people whose home is among the thorns. It is indeed a thorny path which they tread, they rise in the morning and lie down at night with a conscience that is ceaselessly pricking them. Attempting to make the best of both worlds, they miserably fail, and neither God's cause, nor yet their fellow-creatures are the better for their existence. And yet such as these are to be found in all our churches: often they are those whose money gives them influence, and too often, instead of being raised to a higher level by the life of the church they belong to, they are used by the great enemy of God to bring down their church to their own level of death and unfruitfulness.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

TERMS of thought were implanted in the minds of his hearers, by the new style of preaching which the Lord adopted at this period of his ministry. It was a radical change in his method of imparting truth.

Previous to this time his teaching had been plain and unmistakable. Now he suddenly ceases to give laws and explicit directions as to conduct, and begins to teach in parables. The Jews were familiar with this pictorial style of preaching. One of the parables—that of the woman searching for the lost coin, was already in use by the Rabbis, but Jesus gave it a new application. Several reasons probably weighed with him in adopting this mode of preaching. One was that he was followed everywhere by the agents of the Pharisees, who watched vigilantly for him to drop some expression on which a charge of heresy could be founded. They could not find such a charge on a story or fable and they must have been baffled when Jesus cast his teaching in that form. They knew perfectly well at whom these parables were aimed, but in the absence of a direct statement their plot failed. Another reason probably was that Jesus was proceeding from the elementary teaching, like the Sermon on the Mount, to more profound matters connected with the Kingdom. In the crowds who followed him there were many who could not appreciate direct teaching on the subject. They were intent on seeing miracles and would like to have Jesus proclaimed king. The spiritual truths he had to convey were meaningless to them. They could, however, understand and remember a story, seeing without perceiving and hearing without understanding; but there would be some who would take the trouble to search out the hidden meaning. These would be the men who alone would benefit by the spiritual lesson. That there was such a lesson Jesus hinted to them in the recurring phrase, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Even the dumbest listener probably learned more than he was aware of at the time; for he would not forget the parable and as he pondered on it some flash of light would illuminate it. The first of the parables is full of such meaning. The Kingdom was not a matter of outward pomp, but a silent, unnoticed growth in the heart. Its extension and development did not depend on the seed, which was uniformly good, but on the minds of those who heard the truth. If the man was hard and callous, or if he was shallow and frivolous, or if he was pre-occupied and sordid, the truth had little or no effect on him. The Jews had a similar saying, describing hearers as of four kinds: some who were like a sponge, some like a funnel, some like a strainer and some like a sieve. The lesson was for all time. There must be human co-operation with divine influence.

He spoke by a parable. Rev. D. Chamberlain describing one of his early missionary experiences in India says: The people in Hyderabad rose in a body to drive us out, because we taught the worship of another God rather than theirs. The throng filled the street. They told me that if I attempted to utter another word, I should be killed. If I chose to depart silently I might go, but if I would not, I should not leave the city alive. With some difficulty I obtained permission to tell them a story before they stoned me. The crowd stood around already armed with heavy stones as I began to speak. It was to be a story and nothing more, otherwise my life would end there and then. With the touching words the Master gave me that day I told the story of his life, from the humble birth in the Bethlehem stable, to the sorrowful close on Calvary. This, I told them, occurred that they might have life eternal. "Now, I said, 'I am ready if you want to stone me.' But no one was prepared to do that. The stones were flung away and the men came forward asking to be told more and eagerly buying the New Testaments in which, as I told them, the story was set down in full."

Having heard the word, keep it. A noted preacher warned his hearers against generosity, by which, he said, many lost their souls. Some people, he said, are in danger of being too stingy, but others were too generous. They listen to a sermon and hear the preacher touch on this sin and that, and they do not take it to themselves, but give this part of the sermon to one brother, and that part to another brother. So they give away the whole sermon and it does them no good. So they lose their souls by being too generous.

He that hath ears to hear. Alphonse Karr heard a gardener ask his employer to allow him to sleep over the stable instead of in the pretty cottage built for him in the copse at the edge of the garden. "I cannot get any sleep," he said, "in the cottage, for the trees are full of birds which keep up a guggle, and make a noise all night long." The birds he complained of were nightingales, whose song was the most delightful music under heaven, and people would come and sit up all night to listen to them. But this man had no ear for bird-music and so did not enjoy it. Just so those who do not care for the Gospel think that hearing a sermon is a very dull business.

Bear fruit a hundred-fold. A missionary in Madagascar describes his astonishment at finding a Christian tribe in a remote part of the island where none was known to exist. The people were surrounded by heathenism but were leading Christian lives and one of their own number was preaching to them every Sunday. He learned that the preacher a few years before, while a heathen like the others, became sick and went to Antananarivo for treatment. There he had been visited by a Christian who taught him to read. As he lay on his narrow cot in the building which represents a hospital in the Hova capital, he read the New Testament and his kind friend explained it and talked to him of Jesus. He recovered, and while still feeble, journeyed home having promised to tell his neighbors what he had learned. He kept his promise with such effect that one after another believed. They met together to hear him read the Testament, and the reading developed into preaching and regular services and there he was the pastor of a church.

Seeing they might not see. People are often much interested in religion and like to know all about it, but have no intention of making any use of it themselves. Spurgeon used to say they behaved very much as he did in another matter during one of his sojourns in Switzerland. He often crossed and re-crossed the river by the ferry-boat at Basle. "I had no object in the world," he said, "but amusement and curiosity to watch the simple machinery by which the same current is made to drift the boat in opposite directions from side to side. To other passengers it was a business, but to me only a sport. Our hearers use our ministry in much the same way, when they come to it out of idle curiosity and listen as a means of spending an idle hour. That which should ferry them across to a better state of soul, they use as a mere pleasure-boat to sail up and down in, making no progress after years of hearing."

Choked with cares. A minister talking with a dying man, who had been one of his regular hearers, was astonished at his dense ignorance of spiritual things. "You have often heard me explain these things from the pulpit," he said. "Nay, nay, sir," replied the sick man, "I never heard you preach. As soon as you began I used to settle myself to a review of the previous week's transactions and decide what I would buy and how I would conduct business next week. Many a difficult problem I settled in my pew, many a good scheme that brought in a pile of money was planned and elaborated while you preached. I never listened to you and I know nothing of what you said."

Tsimshians Brought to Christ.

A Young Native Alaskan Preacher tells of Gospel Progress among his Tribe— 6,000 Converts in the Territory and over 1,200 at Metlakahla.

ALASKA is over twelve times the size of New York State, while its population is small, being about one one hundred and fiftieth that of the latter. It is, but not altogether, a country of ice and the midnight sun. The climate varies in the different parts, but in general it is wet and mild along the southern coast. It is noted for whale, seal and salmon fisheries, gold and silver mining, and lumbering and fur business. Vegetation is plentiful. Steamers, sailing vessels, sleds and rivers are mostly the means of transportation. The country is inhabited by different tribes, such as the Eskimo within and below the Arctic Circle; the Aleutian in the south-western, and the Tlingit, Hydah and Tsimshian in the south-eastern parts. These and others differ in dialects as well as in customs.

The Russian Government had the country for one hundred and twenty-six years when the purchase was made and that was in 1867; and it was about ten years later that American missionaries began the work of evangelization and education which is now being pushed forward by some ten denominations and the United States Government. Since then, there have been made some six thousand converts, according to a recent estimate, and the encouraging outlook is that, in spite of all difficulties common in heathen lands, our Alaska, formerly known as Russian America, will be brought wholly under the sway of the Divine Master some time in the future.

The Tsimshians are a people of the North Pacific Coast. Originally the whole of this nation inhabited the northern part of British Columbia, about 450 miles north of Washington State. They numbered not less than 10,000 souls early in this present century. This people was divided into ten tribes and each had its own ruler or governor, and the whole ten rulers formed the national government of our ancestors. The customs and language throughout were the same. People were thrifty and children were compelled to learn trades peculiar to the country. Young men were taught the arts of war, and daily athletic exercises were encouraged. They had their own system for the cultivation of mental powers. Teachers usually consisted of men of large experience. They lived to be old. Parents were highly esteemed and children were not allowed to look into the faces of slaves on meeting them on the streets. They had fixed laws regarding marriages which they considered sacred, and polygamy was not practised. To them music was a natural taste, and very frequently did they sing on many occasions. Their costumes were made of wool, tanned skins, dried flesh and material from yellow-cedar, and fine roots of spruce trees. Nature supplied them with food, and rarely do traditions tell us of a threatening famine. Great feasts were observed occasionally in which leading men exhibited their gift of oratory, and sometimes presents were distributed. They were not a wandering people, hence their towns consisted of permanent homes built of red cedar trees and adorned with native colors. Each house usually accommodated four or five families, the place or seat of honor being opposite the main entrance. For the regulation of their social intercourse, especially when among strangers in other lands, certain emblems were adopted by which they could recognize each other. To perpetuate the memory of the noted dead, and to distinguish the rank of the living relatives of the dead in the tribe, a p'zhahn (so-called totem pole) bearing the social emblems was erected. The dead was cremated and his ashes were buried with ceremony. At certain times sorcerers terrorized the people by performing supposed miracles. They pretended to eat a dog or a man in connection with certain of their religious rites: but the Tsimshians were never cannibals. Furs, tanned skins, hayatsk (copper) and foreign slaves were commonly used as money. They gambled, but to a limited extent. The people believed in a god and this god had representatives in different forms of nature, and oftentimes sacrifices were made to these representatives. In times of peace they were very peaceful and any one could travel, trade, work or speak anywhere: but in times of war, war, war be to the enemy and the man that turned away from the service of his country!

Such are a few of the characteristics of our people early in this present century. How sad it is that we, ignorant of the Lord, would be first degraded and reduced to a small number before the Gospel came! Before 1850, rum, swords, muskets, money-hoarders and licentious men found our heathen people, and I shall not speak of what they have done.

In 1857, in spite of all opposition of various kinds, a servant of God, William Duncan of Beverly, Eng., under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society of London, for the first time, sounded in the ears of my people the blessed Word. A very few stood still and listened to this strange messenger. It was really a voice in the wilderness. The preacher spoke to them in their own beloved tongue. In three years, fifty souls were turned into the kingdom! Among them were the grand-father and father of the writer. The latter became an educated preacher.

About 1880, there settled at Metlakahla, B. C., some 1,200 Christians, while the remnant of the whole nation, scattered in other places, was made to know the truth. Old customs and rum habits were banished. New industries were given them, and they were self-supporting. Education was in demand. New homes, public buildings, including a Church that had a capacity for 2,000 people, were erected. Native evangelists were sent out, and strangers from afar were attracted by this settlement of Christians. They were law-abiding and the native government was of pure democracy and in strict accordance with the Provincial government. To use the words of one of our leading men at the time, "We are still a weak and poor people, only lately emancipated from the thralldom of heathenism and savage customs: but we are struggling to rise and advance to a Christian life and civilization."

Very unfortunately in 1882, our people painfully collided with the brethren in England on questions of religious doctrines, and also with the Dominion Government of Canada regarding land affairs. The "Five Years' Persecution" broke out, and when our people could no longer endure, we appealed to the American Government which kindly granted us leave to come into the land of freedom, in the summer of 1887. Our present home is at New Metlakahla, Alaska, eighty miles north of Metlakahla, B. C., and a thousand of us have been identified with the Republic. We have no bitter feelings against those who have accidentally wronged us.

Our dear friend and leader, Mr. Wm. Duncan, is still with us. As a part of the American people, we are pursuing our daily labors. We are toiling for an advanced education. We are law-abiding and patriotic, and we are not ignorant of the issues of the day. The Star-Spangled Banner is floating over us. We read the Book of books, and we worship the God of Heaven.

Through the help and direction of Dr. Sheldon Jackson, Gen. John Eaton and other worthy and generous-hearted Americans who have done so much for Alaskan peoples, the writer came to Marietta College, Ohio, in 1891, where he has begun pursuing his studies. His main object is to return to his country as soon as he gets through as a humble Christian worker, and one that can help his people in questions of business and government. He is by trade a steam-boat engineer and musician. His parents were both converted before he was born, and their family name was a kind gift from England. His father's original name was Shooquanahd, and he was called to his reward when his son was only a boy. His mother is at present an earnest Sabbath School teacher and Christian worker at New Metlakahla. His testimonies as to the saving power of Christ have been already heard in a number of gatherings, and many hearts have been stirred to aid in the needs of his country. May the Lord help him to hold on to the truth that he has learned, and make him useful in his vineyard.

GREAT SCIENTISTS AND RELIGION.

Copernicus, Kepler and Newton were earnest Christians who saw the handwriting of God in nature. Copernicus is the founder of our present astronomical system, but his gravestone bears the following inscription in Latin: "I do not expect the favor which thou hast given to Paul, nor the grace with which thou forgavest Peter; only the clemency which thou hast shown to the thief on the Cross I beseech thee to grant me!" Kepler closes his most important book with this sentence: "I thank thee, my Lord and Creator, for the joy which the work of thine hands hath given me. . . . If I have said anything unworthy of thee, or have sought to gain honor for myself rather than thee, graciously forgive me." Newton, the great naturalist, like the German poet, Klopstock, never pronounced the name of the Almighty without uncovering his head. That greatest of scientists, Karl Ritter, in his "Contemplation of Palestine," says: "The world is full of the glory of the Creator; where our ability and knowledge cease, revelation opens for us time and eternity." J. Liebig, the renowned analytical chemist, says that belief in God makes one humble and modest. Faraday, the great English naturalist, was an earnest Christian. He often explained the Scriptures in meetings and proved that he lived according to them. He sought Christ because he was humble, and found him because he was sincere. Professor Benzenberg, the founder of the Observatory of Dusseldorf, has laid down his creed in the following words, "I am a Protestant. As a Protestant, I read the writing contained in the Old and New Covenant. These writings are my religion." The late Professor of Botany in the University of Marburg, Wiegand, desired, on his deathbed, that the world should be informed that "a scientist died who was a believer." Linnaeus, one of the greatest of scientists, also learned to know and to worship God through the studies of nature. All these distinguished men were true Christians.

WHEN WRITING TO THIS OFFICE

In order to secure the promptest attention for your communications, please bear in mind that the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is divided into the following three departments, and that communications intended for any one of these departments should never contain matters of interest to any other department. Subscription Department in which only new subscriptions or renewals are handled. Address Department where all changes or rectifications of name, address or date are made. Complaint Department in which only complaints of irregular delivery receive attention. Communications to two or three departments each written on a separate sheet, may be enclosed in one envelope, but each separate sheet should have reference only to one of these departments. "Little Missionaries."

Training Spanish-American Children to Spread the Gospel of Jesus.

FOR several years past, a most earnest and successful missionary work has been conducted by two Christian ladies, Misses Caroline and Susan Strong, among the children of poor Spanish, Cuban and Mexican Catholic parents in New York city. In an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sometime ago, this work was briefly described, and the progress made by these two ladies in their efforts for the educational and spiritual improvement of their young charges, was referred to as an encouragement to other workers in similar fields. It is now over eight years since Miss Caroline Strong began to labor among the Spanish-speaking population of New York. For a considerable portion of that time, she and her sister have taught at their own home industrial and evangelical classes of young Mexican and Cuban girls, very much in the same manner as Mrs. Jamal is now doing among the poor, neglected Syrian girls in Jerusalem. It has been a loving, voluntary service, to which these ladies have devoted their energies and income. The Spanish Evangelistic Church, under the pastoral care of Rev. J. M. Lopez Guillen, was organized as an outcome of the work, and many churches have been strengthened in membership by the accession of those who have been converted through its teachings.

Within the last six months, there have been a number of applications for admission to the Home School, but the ladies have been compelled, to decline further additions, for the present at least, until a way is opened for them to extend the work. Some of the cases are very interesting. Two Mexican girls of unusual promise came to the Home a few months ago. Their father greatly desired for them the training that will prepare them for missionary work in Mexico. For fourteen years he has faithfully labored as a missionary of the Gospel among his own people, but failing in health, he came to the United States. He is now feeble, and unable to do anything for the support of his family. Portraits of the two sisters are shown in the accompanying illustration. There are many other applicants equally deserving. The cost of training and preparing each young student is about $150.

Among the features of the work at the Home School are industrial classes, a song service, Sunday School and religious instruction. There is also an industrial sewing-class for the mothers, at each meeting of which a portion of the Scriptures is read and expounded. Miss Caroline Strong, who is in charge of the work, has long been associated as an active worker of the Home Missionary Society and has also served in the missionary field in Mexico. The training is strictly undenominational. There are few fields that afford a better opportunity for devoted Gospel effort than that which she has so bravely opened up among the 45,000 Spanish-speaking people of New York and Brooklyn, most of whom are nominally Catholics, but with so little hold on religion of any sort that they and their children can hardly be regarded as belonging to any church. It is for the rescue and training of the young girls belonging to poor families among these people that the work is conducted and the signal blessing it has already received has greatly encouraged the hearts of its founders.

MORALS AND MUSCLES.

I BELIEVE in muscular Christianity. Whatever effort in our day is made to make the men and the women more athletic should have the favor of every good citizen, as well as of every Christian. I know there are persons who pride themselves on their delicacy of health. I never could see any glory in sick headache. It is a grand thing to be able to walk a great distance, but everything depends upon what you walk for. It is a great thing to be able to lift mightily, but everything depends upon what you lift. It is a great thing to rise early in the morning, but everything depends upon what you do after you get up. It is a great thing to be able to triumph, but everything depends upon what you conquer. While I denounce ruffian athleticism, I will not be understood to depreciate physical achievement. But physical energy ought to be a type of moral power. As far as we may let us cultivate physical power and then consecrate it all to God and the help of the suffering race.

How many with great physical endurance do no good! They are like a ship full manned, full rigged, capable of vast tonnage, able to endure all stress of weather, yet surging idly at the wharf, or going out on a piratical cruise when they ought to be crossing and recrossing the great ocean of human suffering and sin with God's supplies of mercy. Body and mind and soul, let us make new consecration and let us understand that the service of God is the highest service, and let us set ourselves against the despoliation of these bodies, of the sacredness of which Dr. John Mason spoke at his son's funeral, saying to the pall-bearers, as they carried casket through hall: "Move softly, move softly, you carry a temple of the Holy Ghost." Much of the useful work of the world is done by people comparatively invalid. Richard Baxter, by reason of his diseases all his days sitting in the door of the tomb, yet writing more than a hundred volumes, and sending out an influence for God that will endure as long as the "Saints' Everlasting Rest." Edward Payson, never knowing a well day, yet how he preached and how he wrote, helping thousands of souls like himself to swim in a sea of glory. Robert McCheyne, a walking skeleton, yet you know what he did in Dundee, and how he shook Scotland with zeal for God. Philip Doddridge, advised by his friends because of his illness not to enter the ministry, yet you know what he did for the "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Church and in the World." Wilberforce was told by his doctors that he could not live a fortnight, yet at that very time entering upon philanthropic enterprises that demanded the greatest endurance and persistence. Robert Hall, suffering excruciation so that often in his pulpit while preaching he would stop and lie down on a sofa, then getting up again to preach about heaven until the glories of the celestial city dropped on the multitudes, and doing more work perhaps than almost any well man in his day. We ought to realize that we shall be called upon to give an account for the employment of this physical organism. Shoulder, brain, hand, foot, we must answer for the use we have made of them.

OCEAN PERILS.

WHAT in all the world is so helpless as a ship at sea when the hurricanes attacks it? The first time I crossed the ocean I thought that the Atlantic had been slandered. I took up the cause of the abused ocean and wrote about the smile of the sea, but before I got home again I took back all I had said, and joined the assailants of the big waters. I hope for the hastening of the day when the bridge at Behring straits, which divide the coasts of America and Asia only thirty-six miles, and with no very great depth of water, shall be completed, and without asking any favors of the ocean at all, we can cross from Eastern hemisphere to Western hemisphere on something more certain than the billow. Who would not be willing to go ten thousand miles around to escape the agitations of the Atlantic? But the ocean will always have ships and crews and passengers at its mercy until "there shall be no more sea," and it becomes us to be very earnest in our prayers for those "who go down to the sea in ships." Let us thank God that the woes of navigation have been alleviated. Stout ships, brave captains, improved charts, and many comforts such as were not known to passengers of fifty years ago have made the sea more endurable. Meanwhile let all those whose business engagements or home duties or lack of means prohibit transatlantic passage, never be jealous of those who go abroad. The best place that I know of to stay on is the land. It does not rock save in exceptional earthquake. You can walk on it without staggering. Your breakfast table does not indulge in a war dance. You don't have to sit wrapped in shawls at the foot of a smokestack looking out upon an ocean of ipsecac. The only severe pang of jealousy I ever felt was when tossing on the Atlantic I thought of those who were wise enough to stay on land. In aggregating the pleasures of life, I think it will be found that those had the most happiness who had good homes and for the most part stayed there.

We do well to be more sympathetic with the men who follow the sea for a livelihood. There are more than one million of them now on the deep. Many of them are naturally the most generous and biggest hearted of the human race. The spirit of adventure seizes thousands of the young. So cool and well balanced a nature as George Washington longed for the sea, and started for the life of a sailor boy, and, although his mother said: "Oh, dear! I do wish George would stay at home and take care of the plantation," the boy sent his baggage on board the ship. The most of the family friends favored his going, and one of them wrote: "I am afraid Mrs. Washington will not keep her first resolution. She seems to dislike George's going to sea, and says several persons have told her it was a bad scheme. She offers several trifling objections, such as fond, unthinking mothers habitually suggest, and I find one word against his going has more weight with her than ten for it." But, my hearers, it was well for you and me and all Americans that George took his mother's advice and stayed at home, so that Mr. Fairfax could write: "George has been with us, and says he will be steady, and thankfully follow your advice as his best friend." Yet there has been many a George who did not take his mother's advice, or perhaps had no mother to advise him, and these boys are on the seas to-night—perhaps asleep in the hammock, perhaps climbing the ratlines, perhaps hanging to the mast of a foundered ship, perhaps the lives of five hundred or a thousand passengers depending on their fidelity. I charge you, never hear the howling of the autumnal or wintry blast without remembering those who are on the deep, or amid the storms of temptation in foreign ports.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

J. B. Lantin, Pangor, Me. To whom shall I send any funds contributed for the Minnesota sufferers?

Send to Rev. Mr. Feethim, M. E. Church, Pine City, Minn.

Mrs. S. A. Kelley, San Francisco, Cal., writes: In answer to "G. A. C. Fisher's Hall, Va." I would say that the quotation "It is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die," is a portion of James Montgomery's hymn commencing "O where shall rest be found."

John Canloss, Fort Riley, Kan. 1. Where can I purchase a book that gives the names of all creeds and the founders of the same, and a brief history of the churches? 2. At what age should one go to Moody's College? Is thirty years too old? What would be the cost of same?

1. Write to Funk & Wagnalls, publishers, New York, for Dr. Gummich's work on "Christian Creeds and Confessions." 2. For all particulars write to Rev. R. A. Torrey, Bible Institute, Chicago. The cost is about $200 a year.

Mrs. Alma V.—Chelsea, Mass., writes: I would like to know the name of the author of this morning prayer:

Now I awake and see the light,
Tis God has kept me through the night,
To him I'll raise my voice and pray,
That he will keep me through this day.

I taught this prayer to my children, many years ago, and my grandchildren have been saying it, the past ten years. I think it a suitable companion to the old familiar evening prayer of "Now I lay me down to sleep."

Mrs. L. C., Dayton, O. Our church people are shortly to have a fair, for the purpose of raising money for church improvements. Among other features of the event will be a grab-bag, a voting contest for a suit of furniture, and a "Spanish gypsy tent," where fortunes are to be told. Is it right to have such worldly amusements in a church?

We have repeatedly stated in THE MAIL-BAG that purely secular amusements should have no place within the walls of a church, which is a temple sacred to the Lord's service. The highest ecclesiastical opinion in our own day condemns the introduction of such frivolities as you have named into the house of God. See Mark 12: 41; Matt. 6: 1-4; Eph. 5: 12, 13, 16, 40; Phil. 3: 19; Gal. 5: 17-21; Jer. 5: 12; 1 Tim. 5: 6, and many similar passages all bearing on the subject.

John D. Smither, Starfield, Mo. Were the Apostles converted in the sense spoken of in John 3: 5, 6 during Christ's life, or not until they were filled with the Spirit at Pentecost? Did not Christ immediately before his own death speak of Peter's conversion as yet future (Luke 22: 32)?

The descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost was to give special powers. It was not to give converting grace. We cannot conceive of Christ sending out unconverted men to preach as he did (Matt. 10: 5-8). The reference to Peter's conversion meant his restoration. The Revisers do not use the word in the new version. By his denial of Christ Peter fell, as David and other good men have fallen. It does not imply that he had not been converted before.

N. B. Fowles, Orange City, Fla. 1. Why is the reference to three bearing witness in heaven (1 John 5: 7) omitted in the Revised Version? 2. Does Ezekiel 37: 24, 25, imply that David himself will be king over God's people?

1. The oldest manuscripts do not contain the words except as they appear in the eighth verse in the Revised Version. They appeared first as a marginal note and a manuscript of the eighth century has them incorporated in the text; but no earlier manuscripts have them.

2. As John the Baptist fulfilled the prophecy about Elias, so it may be that Christ, who is known in prophecy as "the son of David" may be referred to in the passage. Or, as the saints are to rule with Christ in the millennium it may be that David himself may rule the Jews.

F. E. D. Greene, Me. What are the principal points of difference between the Baptists and Methodists?

The most conspicuous is that the Baptists baptize by immersion, Christians on profession of faith in Christ, while Methodists baptize infants by sprinkling. There is also a difference in church government. A Baptist Church is self-governing inviting its own minister and making its own rules of administration. In the Methodist Church, the bishop appoints the minister of a church, after conferring with the presiding elders, who usually are able to acquaint him with the wishes of a church; but he is not bound to comply with them if in his judgment the appointment desired would be injudicious.

Mrs. F. Moore, South Bombay, N. Y. What are church members to do when their young minister Sunday after Sunday, preaches Dr. Talmage's sermons?

A pastor has no right to preach another pastor's sermons, without due acknowledgment as though they were his own productions. At the same time, there are many small churches in out-of-the-way parishes where Dr. Talmage's sermons are regularly read from pulpit or platform every Sunday; but in such cases there is no attempt at concealing their authorship. If your minister does not care to make the effort at original production he ought at least to be sufficiently honest to credit the source from which he borrows and then leave the matter of approval or disapproval to his congregation. It is not improbable that he has concluded that the congregation profits more by his choice of sermons than if he were to deliver his own productions and that therefore he regards it as excusable. If he were candid about it, his congregation might take the same view and agree with him.

D. J. H. Cochran, Ga. 1. In your answer to L. J. C., on Nov. 7, you speak of the ten tribes being "lost;" do you mean that they were eternally lost in the spiritual meaning of the term? 2. What is the meaning of Satan being loosed a little season (Rev. 20: 3)?

1. No, we mean lost as a separate nation. They probably intermarried with other nations and were absorbed. 2. The prophecy is very mysterious and there is no completely satisfactory explanation. The only reasonable theory is that it is a final test of human fidelity. Satan is to be allowed to once more tempt men and prove whether after their experience of Christ's reign they will yield as did our first parents.

B. C. G.—Does God refuse to forgive sins which are not confessed before men? Is a man bound, in order to obtain God's forgiveness, to tell his friends or his brethren in church membership the sins he committed before his conversion?

We think God does not require that of him in all cases. If he repents and shows the sincerity of his repentance by resolutely quitting his sins; if he confesses his sins to God and beseeches him for Christ's sake to forgive him he will be forgiven. If he has defrauded any man he ought to go to that man and ask his forgiveness and make restitution. He ought also to confess in general terms to the church that he has led a wicked life, if he has done so. To confess in detail can serve no useful purpose and we can conceive of circumstances in which it might do irreparable injury to others. The expression, "Confess your faults one to another" (James 5: 16) does not, we think, refer to public confession.

Constant Reader, Somersworth, N. H. 1. Are we to conclude from Luke 22: 17-20 that at the institution of the Lord's Supper the cup was used both before and after the distribution of the bread? 2. What is meant by the holy kiss (Rom. 16: 16)?

1. The cup mentioned in the seventeenth verse was probably one of the ceremonies of the Paschal feast and formed no part of the Lord's Supper. Christ's remark about it being the last time he would drink of it seems to connect it with the Passover celebration as a dying institution. The cup mentioned in the twentieth verse is the Eucharistic cup. The special revelation to Paul (1 Cor. 11: 23) is considered the authoritative account. 2. A custom prevailed in the early church of the members kissing each other at the celebration of the Lord's Supper as a token of brotherly love, but was afterwards abandoned. It is probably to this custom that the Apostle referred.

By a Sister.—Brooklyn, N. Y. That a dear relative suffering from incurable illness may be spiritually comforted and brought to perfect trust in the Savior.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE OLDEST REPUBLIC.

A GRAND festival was held recently at San Marino, the quaint city of which a picture appears on this page. It is situated on the shores of the Adriatic, north-west of the Italian city of Ancona. It is on a craggy mountain 2635 feet high and constitutes with the scattered habitations on the mountain side, the smallest Republic in the world, being only nineteen years in circumfrence. For fourteen hundred years it has maintained its existence as an independent State, and it celebrated its centenary by erecting a new and beautiful city-house, the dedication of which was the occasion of the festival. No other Republic in the world can boast of so long an existence and the people of San Marino do not forget the distinction. "I leave you free to all mankind," said Marinus, the founder of the little State as he lay dying; and the people have safely kept their freedom to this day. They number in all about nine hundred, and foreigners included. Their government is practically the same as at the beginning of their history. A Senate of thirty members, elected for life, forms the legislative branch. A President and two Censors are the executive. Three judges, elected by the way, must not be natives, are elected by the people and form the entire judicial staff, charged with the duty of trying all causes. Several physicians, surgeons and veterinary surgeons, and foreigners, live there, and are handsomely paid by the State and the people must attend to any sick persons without charge. The Republic consists of a town of forty houses. The Republic has its own coinage, its own postage stamps and its own treasury, which is never empty. The city has a magnificent outlook over the Adriatic, the Adriatic, the Adriatic, and that estate volcanic which Dante immediately recognize as the one from which the poet drew his description of the entrance to Purgatory. The Republic is interesting for many reasons, but chiefly because, while inherently weak and surrounded by powerful neighbors who could easily have absorbed it, it looks proudly down from its mountain top, conquered after fourteen centuries. So with that kingdom which its Founder named "a city set on a hill." It has been assailed and persecuted again and again, but never destroyed, and of that kingdom there is to be no end. (Dan. 2: 44.)

Afflict of Diseases.
An important medical conference was held in New York last week to listen to the report of an eminent physician who had been conducting a hazardous experiment on a patient suffering from cancer. There was a large attendance of physicians who have lately been aroused to the urgent need of some more effectual means of treating this malignant disease which is rapidly increasing here in Europe. It appears that in the United States alone the number of victims has increased from nine to the thousand, and that the ratio in 1850, to thirty-three thousand in 1890. The lecturer said that some time ago, he had a patient suffering from cancer, of whose recovery under the ordinary treatment there was not the slightest hope. He therefore felt justified in trying an unusual course of treatment which he was aware was attended with extreme danger. It was to inject around the diseased part a toxine culture from a fatal case of erysipelas. The treatment had been entirely successful for the patient was well and was produced at the lecture for the examination of the physicians. The doctor said that he had subsequently treated two other patients in the same way and both had recovered. The injection which would have produced a fatal disease in a healthy person had thus cured a person suffering from another disease. It has long been known that two poisons will neutralize each other, and that the best antidote to one poison is often another poison as deadly as the first, but it will be a surprise to many people to learn that the physician thinks we may find a remedy for one disease in another. It is not so that spiritual maladies can be cured. The only sure remedy for them is the divine life which Christ imparts to all who believe in him. (John 10: 28.)

A Suspended Consciousness.

A surgical operation on an old resident of Lubeck, Me., was recently performed with interesting results. The patient was over fifty years of age, and had lived all his life in that neighborhood. He was considered "daft" by his neighbors, and in fact had not ordinary intelligence. He could pergous to those adopted for the restoration of this man's reason. Some afflictive providence removes his property, or his honorable station or something else that was holding his thoughts to this life and causing him to forget God. (Ps. 119: 71.)

Two Juvenile Hermits.

The absence from home of two boys has occasioned some alarm to their families who reside in a Long Island village. The boys were about fourteen years old and have been close companions. Their homes are not far apart and their respective parents are on intimate terms. The boys disappeared suddenly without giving any intimation of their going. For several weeks previous they had spent their play-hours away from home, but no notice was taken of it, as they always returned before bed-time. But when twenty-four hours passed and they did not come home, their parents were alarmed and search was made for them. No trace was found of them for four days, and their families were beginning to fear that some fatal accident had occurred. But on the fourth day, when the search had been given up, a man reported that in passing through the adjacent woods he had noticed a column of smoke ascending from what seemed to be a dugout in the thickest part of the forest. The fathers of the missing boys at once started for the place indicated, and there found their sons. They had excavated a room five feet deep and about seven feet square. They had supplied it with provisions, and had with them two revolvers, a couple of large knives, and a clothes-line arranged as a lasso. In this miserable dug-out they had been living since they left home, while search was being made for them.

When the whole was completed she offered it as a free gift to the town. But there were political bickerings among the authorities which developed a deadlock and for two years the gift has remained unaccepted. During that time the town has levied taxes on the building, which the donor has paid. She did not wish the town to be deprived of the benefit of her gift through the dilatoriness of the authorities, so she opened it at her own expense. Now, however, the dominant political party has decided that it ought to have the right of appointing a protégé of its own as librarian. As the lady is to have the privilege of paying the librarian's salary, she naturally demurs to the proposed arrangement and finally, weary of the lack of appreciation and continual demands on her purse, she has closed the library and withdrawn her offer of the gift. If this account of the treatment she has received is correct, it is not surprising that her patience is exhausted. There is nothing so repugnant to a well-constituted mind as ingratitude; yet nothing is more common than the lack of appreciation of the greatest of all blessings, which God offers to the world in salvation through his beloved Son. If his patience and forbearance had not been infinite it would have been withdrawn ages ago. (Rom. 2: 4.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Baltimore Synod of the Presbyterian Church declared that "no political party has the right to expect the support of Christian men that does not place itself on record as opposed to the licensing of saloons."

The Success of Last Winter's Revival Work in New York and Brooklyn has encouraged its leaders to make arrangements for another series of special meetings. Dr. A. C. Dixon has opened the campaign by a weekly service to be held on Thursday afternoons in Broome Street Tabernacle.

The Evangelical Alliance for the United States held a memorial service in honor of the late Hon. John Jay, LL.D., on Nov. 20 in the Madison Square Garden. President Seth Low presided, and among the speakers were Bishop A. Cleveland Cox, Hon. Joseph H. Choate, and Hon. Chauncey M. Depew.

Mr. Moody has commenced his evangelistic work in Toronto under most favorable auspices. Preparatory services were held in many churches. On Sunday, November 4, the first service at Massey Hall, were crowded to overflowing, more than 4,000 people being present, while many more were unable to gain entrance.

The American Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance held its fifteenth annual convention in Springfield, Ohio, Nov. 1-4. Over 200 delegates represented twenty-six of the thirty-five seminaries in the alliance. The Alliance commissions Mr. James Edward Adams to visit the seminaries in the interest of foreign missions.

The Receipts of the American Board for Oct. are less than those for October 1893 by $1,713. The outlook is now becoming very serious. Unless the friends of the Mission come speedily to its relief the Board will have no alternative but to diminish its force of missionaries or abandon some of its fields of labor.

The Financial Statement of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church from April 1 to Nov. 1 of the present year shows a total increase over those of last year of $50,291. The total receipts are $316,670. The contributions from the churches decreased, but there was a gain from the Woman's Executive Committee and from legacies.

The Home of the Friendless at 29 E. Twenty-ninth street, New York, will as usual celebrate Thanksgiving by providing a special dinner for the 170 boys and girls in the Institution. In the afternoon there will be music and games for the children. Contributions to the fund for supplying the homeless children with this feast will be gratefully received at the Home.

A Native of the South Sea Islands on board the missionary ship "Robert W. Logan," was so much impressed with the good work done by the missionaries that he called on the agent of the American Board at Honolulu and handed over to him his Savings Bank book, desiring the whole amount to be used in the work of the Board. The total was $700.

An Excellent Work is Being Done in Chicago by Miss Nettie Houghton. Sometime ago she received a legacy which provides her with a living, and she has given her life to the service of her less fortunate sisters. She made it known that she would gladly advise and help any girl who might need help and had no friends. The number who availed themselves of her offer was enormous. She busied herself in securing employment for such as needed it and in serving them in other ways. She has been instrumental in saving many girls from ruin and some from suicide. She recommends the life to any lady who has a sympathetic heart and has time at her disposal. There is sorrow in it, but, she says, no one can realize how much happiness there is in it, who has not tried it in her own person.

SAN MARINO, THE WORLD'S OLDEST REPUBLIC, FOUNDED 1400 YEARS AGO.

form simple farming duties, and was very quiet and inoffensive. He was, however, given to silly pranks which brought on him a good deal of ridicule and caused him to be bantered by the boys. It appears that when he was a boy of fifteen, he was a bright intelligent lad, making good progress at school and was expected to come to prominence. But one day he was trying to harness an unbroken colt, and received a kick from the animal which fractured his skull. The wound healed, but he became the dull, spiritless, foolish creature that he has remained for thirty-five years. In a slight ailment recently, a clever surgeon attended him and was interested in his case. After his recovery he examined the man's head and persuaded his friends to allow him to perform the operation known as trepanning. A portion of the skull was removed and it was found that a minute piece of bone was pressing on the brain. This was taken out and the part of the skull replaced. When the patient recovered consciousness, the first question he asked was whether the colt got away. He is perfectly sane now, but the past thirty-five years are a blank to him. He has not the slightest knowledge of anything that occurred since the colt kicked him in his boyhood. Many a man is compelled to regard the years of his past life as a blank and worse than a blank, so far as really living to God is concerned, and he often comes to consciousness of the fact by means analogous to those adopted for the restoration of this man's reason. Some afflictive providence removes his property, or his honorable station or something else that was holding his thoughts to this life and causing him to forget God. (Ps. 119: 71.)

An Unappreciated Gift.

The representatives of a New York lady who is now travelling in Europe gave out for publication last week a remarkable story. They say that some time ago the lady desiring to benefit a town in Connecticut with which her family had old associations, decided to present it with a building for a free library. She purchased a site and erected a handsome stone building, the interior being finished in hard wood. The cost of the edifice, exclusive of the site was sixty thousand dollars, beside the money expended in examining other libraries in order to secure the best models for interior arrangement. The lady's generosity did not end here. She collected a large number of standard works, with which she filled one room as a nucleus for a library.

Lonely Mar Saba.

No Woman allowed to Enter Its Inhospitable Gates—A Dreary Monastic Life—The Tame Birds and Their Keepers.

HERE is a profundity of silence that hinders sleep. I have never appreciated the fact more sensibly than in the early hours of the new day we greet from the bald mountain-top on which our camp is pitched at Mar Saba. The world is in a dead swoon. From the time the bells chime out for the first service, until I hear the shuffle of the muleteers' bare feet upon the rock as they feed their beasts, and the subdued clatter of pan and dish in the kitchen tent testify that John is getting ready to feed us, the beating of my own heart is absolutely the only sound I hear.

We have finished breakfast before we have any token that there other living things beside ourselves in the vast solitude. Then the interruption is sudden and peculiar. Alcides is filling his fountain-pen, and I unscrewing mine to see if it also needs attention, when right between us fly two birds tied together by a leash that, getting entangled about Alcides' legs, checks their flight. Around the corner of the nearest tent comes David in pursuit, and at his heels the more deliberate figure of a Bedouin who looks on in apparent unconcern, while the pretty creatures—a species of orange-and-black grackle unfamiliar to us—are captured.

David has had an order from Lord Somebody, an English or Scotch nobleman, who is a zealous ornithologist, for five hundred of these birds. As they are to be found nowhere except in this neighborhood and about the Southern shores of the Dead Sea, it is necessary to depute a native of the region to procure them, and our Bedouin friend has the commission.

"He is a great cheat," subjoins the dragoman. "He wants me to pay him four shillings for the pair, when he snares them without difficulty in the valley down there at the bottom of the pass! They are very tame, for the monks feed them here three times a day. He is a rascal who has no conscience."

While he grumbles, the birds, held tenderly between his strong hands, have fastened upon his thumbs with all the strength of their little beaks. The feeding of them within the convent walls is one of the few human enjoyments vouchsafed to the brothers of Mar Saba. Other wild things—jackals, foxes and wolves—make friends with the recluses, and have their stated times of feeding, regulated—as we are told, and it is possible, with truth—by the chiming of the bells as they mark the hours of service. One's heart contracts with an odd physical pain in hearing of this phase of the starved, narrowed, belittling round of existence decreed by the leaders of these men's souls.

The current of compassion is somewhat changed by the appearance of a holy brother in the costume of the order, who leaves the pale of sanctity, bearing to the pale-faced strangers, not the blessing and good will of the community, but rosaries, wooden forks and spoons, charms, walking-sticks, and other traps for the coin of unwary heretics. He spreads his wares in sullen silence upon the rock, and in silence as sullen, stands looking down at them. The Bedouin "cheat" has drawn forth a long pipe from the folds of his abieh and smokes in tranquil contentment, sure of getting at least one-third of what he has asked for the half-domesticated grackles; his bare-legged son gazes at the collection of "curios" I am turning over with uncovetous fingers, while the kodak gets the picture of a dark-visaged, bad-eyed fellow whom one would not choose to meet in one of the lonely ravines intersecting the Valley of Fire. In fact, as the dragoman informs us, this famous monastery is in our degenerate day a sort of penal settlement for monastic culprits. A member of the present fraternity is a notorious murderer from Port Said, his residence here being equivalent to imprisonment for life.

Our merchant makes no more effort to sell his wares than if he were a young saleslady, brave in frizzettes and rhinestones, behind the counter of a New York emporium. If we want anything, we can take it; if not, leave it. His sulkiness increases rather than diminishes at David's courteous petition to be allowed, upon payment of a gratuity, to conduct Alcides to the convent. Gathering up his wares, the brother restores them to his basket and stalks on ahead of us to the little table-land under the walls of the detached tower where I am to be left.

"If he is a specimen article, I do not envy you your visit," I say philosophically to for my gravity. I sheathe the pen, close the book, and laugh outright in their faces. After a slight start of surprise, they join in the merriment, and fall to asking questions, not one of which I comprehend.

I wear upon the front of my corsage a brilliant carnation, brought from Jerusalem, and presently drop it into the girl's hand. She exclaims with delight, smells it, shows it proudly to her mother, and finally hides it carefully in the bosom of her gown. Whatever glory of blossoming spring may bring to these wilds, it is plain that a flower in winter is a phenomenon to the untutored daughter of the desert. She would be pretty but for the blue tattooing disfiguring her face. A line of polka spots run clear across her forehead; another row defines the lower lip, and three are "powdered" irregularly upon one cheek; a tattooed bracelet of Grecian pattern encircles each wrist, and a square of the same design is upon the back of her right hand. Seeing me look at them, she laughs, pulls a long, cruel-looking needle from the front of her mother's gown, and goes on to show me how the marks have been made, and that her mother is the artist. When I shrink and signify that the operation must be painful and disagreeable, she laughs again—the infantine gurgle one never hears in our country from a child over ten years old, and pulls up her loose sleeve to display a more elaborate pattern sprawling all the way to her elbow, the upper part still raw from the needle.

Two ragged children have joined the group, and their inquisitive forefingers are unpleasantly familiar with my dress and portfolio. Twice the mother, at my appeal, boxed their ears, but without outcry, or any sign that the blow is unwelcome, they retract her attention and her mother's suspicion from the tell-tale kodak while the end is secured. She is actually in the act, arrested upon the half-step by the dragoman's call—an untamed creature as wild and as one of the hares we frightened out of a hollow yesterday. Her brothers and father are easily persuaded to stare at their portraits, but we see her no more until we drop down, as it were, upon a grove of black tents from a steep ridge two miles later, and recognize her as the centre of a knot of attentive listeners, enchained by the narrative of her morning "outing."

HAPPY "GOOD-WILL FARM" How the Work of Caring for Needy Boys Has Progressed at East Fairfield, A Christian Industrial Home.

SINCE the account of the beginning of the work for needy and impecunious boys, at East Fairfield, Me., appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some years ago, there has been steady progress and development. At that time there were three cottages at the farm, each of which accommodated a family of boys. Good-Will Cottage was opened as a home for boys Sept. 1, 1889; Sunrise Cottage was dedicated Sept. 1, 1890; and the Rule Cottage, Sept. 1, 1891; Prospect Cottage, Sept. 1, 1892; Fogg Cottage, the gift of Mr. H. H. Fogg, of Bangor, and Bailey Cottage, the gift of Mr. C. M. Bailey, of Winthrop, were both dedicated at the same hour, Sept. 1, 1893. The Endeavor Cottage, built with a fund for the purpose by the Christian Endeavor Societies of Maine, was dedicated August 1, 1894. This last cottage is nearly ready for occupancy, and will be the home for a family of fifteen boys. It will probably be in use in a few weeks. The Sunshine Cottage and a small hall were destroyed by fire early in August while nearly all the boys belonging to the farm were camping out in the Maine woods. Prospect Cottage, at the present time, is used as a school-house, and for industrial training purposes. In it are the two office school rooms, a room for clothing department, another for groceries and supplies, and a room for central try. This cottage will eventually be a home for another family of boys.

Some earnest friends of the work have signified their intention of providing a school building for the farm at a cost of $100. They will also furnish the building after it is completed. Preparations are being made by the "Knights and Ladies of the Round Table" for a fair, which is to be held in New York City early in December, in connection with this project, and an architect is now at work upon the plan.

At the present time three teachers are employed. Mr. W. W. Mayo, a man who has met with marked success as a teacher, is at the head of the educational staff.

There will be seventy-five boys in the homes during the winter, each of the cottages now in use being occupied by a family of fifteen, the sixth cottage being used for one more year for school purposes. The work is dependent upon benevolent contributions. There is no endowment. The cost of supporting a boy at the home is $104 a year, or $2 per week.

TENDERNESS.

THERE are faces you meet in the day,
And pass in your thoughtlessness,
That are sealed with tears at midnights,
For want of your tenderness.

There are eyes that gaze in wonder,
At your dainty loveliness;
Can you give them a cheerful greeting,
Or a smile of your tenderness?

There are aching hearts around you,
That cry in their sore distress,
Though not a word is uttered
For a mite of your tenderness.

Have you poured from your cup of blessing
To sweeten their bitterness,
One drop from the fount which gushes
For you, with such tenderness?

They need, what would cost you nothing
But a little friendliness;
Would it lessen your crowded storehouse
To give them some tenderness?

Oh, give to them words and glances,
And a share in your blessedness,
And a hundred fold will they pay you
For your gentle tenderness.

the favored pair, and settle myself for half an hour with my note-book.

A folded rug makes the rock passably comfortable as a seat; the air is still and bracing, the sunshine delightful. I have written fast and satisfactorily for perhaps twenty minutes, when a shadow strikes the page, and I raise my eye. Two women, one middle-aged, one young, both clad in the dark blue gowns and veils of the Bedouins, have arisen as out of the rock, and are staring placidly at me. Behind the older woman a boy of five, or thereabouts, is peeping around her skirts. To test their mood and manners, I write on in a serious disregard of their presence. The mother sinks to the ground and watches my fingers and pen, intent and mute. The girl lifts my gloves and veil from the rock where I have laid them, and examines them closely, and as I give no sign of noticing her occupation, goes on to finger the trimmings upon my skirt, calling her mother's attention to it in childish glee, then, passing her fingers lightly up the cloth of the garment until she reaches my sleeve, picks at the braiding to see if it will come off. The whole proceeding is as inoffensive as if she were a baby, but I do object when she lays the tip of her finger upon my pen. At my gesture of disapproval the mother chides the meddler sharply, and pointing to the convent, evidently tells her that I am writing of or drawing it. Thenceforward, two pairs of wondering eyes follow the flowing ink, looking from the page to the building, and back again, until the exhibition is too much turn to the charge, until I get up, collect my belongings and walk to the edge of the table-rock almost overhanging the courtyard of the monastery. Two black-robed friars are pacing a short balcony in the sunshine, like bears in a cage; in the stillness I can hear the whirr and whizz of a hundred pairs of wings. The grackles are feeding upon the crumbs and grains flung from the front of the convent into the defile, and strewn upon the pavement of the inner courts.

I have not shaken off my juvenile tormentors. One tugs at my skirt, another lifts the flap of the writing-case in my hand, a third, the biggest and dirtiest of the trio, and who rejoices in the only pair of shoes in the party (which, by the way, reminds us of the Gibeonite stratagem of "old shoes and clouted upon their feet,") pushes impudently to the front and demands "back-sheesh." At this opportune moment I espied David and Alcides in the convoy of a lay brother descending an outer flight of stairs in going from one wing of the building to another, and call cheerily to them. The dragoman takes in the situation at a glance, and shouts out something to my besetting neighbors that frees me from annoyance. They fall into the background and remain there until the return of my escort.

The girl, who must be about sixteen, withdraws modestly—putting a corner of her coarse linen veil over her mouth—at sight of two men, one young and pale-skinned. As I am determined to get a picture of her, all David's tact is brought into play to dis-

PREMIUM ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has succeeded in arranging for a remarkable series of premiums. First of all, of course, is the International Teacher's Bible, with all the Helps and Maps, set in Roy type, Divinity circuit binding over-laying at the ends, with red under gold edges. This eminently serviceable and pretty Bible is again offered, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at $2. When ordering please mention Premium Offer: B-Five.

Next in order comes that most beautiful of Bibles known as the International Emerald Teacher's Bible, London Clear Type Edition, leather bound and leather lined, with silk book-mark and silk head-bands and a silk sewed. There were times when a Bible like this would cost $8. To-day it cannot be bought everywhere even at $5; but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers it, together with a year's subscription, at $3. This book will last a lifetime. When ordering mention Premium Offer: B-Three.

We also continue to offer Dr. Talmage's most marvelous book, "From Manger to Throne," which has proved of infinite value, to tens of thousands of people, presenting in it does a new view of the life of our Saviour, magnificently illustrated, with many pictures based on photos brought from Palestine by Dr. Talmage, while journeying in the Holy Land with a view to gathering material for this, his latest and greatest work, "From Manger to Throne" with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. Mention Premium Offer: B-Four.

Next to a Teachers' Bible, the "Gospel Hymns" sung by Moody and Sankey in the great evangelistic services throughout America and England, are dearest to many Christian's heart. Never before has it been possible to secure these 730 Hymns, constituting the books usually known as Gospel Hymns 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 all in one volume, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, succeeded in obtaining a large edition of these marvelously soul-stirring hymns in combined form, without a duplicate and without an omission, printed from large type and set to music, and beautifully bound in green cloth, with red edges and gilt. A handsome hymnal has never been put on the market, and these "Six volumes of Sacred Song, complete in One," are offered to subscribers with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $2. If you are entirely pleased, send it back, and we will refund your money. Messrs. Moody and Sankey in commending the volume say: "These hymns in this book have been greatly blessed to many in our meetings as well as outside of them. May they in this combined form continue to bring the blessing of Him to whose honor and glory they have been sung in this and other lands."

This very desirable Premium contains over 700 pages, each page measuring 5 1/2 inches. When ordering this Premium, please mention Premium Offer: B-Two.

Finally, we offer Dr. Talmage's great book, "The Pathway of Life," a large edition of which has been specially prepared for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Talmage kindly consenting to waive all claims of royalty. This great book containing 544 pages, having for a frontispiece a picture of Dr. Talmage recently taken in Australia, embellished by 200 beautiful engravings, in exceedingly handsome binding of cloth and gold, and sent out into the world to make it better and more useful and more serviceable, offered in connection with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $2. REST AWHILE.

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

"Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile."—Mark 6: 31.

THE desert place God bids us enter in,
To mortal flesh so undesirable.
Is but a school where we shall learn from sin
To cease, and in His blessed fulness dwell.

He knows the rest the Christian so much needs
He cannot get amid life's turmoil wild.
And hence, with melting tenderness, he pleads
"Come to a desert place and rest my child."

He sees, perchance, where vain ambition's fire,
Within our hearts God's precious gifts con-sumed;

And how, alas! each inborn true desire,
'Mid chilling damps of worldliness was doomed.

My soul, do not refuse to turn aside
Into some desert place: there He will prove
To thee His tender care, and graciously confide
The secrets of unutterable love.

FAITH AND TRUST.

THOU that seest everywhere,
In ocean and in dell:
Give us the faith that clings to Thee,
Who doest all things well.

O, teach our sad and wayward hearts
The road that leads to Thee;
And in our blindness, may we still Thy loving children be.

LOOKING UPWARD.

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

JESUS, when the billows roll,
Threatening to engulf my soul,
When my earthly friends forsake,
Then I pray for Thy name's sake,
Let me see Thy smiling face;
Hold me in a close embrace.

When the waves in wild uproar
Dash against the fretted shore,—
When the rugged path and steep
Leads too near the surging deep,—
Then my ark, my refuge be,
Let me find my home in Thee.

When this day of life is o'er,
When I reach the shining shore,
When I shall have entered in,
Ransomed from the guilt of sin,
Joined the loved ones gone before,
Met to part again no more,—
Then will my poor heart be glad
That for this little space 'twas sad.

CHEERFULNESS.

SERVE God and be cheerful." Religion
Looks all the more lovely in white:
And God is best served by his servant
When, smiling, he serves in the light.

"Serve God and be cheerful." Live nobly.
Do right and do good. Make the best.
Of the gifts and the work put before you.
And to God without fear leave the rest.

THE CLOSING DISPENSATION.

Rome's Loss of Temporal Power and the Influx of Jewish Settlers to Palestine
Two Signs of the Second Advent.

BY REV. E. W. BLYTH, M.A.

THE present goodness of God ordered that the great hope of Christ's second advent should, in every age, adapt itself to the power of vision. All the lengths of the telescope were not adapted to the early Christians: they could see something only, after what we should call a rough and general fashion, as men look through a folded telescope. The events indicated by prophecy had for the most part not occurred; but as these have been revealed and have succeeded one another in the history of the Church and of the world, the distances in the glass have been reduced, and a measure of exactitude attained. By slow degrees, step upon step, and line by line, here a little, there a little, now to this honored saint, now to that one, the true interpretation of prophecy has been revealed.

What led to the discovery that in symbolic prophecy a day means a year? Scripture itself, in the Gospel history, found the key which was to unlock the prophets. A prophecy of this kind had been entrusted to Daniel. Sixty-nine weeks of years (Daniel 9: 25), and then Messiah should come. Sixty-nine weeks are 483 days. But Messiah did not come after the lapse of 483 literal days. Messiah did not come after the interval of 483 years! Like the forty days of the spies in Canaan, or of Ezekiel—each day for a year—so it proved with this grand prophecy relative to the first coming of Jesus Christ in the flesh.

There is analogy in Scripture for what may be called chronological expectation of Christ's second coming. An intelligent chronology may be looked for in the Christian just as much as the spirit which scoffs at all dates, times and seasons, may be looked for in the world. The question, "Where is the promise of his coming?" is to be met by the humble assertion of things and events which have happened, or are happening, according to prophetic indications of time as well as place. God has given a chronology. It has been veiled—and still is veiled—according to his wisdom and his knowledge how far the human heart is ready for, and can understand its unveiling. But the chronology exists—even to the day and hour—and is a part of God's great scheme for the government of the earth and all the celestial firmament.

Have we now no similar guiding chronological marks to that of the seventy weeks? Yes, there is the 1260 years of the Papal Apostacy, which are the exact half of a complete week of 2520 years each day being a year of 360 days or years; 360 days constituted the Jewish year, and seven times such a year is 2520 days). But "seven times" (years) is the prophetic period mentioned to Moses, and typified by the image seen by Nebuchadnezzar, the time set for the punishment of the Jewish nation and for Gentile dominion; in other words, those "times of the Gentiles" (alluded to by our Lord), which commenced during the Babylonian Empire.

At the end of these "seven times," or 2520 years, the saints, under Messiah, are to possess the kingdom. The smaller period of 1260 years also is spoken of as times in Scripture—"time (year), times, and half a time;" and it may thus be seen how in all probability the larger period terminates simultaneously with the smaller.

Another chronological period—the 2300 year-days of Daniel, dated from some period of the Persian Monarchy, which followed the Babylonian—leads to the same conclusion, namely, that the saints shall have the dominion, that Messiah shall come, and that (as in the last case cited) the sanctuary so long given over to Gentile polluters shall be cleansed somewhere about the very time in which we ourselves live!

Like Daniel of old, reasoning over the words of God by Jeremiah, or like holy Simeon and Anna in New Testament times, we too, then, have our reasonable ground of joyous expectation from the figures before us—2520 years from the monarchy of Babylon, 1260 years from the generally accepted date of the Papal Apostacy, 2300 years from the Persian monarchy until the cleansing of the sanctuary; these, like the light-houses on an island near the coast, warning the mariner that he is near land, tell us that the stream of time has borne us near to that haven where we would be.

The Fallen Champion.

Dr. James McCosh the Eminent Ex-President of Princeton University, Scholar, Author, and Divine, Passes Away.

NO intelligent Christian, appreciating the present situation of the Church of Christ, could read unmoved the announcement made on November 17, that James McCosh was dead. Such men as he are sorely needed in this day and one could wish that we might keep them with us forever. He stood for forty years in the front rank of the champions of Christianity, and had a glorious record for valiant service in Christ's cause. It is no exaggeration to say that no man of his time and country did more to hold the present generation faithful to revealed religion. For twenty years he was President of Princeton University, and he taught and trained the men there, who, to-day in a thousand pulpits scattered through the land, are not ashamed to preach the old Gospel of Christ. It would be useless to tell them that the Gospel is antiquated, obsolete, a religion for the ignorant and the foolish, which no man of intelligence can believe. Apart from their own convictions, they would say that it was no mark of imbecility to believe in a religion which satisfied the keen, critical faculty and profound mind of McCosh, the greatest Christian philosopher and logician of his day. On so high a level did he stand in the esteem of scholars in Germany, England and America that it he had never taught theology, but merely avowed his belief in the Bible and Christianity, that avowal alone might well have been a ground of confidence for weaker men.

But it was not Princeton alone that benefited by Dr. McCosh's profound learning and incomparable abilities. His pen was always busy and his works were eagerly read on both sides the Atlantic. To the last, Dr. McCosh kept abreast of the thought of the day and even in the great agitation over the question of evolution, when his age and position might have been expected to force on him a conservative attitude, he welcomed the new light and adroitly used it to prove the infinite wisdom of God. With all his learning, and all his talents his faith was that of a child.

Dr. McCosh was a Scotchman by birth, the son of a small farmer. He studied in the country school and went thence to Edinburgh University. He entered the Presbyterian Church and held livings at Arbroath and Brechin, but promptly resigned when Chalmers raised the standard of liberty. McCosh entered the Free Church and was one of its ablest and most zealous advocates. The publication of his great work on the "Method of the Divine Government" led to his appointment as a Professor in the University of Belfast. Thence Princeton called him to the Presidency and he accepted. He came here in 1868 and until 1888 when being seventy-seven years old, the weight of years compelled him to resign, Princeton enjoyed an uninterrupted period of prosperity. The college buildings trebled in number and value, the number of students and professors more than trebled and the financial resources of the college were enormously increased. Dr. McCosh continued to reside at Princeton and to assist in the work of the college until his death.

SOIL-TRANSFORMATION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Dec. 9. Luke 8: 4-15.

WHAT is a man to do who finds on self-examination that his character is typified in the Parable of the Sower by one of the three kinds of ground that were unproductive? Sometimes the farmer finds it impossible to change the nature of the soil, but the spiritual, moral and mental ground may be changed. The fact is attested by experience, and should afford encouragement to every earnest seeker. The hard-trodden path, the rocky soil, and the thorny ground may become the good ground bringing forth fruit. The process may be difficult, even painful, but the result is worth all its costs, and it is something to know that success is possible. There is reason for hope in the very fact of the diagnosis. To recognize the existence and nature of a malady is a long step in the direction of recovery. What then shall one do who makes the discovery? Obviously in each case there is the one efficacious measure of earnest prayer. That tion, and stability seems impossible. The seed, which sprouted so quickly and so hopefully, loses its vigor, and the young plant fails. But it need not die. The high pressure growth is not demanded, and it is not healthy. Let the depressed man, who has fallen from ecstasy into actuality, but keep his eye fixed on the eternal verities; let him realize that it is not by his feelings that he is saved, but by the Saviour who changes not, and let him cling to him for his life. But it is the thorny ground which is most common. Care and pleasure are alike potent foes of the Gospel seed. But the former may be carried to the great Burden-bearer, and the latter may be cheerfully relinquished for his sake. To each and all the promise is sure that they who seek the boon shall find it.

ILLINOIS STATE C. E. UNION.

Christian Endeavor holds Illinois in high honor as one of its best States and it is there that it has won some of its most glorious victories. Early in the history of the movement, Illinois perceived its value and adopted it. The first societies were watched with interest, and course is a duty in any case and it is the surest and most essential method. "I will take the stony heart out of your flesh and give you a heart of flesh." is the promise of him whose power is infinite. He whose heart is like the wayside has hope here. But with him, as with all others, human effort is expected and required. God can work miracles, but he does not work them on passive material of this kind. Watchfulness and vigorous action are the price of transformation. If travelers are kept off the path, the rains and the power of nature soften it and break it up. The hardest path is still soil, and the seed may yet penetrate it. But vigilance is necessary. The rush of worldly thoughts, the habitual reception of intruding suggestions must be resisted. The stony ground requires similar vigilance. A long experience of many revivals is one of the most discouraging of all conditions. The rebound will come, depression will succeed exalta-when their results were witnessed the movement spread rapidly until now there are nearly two thousand societies in the State with an aggregate membership of nearly one hundred thousand. What it means to have a hundred thousand young people in one State banded together, and pledged to fidelity and effort in the cause of Christ and the Church, we cannot realize fully, but every year will reveal something of the meaning. As these young people come to maturity and take their places in the world's work, the influence of the principles cultured in the societies will be felt. Greater earnestness in aggressive Christian work, a wider beneficent philanthropy, and a broader tolerance we must have from such association, and for this hope we may thank God and take courage.

Much of the later progress of the Society in the State is due to the energetic work of the State Union, which has labored hard to multiply the number of societies and bring them to a thorough state of efficiency. On this page are portraits of five of the officers of the Union who are devoted to work, and are full of enthusiasm in it. The Union has now had eight years of life and it has been chiefly since its organization that the societies have grown in number and membership. When it was formed there were only thirty-nine societies in the State, and the aggregate membership was only 1,600. At the end of a year both figures had been quadrupled. Since then work has steadily extended. The organization has been growing in development and benefits have been proved. Local unions have been formed for cities, a second growth has been made by counties, a third districts and all are combined in the great State Union. This system facilitates holding of Conventions and the kindling the enthusiasm which always comes from congenial association.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Founding Fund of the Baptist Young People's Union now amounts to $25,545.

The pastor of the M. E. Church at W. Farmington, O., showed his interest in the Epworth League by formally installing newly-elected officers at a recent Sunday evening service.

The Young Men's Christian Association at Dubuque, Ia., is now comfortably installed in its new and magnificent home, which was provided for it by the generosity of Mr. Stout.

The Baptist Young People of West Virginia have been holding their annual meeting. The report showed that the State now fifty Unions, with an aggregate membership of about 1500. During the past year the number of Unions has nearly quadrupled.

Over three hundred delegates attended the recent Epworth League Convention at Lucknow, India. It was decided to request all Leagues to work under the constitution of the League at a had been drawn up by the Board of Control in America with change in any particular.

At St. Paul's Church, Lynn, Mass., the Epworth League undertook to provide carriages for a number of aged people and invalids who would otherwise be unable to attend church on the annual festival of "Invest Sunday." The League also supplied from its own ranks a number of able-bodied young men to help old people in alighting from the vehicle at the church door. Many a blessing from venerable lips come on the young folk.

The following Record of Benefaction which was sent recently to the "Epworth Herald," shows what one society may do when it is in earnest. It is the report of the mercy and help department of the Epworth League of the First Church, Los Angeles, Cal., for a year: $60 given to the poor, besides about 400 garments, five suits of clothes, five pairs of shoes, sheets, pillowcases, hats, quilts, blankets, coal, gas, and other necessities. In many cases it has been paid, 375 calls have been made upon the sick and poor, and 435 social calls on strangers and new members; eight persons have also secured positions through the department; forty visits have been made to the county hospital, and forty services were held in the city jail, where papers and tracts have been given away.

At the State Convention of Baptist Young People's Unions of Nebraska, held at Norfolk Neb., recently, the secretary reported sixty-nine societies, and an active membership of 1,259; associate 298. The treasurer's report was: expense fund received, $24.08, paid out $18.17; college fund showed that $181.33 had been contributed to Grand Island College; mission fund $18.79; following fund, $52; general fund receipts, $3; disbursements, $18. The following officers were elected for the coming year: President, Chas. E. Morgan, Omaha; Vice-President, C. E. Tingley, Lincoln; Recording Secretary, C. K. Struble, York; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Lena Spitz; Treasurer, Wm. Cochrane, Beatrice.

Thanksgiving at Home.

What is Dear to American Hearts
Where—Causes for Gratitude.

HERE is a touching story of gratitude told of a humble native Christian in Asia Minor. "The great God," he said, when some one asked him about his worldly prospects—"I will tell you, five rows of grapes on the sunny side of my vineyard. It was, under the circumstances, a thought—the best he could offer; the richest of the results of his long seasons or he would yield to show his gratitude. These rows of rich clusters would furnish sum that could be used in spreading knowledge of this loving God. But sweeter far, and more precious than fruits of gold is the love that flows from the heart towards him who cares for all his children. Such a love, warm, cordial and grateful, is inspiring hearts in thousands upon thousands of American homes this Thanksgiving. They recall the rich blessings and the joys of the season.

On every side this year has been heard of "hard times," and it is unquestionable that, what with drought and warfare of crops in the Southwest, devastating fires in the Northwest, and other calamities many have found their burdens unrelieved. Yet there are consolation and encouragement stretching over and under his people, like the bow of promise across the heavens, and amid all, we have, as a nation's communities, and as individuals, many causes for "special rejoicing and thanksgiving." Nearly two and three centuries have passed since the first Thanksgiving table was set at Plymouth, Massachusetts, by order of Governor Bradford in 1621. It was almost a year after the landing, and it had been a year of such hardships, the descendants of those pioneers might never know; but despite all adversities and hardships, the grim Governor and his company found causes for rejoicing and gathered in a special manner.

This picturesque gathering was a fitting and on for the great festival that has become a fixed annual custom in our land, although in our hospitable homes we no longer have such guests as Massasoit and his men, we may throw wide our doors to the stranger, and thus feast a sweeter savor than if we could not feast in company with him. And we may do even if our larders are not so full as under their burdens and our pantries are not over-full. "Although it be not so plentiful with us," wrote the Pilgrims of that first Plymouth Thanksgiving "yet by the goodness of God we are so far from want that we wish you partakers of our plenty." And in the same spirit of simple trust and sincere gratitude we again on a subsequent Thanksgiving, July, 1623, after a severe drought, "the prayer," writes the historian, "of sweet and moderate showers fell, lasting for two weeks," and the crops were saved. Thus the first recorded answer to prayer in our nation's history occurred on a Thanksgiving day and made the day one of joy and gratitude, indeed.

It was not to be wondered at that the governors of the old Bay State in their Thanksgiving proclamations in later years should conclude with the thrilling and fervent words: "God save the commonwealth of Massachusetts"—an aspiration which all other governors might well follow.

Until within half a century ago, nearly the gathering and the young people, their enthusiasm stirred by the turkey and pumpkin-pies, enter into the games and frolics with a zest that belongs to no other day of the whole year. One who is not thankful on that day must be unhappy, indeed. But it need not be wholly a jubilee for ourselves; as far as possible, within the scope of our means and influence, we should try to make it a day of real thanksgiving and happiness for others less fortunately situated. By abundant kindness, love, charity, generosity and hospitality, then, no less than by feasting, let us demonstrate the joyful gratitude we feel in our own hearts and thus render to our loving Father above the best of all Thanksgiving offerings.

Heart Right, Work Right.

If all is well with the heart, the work will come easy and will be thoroughly done. A young working woman was converted and applied for admission to a church. When

Thanksgiving

BY JOEL BENTON.

WE miss to-day the Spring-time bloom,
The Summer's wealth, and Autumn's gold,—
The swift Year finds its beckoning tomb—
A leaf of Time now backward rolled.
Hope came with flower-starred Fields and Song,
And dewy Morns and burgeoning Trees,—
The Brooklet's murmur lingered long,
Through Meadows of anemones.
The pageantry of Birds and Flowers,
The opulent Summer's stately flow,
Were, for a time, pervading powers;
Alas! it seems so long ago.

"Here sit we 'round the roaring fire."

But now in granary, crib and bin
The largess of the Year is seen;
Unnumbered Gifts are gathered in,
And Time's dull days are still serene.

What if the Forest's robe has gone,
And darker shadows film the plain?
Some Charm still tints the field and lawn,
And even in Winter joy shall reign.

Here sit we 'round the roaring fire,
Ruddy with its Thanksgiving blaze,
Grateful to God for each desire Fulfilled, for friends and happy days!

all Thanksgiving gatherings, especially in New England, were of the nature of religious and patriotic festivals. While there was plenty of fun and frolic for the children besides the good things of the table, their elders liked best to sit awhile and talk of the old patriotic glories and their own genealogies. There was music, too, and stirring patriotic songs were sung, dealing with colonial days and bygone wars. And not a few of them abounding with that good-natured antagonism to Britain which gave to our early patriotic airs a characteristic flavor. To-day, Thanksgiving has mellowed and become a true home festival, an occasion of family reunion and friendly greeting. Absent children come home from long distances to sit around the family table once a year; near relations and old friends join brought before the body for examination some one asked her what evidence she had that she was a Christian, to which the young woman modestly but convincingly replied:

"Before I was converted, I slighted my work, but now, sir, I sweep under the mat." What answer could have been given more beautiful and conclusive than was this servant's reply? If you are not faithful in little, there is no reason to believe that you would be faithful in much.

Order Your Daily Life.

There is no need to lose youthful vigor, and good looks, writes Hester M. Poole, if a woman so orders her life as to be master of circumstances, if she studies the laws of hygiene and applies them to the ruling of her household. Let her wisely simplify her habits and apportion her time among her various duties so as to have hours for repose, for recreation, for reading and for social intercourse. It has been said that one ought, every day, to hear good music, see a good picture and read some noble words. We must call the highest Providence to counsel, and ask why health and beauty and genius should be the exception, rather than the rule of human nature. A well-ordered life is always beautiful and its beauty is reflected in face and action alike.

PRAYING BOYS.

TWO notable incidents are related in illustration of the duty of the young to faithfully remember their prayers, in whatever circumstances they may be placed. One little lad was to be sent to a great English boarding-school where there were some six hundred other boys. The night before he left, his mother asked him to promise her never to neglect to say his prayers on his knees at night, and he gave the promise. The first night after his arrival at school he found himself in a great "dormitory," with thirty other boys, most of them older than himself, and some of them rough fellows. His heart died within him and the tempter whispered in his ear, "You will have a hard time here if you try to pray on your knees, it will be just as well to say your prayers in bed." But he had given his promise to his mother, and he would not break it. So he knelt down by his cot, and then the boys began to "guy" him. They threw books at his head, they gathered round him and jeered and shouted and pulled him about, but they did not pull him off his knees. A teacher hearing the uproar, came in and saw the little kneeling figure and the tumultuous boys tormenting him. He reported the matter to the head master, and the next morning an order was issued that every boy must kneel in silence by his bed for five minutes every night. Whether these boys said their prayers or not, they were obliged thereafter to at least show outward respect to the religious convictions of others. And so the little lad, who had dared to say his prayers on his knees, won a moral victory.

The other incident deals with a little man of four, living in a small town of Pennsylvania. He and his somewhat older sister were invited to take tea at a neighbor's, whose family were accustomed to ask a "silent grace." The little fellow, however, had been trained to reverently address the Giver of all blessings with voice as well as lips. He saw the bowed heads and bent his own. Then, after waiting a certain time he broke the silence with: "O, Lord, bless all dood 'little boys and girls, and make 'em dood for Jesus' sake. Amen." His sister, thinking him out of order, and quite mortified, when he returned home reported the incident to his mother, who asked him to tell her all about it. He manfully acknowledged what he had done, and added by way of explanation, "Why, mamma, me was the only man what was there, and I had to say it out loud when they wouldn't say it."

A Queen-Mother's Cares.

Despite their elevated station, queens have their household cares and troubles, like humble folks. A good illustration is the case of the excellent royal lady who is greatly loved and looked up to by the Spanish people. Pious and laborious, modest and shrinking, it was at first feared that she would not be sufficiently brilliant for the central figure of a court, which contains perhaps three hundred of the most beautiful women in Europe. But her simplicity and modesty kept complete control and she manages in many quiet ways to exercise influence upon Spanish affairs, and her advice is much valued. She comes of an old, proud, Austrian family, but she works with determination to break down the old-fashioned and cumbersome etiquette of Spain, and substitute for it some of the simpler and lighter ways of modern democracy, which she has studied to advantage. She is a most devoted mother, and a careful, painstaking housekeeper.

A NEW FASHIONED WOMAN

CHAPTER XXI.

A new scene.

ON and on through the beautiful country the train whirled, carrying among its passengers the desolate, childless widow to the scene of a new effort. Dr. Ripley watched her through the hours of the long day without seeming to do so. For the greater part of the day she was silent, gazing on the moving panorama before the window, and the doctor in wisdom forbore to break the current of her thoughts, for he felt that communion with nature was healthful exercise. Time is a merciful healer, and nature is a greater solace-bringer, so he left her in the hands of these two, and seated himself on the other side of the car. As there were but few passengers, they each occupied an entire seat, and, after some time had passed, he saw Annie curl herself up on the cushioned seat, and soon she fell into a sweet sleep.

"Ah! I thought so," he murmured to himself and smiled. "My remedy is beginning its good work already. Her first natural sleep, I believe. How softly she breathes; just like a tired, little child!"

Then he laid a shawl lightly over her, and resumed his seat and his thinking.

That night, as stars were blinking in the skies, they landed in the city, their destination. Everybody was in a hurry, everything was noise and bustle at the depot, but through the crowd a tall gentleman pushed his way and caught Dr. Ripley's hand in a warm grasp as he exclaimed:

"How are you, doctor? I am delighted to see you."

After the introduction, this gentleman welcomed Annie cordially to his home, his family, and to his band of teachers. Nothing would satisfy President Clarke but that Dr. Ripley should accept the hospitality of the college during his stay in R—, and nothing loath, the doctor took a seat by Annie in the omnibus, and soon they were rattling through the gas-lighted city, up its broad streets, now slower, now up a long, rough, pebbly hill, and then the omnibus stopped and its door was thrown open. Before a group of elegant buildings of modern architecture they paused. Every window seemed illuminated, for the blaze of light was dazzling to eyes long accustomed to darkness.

Supper was just over, and the time before study hour was spent in recreation in the long halls and surrounding verandas. One of the girls was playing, in what Annie afterwards learned was the girl's parlor, and twenty or thirty others were vibrating up and down, backward and forward in calisthenics. It was a bright scene, very attractive to Annie, for the merry, though subdued laugh and sparkling eye told of no care, no trouble.

"Girls are such happy creatures," said Dr. Ripley. "An old friend of mine says they are drunk with merriment and it is the truth."

Just then the youthful company caught sight of the newcomers, and immediately the laugh was checked, though only for a moment, since President Clarke ushered the travelers into a private parlor at the end of the hall, and then went to announce their arrival. A bell rang, the piano instantly stopped, and soon the house was so still you would never have thought a girl was near, for study hour had begun.

Mrs. Clarke and Mrs. Winston, the lady principal, soon appeared, and the graceful, cordial reception which they gave the stranger, was a pleasant beginning for her. Then came other teachers to be introduced, some quite young, others older, some gentlemen, but mostly ladies. Dr. Ripley was delighted with the home like quality of everything. President Clarke and his wife were the only ones in the secret of Annie's position and condition, and their hearts turned towards her with the love and sympathy of tender parents. Her youth and beauty attracted the girls, and how it came about no one could ever explain, but from the very first, every pupil by common consent called her "Miss Annie." Perhaps this was brought about by her youth, perhaps by her girlish beauty, perhaps by both combined, no one could ever tell. Her duties were explained to her on the morrow, for Dr. Ripley had privately said to President Clarke:

"She must be harnessed right in; it is her salvation."

So on the morrow she was sent for, her work pointed out, and in an hour she was at the piano vocalizing with a pupil. In the afternoon, by previous arrangement, she was in the art room aiding the art teacher, and these two departments were very pleasant to her.

"Mrs. Deveraux, will you please aid this young lady upon this portrait of Nilsson? She is quite discouraged," was almost the first salutation when she entered.

It was new work to Annie. Hitherto she had etched, crayoned and painted for her own amusement, but she had had the very best instruction, and was fully competent for the position she occupied. Every spare moment she now spent in the attractive art room. She was a surprise to herself. The first laugh which passed her lips, startled and hurt her, but the next was less painful, and finally her nature asserted itself, and the sun burst through the clouds and shone. Then in this sunshine the twin roses of her cheeks bloomed again, her eyes began to sparkle and dimples played at "hide and seek" around her lips. One passage from a letter to her mother we take the liberty of copying:

"It is delightful to work, to be compelled to work. What a blessing labor is! I never knew it before, never believed it anything but a curse, but I see it now only as a blessing. I have watched the laboring classes busy at their daily toil, and have from my heart pitied them. I should rather have envied them, so I feel now. My life here is very pleasant, my days are spent in work, and my nights in sleep, for, I do assure you, dear mamma, that when the girls' retiring bell rings, this tired somebody is always ready to go to bed too, and when there, goes to sleep without any rocking. This is also a blessing, the consequent of labor, for sleep is the child of work. Now, mamma, don't think of me as 'poor Annie,' for indeed I am not an object of pity at all. My life has hitherto been a tragedy, and were it not for the terrible realities over in the cemetery, I might think I had had a terrible nightmare, and that this was the pleasant awakening. I really believe I am just beginning to find out in what true happiness consists—usefulness. Perhaps I shall yet reach the goal, it seems to me sometimes that I am on the highway to it." *

A prayer meeting was held every Wednesday at recess in what was known as the girls' parlor of the boarding house. Without any bell to call them together, boarders and day-scholars, large and small, flocked to this room, and every seat was generally occupied, sometimes they grouped about upon the floor. There was no compulsion to attend none whatever. It was a girls' prayer meeting, conducted by them, no teacher ever entering the room. It had been headed for years by the president's niece, Minnie, who was a devoted Christian. Annie was not invited in, but as she passed on these days to her room, she thought it strange, young girls reading God's Word together and engaging in prayer. How solemn they looked as they came out! How quietly, how subdued they went back to their duties! No matter where she was, the sweet Sunday School hymns reached her even through closed doors and windows. She knew that the recesses on Wednesdays were lengthened by the presiding teacher, and the reason seemed to be understood.

"Mary Morris arose for prayer to-day," said Lucy Lane one day as she entered Annie's music-room to take her lesson.

"Ah!"

It was all Annie could think of to say. This was something she did not understand, so, to cover her ignorance, and to gain more knowledge, she asked:

"Well, who prayed for her, Lucy dear?"

"Who? Why we all, Miss Annie, I mean we pledged ourselves to pray for her." Under pretext of saving time, Annie hurried the child on with her music lesson. There were traces of tears about her eyes, yet she did not seem sad, why then did the child weep? So Annie wondered, indeed as she gazed at the pretty profile, she thought it was the most peaceful face she had ever seen. Now the child was intent upon her work, counting earnestly, her eyes seeing nothing but the music before her, but Annie's ran from her face to the music, then back again, till the bell rang, and another pupil came in. She, in her turn said:

"Oh, Miss Annie, have you heard the good news? Mary Morris arose for prayer to-day."

"Yes, dear, Lucy told me."

"Isn't it too good, to think she has waked up at last, for she's been such a hard case, Mary has. They are rich, and you know it is so much harder to be a Christian when one is rich."

"Do you think so Bessie?"

"Why certainly, Miss Annie, I thought everybody knew that—"

And the child's eyes opened with astonishment, and she fixed them upon Annie's face, as she asked:

"You've forgotten about the camel and the needle's eye in the Bible, haven't you, Miss Annie?"

"Well, what does the Bible say about that Bessie?" asked Annie, carelessly turning over a heap of music.

"Why, don't you remember, it says it is easier for a camel with his load on, to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. Don't you remember that saying, Miss Annie?"

"Well, dear, we mustn't talk any longer now, there's the second bell, now begin."

There was a picture before Annie's eyes—a camel, heavy laden, standing before a needle held in a little child's hand. Then this dissolved—and another came—a rich man with houses, silver and gold, gifts to supply, money to buy, standing before the gate of heaven, and it was shut! Did the Bible say that? Could it compare the two? It must be a child's interpretation: she would search, she had a beautiful, gold-clasped Bible, it had been clasped a long time but she would open it that very night and read for herself. She was ashamed to inquire where to find it, but she would begin at the first page and search to the last, before she would give it up.

The lesson was over, the child gone, but the two pictures were photographed on the retina of Annie's heart.

That night she unclasped the gold bound Bible, and began the search. A teacher, Miss Raymond, entered, but she stopped as she saw Annie's occupation, and said:

"Were you reading, Mrs. Deveraux? I will not disturb you."

"No, Miss Raymond, I was not reading exactly. Come in, I was searching for a passage of Scripture, and perhaps you can assist me. It is where the camel and needle's eye are compared to the rich man entering heaven."

"Yes, I remember. I think I can find it, though I cannot direct you, so please let me have your Bible a moment. Ah! here it is, Mark 10: 23, 24, etc."

After spending the evening, the teacher left and Annie was alone. Immediately she turned to the place which she had marked by the ribbon. She read the verses, then the chapter, more of the Bible than she had read in years. Then she thought, How insignificant the Bible makes wealth! Well it is insignificant and powerless. It can never keep death and trouble away, these can never be bribed with gold. Then too, it cannot buy happiness; I know this, for I have tested it.

CHAPTER XXII.

A letter from Val.

In the college mail one morning Annie found a letter addressed to her in the familiar handwriting of her cousin Val. It was a pleasure to see it. Of all the troop of friends who in the days of her prosperity fawned upon her and professed undying affection, none remembered her now, or cared to correspond with her. But Val whom she had once patronized and whose puritanical ideas she had once regarded as antiquated,—Val remembered her and was eager to show her sympathy and affection. This was Val's letter:

"DEAR ANNIE:—Rejoice with me, my dear cousin, in the birth of our little boy. I am now a happy wife and mother. Somehow it seems to me that a woman truly developed until God gives her her child to love. That he has given me Oh, that wisdom and strength may en me, and I be made worthy of the trust reposed, that of rearing an infant for heaven.

"The night my baby was born, and we were left alone, and the little one sleeping, Mr. Carlisle and mother left at my bedside and we three gave our God. I think these were three prayers that went to heaven that I feel that to me is committed a trust, a child to raise for God, and that to me were spoken the words this child and nurse it for me." C my Heavenly Father will grant me the fruits of the Spirit in abundant measure.

"Dear Annie, my cup of joy over God is so gracious to us, he keeps thanking him all the time. So blessings come crowding. Don't think though that life is a holiday with, indeed, it is not. We have poverty to tend with, and my dear husband works very hard day and night, and not able to give his family much time. I find myself repining at times. Life with us is hard work. Very closest economy, but with some blessings, we are content. I don't regret that we are poor, but I do regret that Carlisle has to work so hard and cannot aid him at all.

"I rejoice, dear Annie, that you have terminated to work for others. To bring its own reward. If there is a trait in a woman that I admire, others, it is self-abnegation, and none to this is self-reliance. How love these qualities are! 'Even Christ pleased himself' then how Christ-like the quality! Self-reliance, self-abnegation require their possessor to be brave, to fight world, its cruel words and opinion to fight one's own self, and this is the bravest fight of all. Self is our enemy, because so little suspected he must have true bravery who can stand upon this foe, make it lie low in the dust, kill it outright. It takes a Christ to this, he alone is brave. Others have fights; his are genuine battles, and to hand conflict, and if, with Paul, he says, 'I have fought the good fight,' then him he can say, 'henceforth there is laid for me a crown which God the Father Judge will give me in that day.' I, Annie, may he give you the grace to win the battles of life, and grant you the mortal crown at last!

"Mother is busy with baby, and grand-child. I forgot to tell you that named after my father, Henry Vernon Carlisle. Mother takes so much pleasure calling him by his name.

"Now write me soon, and tell me your joys, your hopes, your troubles, and I will find in me a warm sympathizer."

"Mother and Mr. Carlisle and children, including baby, send love."

"With much affection, Annie's time was now so occupied, ing to put the finishing touches on many pictures for the fast-approaching commencement, that she was unable to send Val's letter until after supper.

"Poor Val," she thought, "poor is affliction, poverty unrelenting, woe ceasing. That is better than money, better than no work, better than death! Anything is better than this. What of the Parcae—ah, Atropos, she cuts the thread of life; yes, she does not snap asunder. How she has bored me! Well, thinking does not matter. Sometimes I think Minnie turned her axis this way, and then I caught sight of snaky Medusa's head, am turned to stone. A Niobe pined in grief, 'Childless and crownless in less woe!'

"How many times I have read the beautiful statue that I once saw in the Imperial Gallery in Florence. All so months ago though, when I was still now I am different, new life has sprung in me, I have risen a Phoenix out of my own ashes. The old time will come sometimes, though I push it from me. What a medicine is work! I am called to labor now, and I actually love it. The girls, and watch their progress with heartfelt pleasure."

Annie had found the panacea.

"HIS NEIGHBORS."
winter was soliciting aid for Foreign mission and applied to a gentleman, who said in with the reply: "I don't believe in Missions. I want what I give my neighbors." "Well," replied the man, "do you regard your neighbors as those whose lands join yours?"
"Why, those around me." "Do you mean those whose lands join yours?"
"Yes." "Well," said the man, "how much land do you own?"
"About five hundred acres." "How far do you own?" "Why, I never thought of it before, but I suppose I own it through." "Exactly," said the man. "I suppose you do, and I want more for the New Zealanders—the white land joins yours at the bottom."

ASKAN SPIRITUALITY.
with his ignorance and superstition,
the Indian has not gone the length of some of our philosophers to exclude God from his own universe. The native races of Alaska are extremely religious, writes Dr. Sheldon son. They refer all events, great and small, to an influence supernatural. If a man has a good catch of fish he does not say "I am skilful I am," but, "A good spirit helped me to-day." If a hunter comes back with little to show, he does not say,

"I have had bad luck," but he will tell you,
"Bad spirits drove all the animals away, or disturbed my aim."

A CHANGE OF NAME.

won for him a way into the hearts of the people, and they listen as he tells the story of Christ the Great Healer.

A THANKFUL PRISONER.
Many Bibles and Bible portions are given by Mr. G. A. Eoll in the course of the year to the sailors who pass through the Suez Canal. That all these are not wasted the following incident proves. Mr. Eoll says: "Not long ago I met a Greek on the street whom I had known for some years. Shaking hands with him, I asked where he had been. 'In prison in Alexandria, sir.' 'How long?' 'Do you remember the house which was burnt down last October?' 'Perfectly.' 'I was accused and condemned to prison for setting fire to it, but I can truthfully say that I am innocent still. My sojourn in prison, however, was the happiest time of my life. Thirty-seven years ago, on my wedding day, you gave me a Bible. Well that Bible I read through whilst in prison, and I have come to believe that was all written for me. I fully trust the Lord, who has forgiven me all my sins.'"

Child Life in Many Lands
In THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TIMES for 1895 prominent missionaries will describe child life in many lands, including China, Japan, India, Persia, Turkey, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, Congo, Madagascar, Greenland, and Alaska. There will appear also an illustrated article by the late Lieutenant SCHWATKA on the Eskimo children, one or two by Mrs. BALLINGTON BOOTH on "The Children of the Slums," and a sketch of American Indian children by ELAINE GOODALE EASTMAN.
Helps to Bible study are now, as always, the main feature of THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TIMES. The best writers on the International lessons contribute regularly to each week's issue. At the lowest club rate the paper costs less than one cent a week.
Subscription Rates.—50 cents a year in clubs of five or more to one address. $1.00 in clubs of two or more to separate addresses. One free copy with every ten paid for in a club of either kind. $1.50 single copies. To ministers, missionaries, and theological students, $1.00. Specimen copies free.

SCRIPTURE CONFIRMED.

LONG discussion has taken place here and in England on the subject of the vitality of seed. It arose out of the experiment of sowing the grains of wheat which the ancient Egyptians wrapped in the cloths of some of the mummies. Some of the grains, when sowed recently, grew and some did not. It was then declared by a traveler from Egypt that the grains which grew were not taken from mummies but were of the preceding year's crop, which the Arabs had sold to travelers under false pretenses. One person who joined in the discussion is a member of a firm of seed-merchants. He says: "Experiments I have carried out personally for many years past in the separation and packing of seeds for the purpose of making it clear to me that their vitality is almost indefinitely prolonged by confinement, absolute protection from the atmosphere, together with the high degree of desiccation before packing which is naturally brought about by the Egyptian climate, but which we have to imitate as nearly as possible."

Another contribution to the discussion is important, though it is confirmatory of the naturalness of a dream. It is from Mr. E. W. Shephard-Walwyn, of Tunbridge Wells. He writes: "Gen. 41: 5, it is written—'And he dreamed the second time: and, behold, seven ears of corn came up upon one stalk, fat and good.' We all know that the usual thing now is for each stalk to bear a single ear. But in an English paper, Mr. F. Sherwood Smith, estate agent, Bristol, writes: 'Sir, I received from Mr. Davies, managing clerk of Messrs. Underwood, of Hereford, about a dozen grains of wheat, which, he said, had recently been discovered in unrolling a mummy. I gave them to Mr. E. L. Sanders, of Ross, who planted them by his tannery. The summer was warm, and the grains grew some inches higher than the surrounding crop, and, strange, though true, each stalk bore a cluster of ears, not on separate stalks, but six smaller ones from the base of the central ear—seven ears from one stalk! The stalks were half as thick again as the English stalk and not so hollow—more like sticks. I have often heard this idea of seven ears on one stalk ridiculed. Perhaps when we know more than we now do of the ancient peoples of the Bible and their circumstances some other of the objections urged by learned sceptics may be removed.'

IGHTEEN centuries have passed since Jesus walked among the hills and valleys of Judea, and shared the hospitality of its simple, frugal peasantry. His heart overflowed with Divine love and sympathy for those humble ones, who, amid their poverty, could still greet Him with a cordiality and deep sincerity as He found nowhere among the rich and influential. If the sacred record were more comprehensive, it would doubtless tell of many a Mary and Martha comforted in their sorrow by His gracious presence, and of a peasant home gilded by His inspiring voice. For the mothers and children of His native Palestine, the Saviour had ever the tenderest consideration. He knew the simplicity and selflessness of their lives. And even in our mercurial years, and with the full burden of the divine mission resting upon Him, He found opportunity to meet and greet the mothers of Zion and their offspring.

Everywhere the great heart of Jesus went to the children, and His lips flowed with blessings upon them. With what astonishment and delight the mothers gazed upon Him as He sat among the little ones and held them in the spell of His love and eye and smile as never man did before or since! Surely the record of the blessings laid upon the children's heads by Jesus' own hands had been preserved by tradition to posterity they could be treasured in the homes of Palestine as precious beyond all other memories.

Zion's daughters have changed but little in the passing generations, and the descendants of the maidens of Jerusalem and Bethlehem follow the customs of their ancestors in almost all that relates to domestic and social life. They have beautiful, oval faces, and clear complexions that recall the description of Rachel and Rebekah. Among the well-to-do, graceful figures and attractive features are the rule, and the children are especially charming. In the rural districts and among the poor, the olive complexions of the women take a deeper tint but their forms are no less graceful. Moslems constitute a very large proportion of the present population of Palestine, and the "sons and daughters of the Prophet"

MOTHERS OF PALESTINE.

Their Appearance, Attire and Surroundings but Little Changed Since the Saviour Walked Among Them and Blessed Their Little Children.

are found in every city, village and hamlet, and in all walks of life. Our photograph on this page represents a Moslem throughout Syria. One woman carries a child in the "pick-a-back" fashion so common throughout the East, and the young-veil, of which there are several kinds in use, including special veils of light and delicate texture for indoor wear. The "face-veil" is a part of the costume of every Egyptian, Syrian or Arab lady, and is frequently very elegant and costly, being enriched with gold and pearls. Married ladies wear veils of black silk, and unmarried of white silk, the poorer females using calico. The modern Turkish "yashmak" is a modification of the ancient veil. Syrian women also wear a long, loose outer garment, called the "mitpachach," which can be quickly folded so as to cover the head and envelope the whole figure. A peculiar part of the feminine attire is the short tube, worn just above the veil, and reaching from the nose to the centre of the forehead. According to one of the multitude of fanciful Mohammedan traditions, this tube, or cylinder, which may be of metal or reed, is the instrument through which any celestial communication may be made to the wearer, should she be so highly favored.

Moslem marriage laws are obdurate. It is regarded as a great concession to grant the youth a glimpse of the face or even of the hands of the young girl to whom he is betrothed. His wooing is frequently done by proxy. A Moslem may, if unable to marry a wife of his own creed, wed a Christian or a Jewess; but a Moslem maiden, under pain of death, is forbidden to marry an unbeliever. Among the wealthier classes, the women, young and old, are secluded, but the women of poorer Moslem families mingle more freely with the outside world, though they still wear the close "Tsayiph" or veil that hangs like a mask from the face, leaving only the eyes free. Even in the privacy of their own houses, they are forbidden to show themselves unveiled except to their nearest relatives.

What a glorious field for Christian effort among these neglected mothers and daughters! In some few cities, like Beyrout, Jerusalem, and Damascus, the Gospel is taught to Moslem women and children by devoted Christian missionaries, but many thousands of these "children of the Prophet" have never listened to the "glad tidings of joy" concerning One who is greater than Mohammed and all the prophets.

THE BOWING SHEAVES.

A Thanksgiving Congratulation
Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D. Text: Genesis 37: 7. "We were binding sheaves in the field and lo, my sheaf arose and also stood upright: and behold your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to my sheaf."

A JOSEPHIC dream! At seventeen years of age, and when life is most rosy, Joseph in a vision saw a great harvest field, himself and his brethren at work in it, and after a while the sheaf that he was binding rose up with an imperial air and the sheaves of the other harvesters fell flat on their faces as the overawed subjects of an empire might fall down on their faces before a king. The dream was fulfilled when there was famine in Egypt and Joseph had the care of all the corn cribs, and his brethren came and implored food from him. Sure enough all their sheaves bowed to his sheaf. A Thanksgiving Day vision! I am away out in the centre of a field where the harvests of all nations are being reaped. Here is the great American sheaf. Sheaf of wheat, sheaf of rice, sheaf of corn, sheaf floral, agricultural, pomological, mineralogical, literary and moral prosperities—all bound together in one great sheaf. It is kingly, and on its brow is the golden coronal of all the year's sunshine, and in its presence all the sheaves of European and Asiatic harvests bend and fall down, feeling their littleness.

Oh, the sheaf, the golden sheaf, the overtopping sheaf of American prosperity. Other nations far surpass ours in antiquities, in cathedrals, in titled pomp, in art galleries; but in most things their sheaves must bow to our sheaf. I have an idea that the most favored constellation of immensity is the one of which the earth is a star, and of the hemispheres the western is the most favored, and that of the zones the temperate is the most desirable, and that the United States are the best part of the American continent.

The best place on earth to live is here. Had it not been so, there would have been 300,000 Americans last year moving into Europe, instead of 300,000 Europeans moving into America.

Human nature has a strong tendency to fault-finding. Where there is one man who sings and whistles and laughs, there are ten men who sigh and groan and complain. We are more apt to compare our condition with those who are better off than with those who are worse off.

I propose this Thanksgiving Day, for the purpose of stirring your gratitude, to show you how much preferable is the condition of this nation to all other nations, and how the Italian sheaf and the British sheaf and the Spanish sheaf and the French sheaf and all the other sheaves must bow down to our American sheaf.

Have you realized our superior blessings atmospheric? Have you thought of the fact that the most of the millions of the human race are in climates frigid or torrid or horrid? Take up the map and thank God that you are so far off from Arctic icebergs on the one side and seven-foot-long cobras on the other. For what multitudes of the human race life is an Arctic expedition! Underground huts. Immeasurable barrenness. Life a prolonged shiver. Our front door steps on a January night genial compared with their climate. Ask some of the Arctic explorers about the luxuries of life around the North Pole. Instead of killing so many brave men in Polar expedition, we had better send messengers to persuade those pale inhabitants of polar climes to say good-bye to the eternal snows and abandon those realms of earth to the waters and white bear, and shut up those gates of crystal, and come down into a realm where the thermometer seldom drops below zero. Oh the beauties of Baffin's Bay, only six weeks in the year open! What a delightful thing when in those Arctic regions they milk their cows, and milk only ice cream. Let all those who like yourselves live between 30 and 50 degrees of north latitude thank God and have sympathy for the vast populations of both hemispheres who freeze between 60 and 80 degrees of latitude. Then compare our atmosphere with the heated air infested with reptilian and insectile life in which most of the human race suffer. Think of India and China and Ethiopia. Travelers tell you of the delicious orange groves, but ask them about the centipedes. They tell of the odor of the forests, but ask them about the black flies. They tell you about the rich plumage of the birds, but ask them about the malarias. They tell you about the fine riders, but ask them about the Bedouins and bandits. They tell you about the broad piazzas, but ask them about the midnights with the thermometer at an insufferable 110. Vast cities of the torrid clime without sewerage, without cleansing, packed, and piled up wretchedness and all discomfort. What beautiful hyenas! What fascinating scorpions! What sociable tarantulas! What captivating lizards! What wealth of bugs! What an opportunity to study, comparative anatomy and herpetology! What a chance to look into the open countenance of the pleasing crocodile! Hundreds of millions of people in such surroundings. I would rather live in one of these American cities in a house with two rooms than to live in the torrid lands and own all Mexico, all Brazil, all Hindostan, all Arabia, all China.

Again, there is not a land where wages and salaries are so large for the great masses of the people as here. In India four cents a day and find yourself is good wages. In Ireland, in some parts, eight cents a day for wages. In England, a dollar a day good wages—vast populations not getting as much as that. In other lands fifty cents a day and twenty-five cents a day clear on down to starvation and squalor. An editor in England told me that his salary was $750 a year, and he seemed satisfied! Look at the great populations coming out of the factories of other lands, and accompany them to their homes, and see what privation the hard-working classes on the other side the sea suffer.

The laboring classes here are ten per cent better off than in any other country under the sun—twenty per cent, forty per cent, fifty per cent, seventy-five per cent. The toilers with hand and foot have better homes and better furnished. I do not talk an abstraction. I know what I have seen. The stone masons and carpenters and plumbers and mechanics and artisans of all styles in America have finer residences than the majority of professional men in Great Britain. You enter the laborer's house on this side the sea, and you find upholstery and pictures and instruments of music. His children are educated at the best schools. His life is insured, so that in case of his sudden demise the family shall not be homeless. Let all American workmen know that while their wages may not be as high as they would like to have them, America is the paradise of industry.

Again: there is no land on the earth where the political condition is so satisfactory as here. Every three years in the state and every four years in the nation we clean house. After a vehement expression of the people at the ballot box in the autumnal election, they all seem satisfied, and if they are not satisfied, at any rate they smile.

It is said that in this country we have more political dishonesty than in any other land. The difference is that in this country almost every official has a chance to steal, while in other lands a few people absorb so much that the others have no chance. The governments of Europe are so expensive that after the salaries of the royal families are paid there is not much left to misappropriate.

The Emperor of Russia has a nice little salary of $8,210,000. The Emperor of Austria has a yearly salary of $4,000,000. Victoria, the Queen, has a salary of $2,200,000. The royal plate at St. James's Palace is worth $10,000,000. The Queen's hairdresser gets $10,000 a year for combing the royal locks, while the most of us have to comb our hair at less than half that expense, if we have any to comb!

Over there, there is a host of attendants, all on salaries, some of them $500 and $6000 a year. Master of Buck Hounds, $8500 a year. Grand Falconer, $6000 a year. (I translate pounds into dollars.) Gentlemen of the Wine and Beer Cellars, Controller of the Household, Groom of the Robes, Mistress of the Robes, Captain of Gold Stick, Lieutenant of Silver Stick, Clerk of the Powder Closet, Pages of the Back Stairs, Maids of Honor, Master of Horse, Chief Equerry, Equeries in Ordinary, Crown Equerry, Hereditary Grand Falconer, Vice Chamberlain, Clerk of the Kitchen, Master of Forks, Grooms in Waiting, Lords in Waiting, Grooms of the Great Chamber, Sergeant at Arms, Barge Master and Waterman, Eight Bedchamber Women, Eight Ladies of the Bedchamber, Ten Grooms of the Great Chain, and so on, and so on, ad infinitum, ad nauseam.

Now, is it not better that we be overtaxed and the surplus be distributed all over the land among the lobby men, and that it go into the hands of hundreds and thousands of people—is there not a better chance of its finally getting down into the hands of honest people, than if it were all built up, piled up inside a garden or palace?

Again, the monopolistic oppression is less here than anywhere else. The air here is full of protest because great houses, great companies, great individuals are building such overtowering fortunes. Stephen Girard and John Jacob Astor stared at in their time for their august fortunes, would not now be pointed at in the streets of Philadelphia or New York as anything remarkable. These vast fortunes for some imply pinchedness of want for others. A great protuberance on a man's head implies illness of the whole body. These estates of disproportionate size weaken all the body politic.

But the evil is nothing here compared with the monopolistic oppression abroad. Ireland to-day one vast monopolistic devastation. About thirty-five millions people in Great Britain and yet all the soil owned by about thirty-two thousand. Statistics enough to shake the earth. Duke of Devonshire owning 66,000 acres in Derby. Duke of Richmond owning 800,000 acres at Gordon Castle. Marquis of Blandford going on a journey of 100 miles a straight line, all on his own property. Duke of Sutherland has an estate as wide as Scotland, which dips into the sea on both sides. Bad as we have it here, it is thousand times worse there.

Beside that, if here a few fortunes overshadow all others, we must remember there is a vast throng of other people being enriched, and this fact shows the thriftiness of the country. It is estimated that there are over five thousand millionaires in the United States. In addition to this, you must remember that there are successively less extended scale. Tens of thousands of people worth $500,000; scores of thousands worth $100,000 each. Yea, the majority of the people of the United States are their way to fortunes. They will either rich themselves or their children will be rich.

If I should leave to some men the question: "Will you have a fortune and your children struggle on through their lives the struggle you have had to make—do you have the fortune, or would you rather that they should have the fortune?" Scores of men would say: "I am willing to fight this battle all the way through and give my children a chance; I don't care so much about myself; it's only for ten or twenty years anyhow; give my children a chance." Anything stirs my admiration it is to see a man without any education himself send his sons to college, and without any opportunity for luxury himself, resolved that though he shall have it hard all the days of his life, his children shall have a good start. And I tell you, although some of you may have great commercial struggle, there is nothing to be a great opening for your sons; your daughters as they come on to take their places in society.

We have only just begun to set a Thanksgiving table in this country. We have just put on one silver fork, and salt cellar, and one loaf of bread, and smoking platter. Wait until the fruits come in from all the orchards, and the meats from all the markets, and the vegetables from the gardens, and the silver from all the mines, and the dinner bell rings, saying: "Thanksgiving tables spread."

Again: the nation is more fully at peace than any other. At least 15,000,000 men belonging to the standing armies of Europe to-day. Since we had our conflict, on the other side the sea they have had Zulu war, Afghan war, Egyptian war, Russo-Turkish war, German-French war, Japan-Chinese war. No certainty about the future. The governments of Europe watching each other, lest one of them get too much advantage. Diplomacy all the time nervous at work. Four nations watching the Suez Canal as carefully as four cats would watch one rat.

In order to keep peace, intermarriage of royal families; some bright princess compelled to marry some disagreeable foreign dignitary in order to keep the balance of political power in Europe, the ill-matched pair fighting out on a small scale that which would have been international contest, sometimes the husband holding the balance of power, sometimes the wife holding the balance of power. One unwise stroke of Gladstone's pen after Garnet Wolseyley captured Tel-el-Kebir, and all Europe would have been one battle-field. Crowded, crowded governments, crowded learned institutions, crowded cities close by each other. But on this continent we have plenty of room and nobody to fight. Eight million square miles in North America and all of it one seventh capable of rich cultivation, supplying what fertility and what commerce. Four great basins pouring their waters into the Atlantic, Pacific, Arctic, and Gulf of Mexico. Shore line of 29,969 miles. One State of Texas with more square miles than all France than all Germany.

that our continent might have plenty of room and not be jostled by the effete governments of Europe, God sank to the dens of the sea a whole continent that ran from off the coast of Europe to the west of America—the continent of Atlantis—which allowed the human race to pass from Europe to America on foot, with little or no shipping; that continent dimly described in history, but the existence of which has been proved by archaeological evidences innumerable; that whole continent strewn so that a fleet of German, British or American vessels had to take deep sea soundings to touch the top of it: that highway from Europe to America entirely removed so that for the most part the earnest persevering and the brave could reach Africa and that only through long sea voyage.

Ireland is struck through and through with peace. There is hardly a Northern where there are not Confederate generations in its law offices or commercial establishments or insurance companies. There you sit or stand to-day, side by side—you who wore the blue and you who wore the gray—you who kindled fires on the opposite side of the Potomac in the winter of 1861—you who followed Stonewall Jackson toward the North and you who followed General Sherman toward the South. Are you not breaking each other's ties?

Oh! you have irreparably mixed up your politics. The northern man married a southern wife, and the southern man married a northern wife, and your children are half Mississippian and half New Englander, and to make another division between the North and the South possible you would have to divide your child as Solomon proposed with the child brought before him in judgment: divide it with the sword, giving half to the North and half to the South. No, sir; there is nothing so hard to split as a cradle.

Are your nerves weak and in need of strengthening up? Go North. Is your throat dry and in need of balmy airs? Go South. Do you feel crowded and want more room? Go West. Almost anything you want you can have. Plenty to eat, plenty to wear, plenty to read.

Our national sheaf may have been larger than other years, but it is this year very green and luxuriant. Sheaf of sheaves. We all others bow before it, let it bow in turn before the good Lord of the American harvest. Before him come down all the shocks. Before him come down the sheaf of governmental sceptres, the sheaf of battle-spears, the sheaf of barbaric arrows, the sheaf of commercial yardsticks, the sheaf of joy, the sheaf of family reunion, the sheaf of thanksgiving. All the sheaves of the harvest field bowing down at the feet of the great Husbandman.

You have in hackneyed phrase heard over and over again that America is the asylum of the oppressed. This glorious Thanksgiving Day I declare it to be the warehouse of the earth, the wheat bin of the hemispheres, the corn crib of all nations. Hallelujah, Amen!

Acts Concerning this Edition.

The size of this edition is 1,500,000 copies, requiring 500,000 pounds of paper. The color work necessitated the continuous services of 15 large cylinder presses for the full months. The other part of the paper required the services of 30 presses during the entire month of November. The price on this edition costs $5,000 dollars. Over 200 lady clerks are employed in arranging and sorting the names of the 1,500,000 families to whom this edition is being sent, and in addressing the wrappers. This special edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD involves a total expense of $60,000. No enterprise of like magnitude has ever been undertaken in the history of secular or religious journalism in this or any other country. As it is generally considered that each copy reaches an average of five readers at least, this edition will be read by nearly 8,000,000 persons or about one-eighth of the entire population of the United States. May God richly bless every copy of this vast edition to the good of the souls of its readers.

The Travelers' Club.

Rev. Stephen Merritt, its Founder, speaks of its Work Among the Homeless.

NE of the most unique benevolences in New York is the "Travelers' Club." Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will recall with interest the account which appeared in these columns several months ago, of the work conducted by "The Travelers' Club" among the homeless and unemployed of New York.

Last winter was an exceptionally hard one on the poor, and the number of destitute in the metropolis was multiplied by many thousands. For many years, the Rev. Stephen Merritt, who has consecrated the greater part of a long life to active Christian work in and out of the pulpit, has been an extensive, though unostentatious, philanthropist, helping at all seasons of the year, but particularly in winter, large numbers of poor families on the West Side of New York. When he founded "The Travelers' Club" at No. 210 Eighth Avenue, and gave not only a warm resting-place to the penniless wayfarers, but a strengthening meal and a word of Christian cheer as well, his course was regarded by many with astonishment. All the credentials any applicant needed to possess to secure membership in "The Travelers' Club," were those of a hungry stomach, an empty pocket, and orderly behavior. During last winter, from November 1st to May 1st, the average morning attendance at "The Travelers' Club" was 1800 men, and it frequently ran as high as 2000. Mr. Merritt's guests consumed 2000 loaves of bread per day, and from 3000 to 5000 cups of coffee. Besides these morning visitors, who came to the Club at all hours between 3 A. M. and 7 A. M., he soon found it necessary, owing to the increasing distress among the poor, to open an afternoon club for the starving mothers and children of the very large and populous district in the vicinity of "The Travelers' Club" building. In a very little while, the afternoon attendance equalled that of the morning hours, and the consumption of food was in due proportion.

Excellent spiritual results have come out of the work of the "Travelers' Club," which has been, from the moment of its inception until now, an object lesson in practical religion. It gave to people of all creeds a grand illustration of real, true, helpful Christianity, and showed that its founder's interpretation of the Saviour's teachings is of the simplest yet most beneficent character. To be a member of the "Travelers' Club" was esteemed, by the homeless ones, an honor as well as a blessing. Very many date their change from sin to religion, from destitution to industry and comfort, from the time they entered the hospitable, ever-open doors of this wayfarers' retreat.

Mr. Merritt speaks modestly yet hopefully of the work of the Travelers' Club and of its future. "I know," he says, "that many people are opposed to such methods, but appreciating the necessity, and seeing the opportunity, I felt it my duty to work in this way. It is simply the best I know."

"What is the programme of the 'Travelers' Club' for the coming winter?" He was asked. "Do you propose to dispense its charities as widely as last winter?"

"That is a question that must be determined by circumstances," he answered with a smile. "I have no plans; I cannot tell. Personally, I believe that the need will be as great this winter as the last: the destitution is quite as widespread, and the help, unfortunately, not so bountiful. It may be that my faith is not sufficiently strong, but thus far I am not clearly led as to what I shall do. 'Where He leads me, I will follow.' There are many who, a year ago, even in the hard times, were comfortable, but who now have been compelled to come down to their last dollar, owing to the depression. I know that Christian men and women throughout the Union—thousands of them—helped nobly last year in relieving the necessities of those who were starving here in New York; but even they, this winter, seem likely to have hard times at their own doors. They sent their gifts to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose Food Fund will ever be gratefully remembered by the poor of New York, whom it helped in their time of greatest distress, doing it all quietly and in such kind fashion, that even the recipients did not feel that they were eating the bread of charity. Our 'Travelers' Club' was grandly helped by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund, without which aid it could not have accomplished its work. For the coming months—I pray God to help the poor, and if He calls, there will doubtless be many thousands ready to follow, and why should I refuse? If the 'Travelers' Club' is needed this winter, I do not doubt that the means to accomplish its work will be furnished from that same bountiful source from which all its resources have hitherto been drawn."

the poor,—a work to which he has sacrificed his entire energies and resources, but which has been richly blessed in spiritual results. Mr. Merritt has often been reproached for feeding and succoring people who do not deserve his help. But he is not concerned about that. Jesus himself was reproached for associating with publicans and sinners, and if he had limited his salvation to those who were worthy of it, very few would have been saved. Following his Master's example, this hospitable man welcomes all who come, and when he suspects that they are unworthy, he prays all the more earnestly for them. So he scatters the seeds of Gospel truth, knowing well that some will fall on the wayside, or upon stony hearts, but cheered by the knowledge that some has fallen on good ground, and is already yielding fruit for the Master's garner.

THE EARTHQUAKE SUFFERERS.

The Turkish Relief Committee has acknowledged through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the receipt of numerous contributions to the fund for the relief of the Constantinople earthquake sufferers. Letters just received state that the need of generous assistance is indeed very great, and that thousands of Armenian, Greek and Moslem families are homeless, with little prospect of being fed or sheltered during the winter except through charity. Contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be forwarded to Minister Terrell, Constantinople.

A Word About Ourselves.

What "The Christian Herald" has Accomplished in the Last Five Years.

SO swiftly does time pass, that it seems scarcely possible that five years have nearly elapsed since Dr. Talmage assumed editorial charge of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. From the moment when the first article from his eloquent and spiritual pen appeared in these columns, in 1890, its course has been upward and forward.

It has been the privilege of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its management, during these five years of material prosperity, to take a more active share in the great work of disseminating pure literature, than has probably ever before fallen to the lot of any religious newspaper. We have distributed, during that period, 252,000 Teachers' Bibles which are now in the hands of appreciative Christian readers all over the land. Of Dr. Talmage's master-work, "From Manger to Throne," the most graphic and sympathetic, yet realistic Life of Our Saviour ever written, 125,000 copies of our special edition alone have been distributed, while of his other and equally famous book, "The Pathway of Life," 50,000 copies have been sent to as many families who treasure this beautiful volume as an almost priceless gift. Besides these, 50,000 "Gospel Hymn Books, Nos. 1 to 6 Complete," have also been distributed. This splendid volume of sacred song was specially compiled and published for our own readers. The total expense involved in these five great literary undertakings was $399,000—an outlay enormous in itself but richly compensated by the spiritual results. In addition to these, and also in the line of good literature, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent Marion Harland to Palestine, where she made such observations among the present inhabitants of the Holy Land as have enabled her to familiarize our readers with the Palestine of our own day, as no other writer has ever done.

Charity has formed another and hardly less prominent part of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S mission in these five years. As we regard events in retrospect, it seems to have been Divinely led into a field of philanthropy so wide and far-reaching as to embrace the sympathetic co-operation of its readers in every clime. With their generous aid, it sent the food-laden steamship Leo to Russia to succor the starving peasants in the crisis of a great famine, and the $40,000 devoted to this cause was the means of saving thousands of human lives. It expended $35,000 among the destitute poor of New York through its Food Fund. It fed, cared for, and clothed 1,124 little waifs of the streets in its Children's Home, at Nyack-on-the-Hudson last summer. It established on a firm basis the Bethesda Home for Fallen Girls, in Brooklyn, and the Bethany, in New York—an institution of a similar character. It gave generous Thanksgiving dinners to several thousand poor in New York; and, more recently, it has been instrumental in relieving many of the flood sufferers in the Southwest, and the fire sufferers in Minnesota. Thousands of veterans of the civil war gratefully remember its Pension-Paying Bureau, which freed them from the thralldom of the saloons. Through its efforts the Moody Bible Institute, in Chicago, has been financially enabled to greatly extend its Gospel work. It has sent several thousand dollars for the relief of the Turkish earthquake sufferers, and in many other ways has been the means of helping the deserving and distressed. In this special field of charity $120,000 have been expended in the aggregate.

In the line of distinctively religious work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S efforts have been signally blessed. At the Gospel services conducted in the Academy of Music, New York, during a whole season, thousands rose for prayer. The labors of Mr. Cannon, its special evangelist, in several states were marked by numerous conversions, and the three years' work of its Sunday School Missionary, Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, in the Southwest, have resulted in founding a large number of Sunday Schools and not a few churches where none previously existed. In this work, as a whole, it has expended fully $11,000 in five years.

Its expenditures in those various fields of Christian effort represent altogether an aggregate total of $350,000 or upward of $405,000 a year. It has had the full confidence and cordial support of its readers throughout, and the efforts of all have been crowned with abundant blessing.

A Japanese Tea-Party.

How a "Social Function" is Conducted by the Ladies of the Mikado's Empire.

YOUNG and old in Japan are tea-drinkers. Rich and poor are equally fond of it, and it is just as popular among the ladies of Tokio, the capital, and other large cities like Osaka and Kioto, as it is in the rural districts of the empire. So all-pervading is the tea-habit, that one who is traveling in Japan receives the impression that tea must have been the nation's beverage from the time when the first merry-faced little Jap landed in Nippon from somewhere, till the present day. Yet tea-drinking, together with many other customs that are witnessed in Japan, came there from China something less than a thousand years ago—native writers say in the ninth century.

By a singular coincidence, if the chroniclers are to be believed, Buddhism was imported from the same country simultaneously, so that, in the native mind, tea and religion may be harmoniously, if not inseparably, associated. Among the very poor, tea is almost the only luxury they can afford. There are many thousands of Japanese who subsist on a variety of sweet potato and a coarse kind of radish; meats, and even rice, are beyond their reach.

They eke out an otherwise unattractive meal with copious dishes of tea. In middle-class houses, where a more substantial diet is served, tea is also an invariable and ever-welcome accompaniment. In hotels and eating-houses, on dining-cars and in other public places, the omnipresent tea-urn is always sure of a liberal patronage.

But to understand the art of "taking tea" in the best sense of a social "function," one must have the pleasure of an invitation from some Japanese family of acknowledged social standing. Tokio, with its 1,625,000 inhabitants, has a much larger proportion of aristocratic families than any other city in Japan. Many of the wealthier people among them entertain in a manner that would be considered charming even in European or American eyes, for the Japanese are delightful hosts. Ladies of the better class are trained to social duties with most scrupulous care, and the result is apparent in the excellent taste of all home arrangements, especially where guests or visitors are concerned. Servants, too, are respectful, obedient and clever. Among their own sex, the ladies of Tokio and Yokohama, are specially pleasant entertainers, whether they greet their friends in one of the picturesque tea gardens to be found in every great city, or in the seclusion of their own homes, whose large, cool parlors or wide verandahs are well suited for the purposes of a "nice quiet tea and a talk." Our photograph discloses just such a scene as we have described: a party of young ladies at luncheon are drinking tea and eating rice; their quaint head-dresses, pretty gowns and fresh, innocent faces, making a charming picture, as they bend over their cups, alternately sipping and chatting. Very little unnecessary furniture is allowed to cumber a Japanese dining-room—a few mats, a flower-stand or two, a tray on which the delicate and costly tea service is laid; and little more is needed. The rice is cooked and kept warm with a little portable stove, and is served in china or porcelain. Each guest has her own individual tray of decorated lacquer work, on which tea and rice are served. As the fragrant beverage is poured, the feminine lips are unsealed, and a stream of small-talk, that touches upon every topic, from the bazar for the troops to the latest doings in the court or the upper circles of the aristocracy, continues to flow until the last drop of tea is sipped, the dishes of sweetened rice laid aside, and the visitors rise to bid their hostess good-by.

There is a pretty legend preserved in Japan concerning the introduction of the tea-plant. Daruma, an Indian saint of the sixth century, who is often represented in native art as crossing the ocean upon a reed, is the father of the mysterious and beneficent plant. It is said that after years of sleepless watching, he became drowsy, his eyelids closed and he actually slept. Presently he awoke and being ashamed to have been caught napping, pulled out his eyelashes and threw them on the ground where they took root and sprouted into tea-plants, being the first growths of the wonderful shrub that now keeps the whole civilized world awake.

Real Young Nobility.

A lady was on a visit to an old friend whom she had not seen for several years. The friend was telling her about the various members of the family, and, referring to her son, exclaimed: "He is just a prince of a boy." "These are strong words," the lady thought to herself, and so she listened and watched, to see if the lad really deserved them, or whether it was his mother's fondness that prompted her to use them. A day or so afterward the mother called the boy to come and amuse the youngest child of the household while she did some necessary sewing. The lady doubted his willingness to resign his pleasure. But he dropped his hoop at once, and obeyed the summons cheerfully. She began to realize, then, that his mother was right in what she had said about him. And she was almost sure of it a day or two later, when she saw him cut into halves a handsome red apple that had been presented to him, and give one-half to a ragged boy. She was thoroughly satisfied that the lad was truly "a prince of a boy."

All should take to heart this lesson, and strive to become in their own way, princes and princesses, cultivating the traits of obedience, kindness and unselfishness?

God's plans, like lilies pure and white, unfold;
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.

Charming People.

There is in this world no function more important than that of charming. The forest glade would be incomplete without the humming-bird. To shed joy, to radiate happiness, to cast light upon dark days, to be the golden thread of our destiny, the spirit of grace and harmony, is not this to render a service? Here and there we meet one who possesses that power of enchanting all about her; her presence lights up the house, her approach is like the cheering warmth; she passes by and we are content; she stays awhile, and we are happy. She is the Aurora with a human face.

Give me the happy mind,
That will ever seek and find Something fair and something kind,
All the wide world over.

One Young Girl's Experience.

By far the most precious lines ever penned by Frances E. Willard, one of the noblest of American women, are those in which she tells how she came to Christ. She had been very ill of typhoid fever. The crisis had come and the doctor had declared that

ALL'S WELL.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

ALL'S well! I say it bravely when seeing ing ills arise,
Or when the path before me lies unclouded skies;
God's smile is full of sunshine the show-to dispel,
I fear not for the future, I know that all well.

All's well! I say it softly with grateheart and voice,
When some great joy He sends me
makes my heart rejoice.

And lo, He changeth never! O bliss-words can tell!
He gives his gifts forever! I know that all is well.

PECULIAR CHILDREN.

LET not parents despair because the singularities of their children writes Rev. Dr. Talmage. Bay Taylor was so dreamy and practical that nothing remarkable was prophesied for him in his days of his boyhood; yet out of what promising childhood and youth he rose to what sphere of usefulness and literary power! So the very peculiarities of your children are precursors for especial well. Be patient. Their faculties will unfold, after a while their mission will be more evident. Many who have outrun all comrades in juvenile departments of study have lived to be lagbards and dolts. "first honor men" in college, and valedictorians on "Commencement day," rarely demonstrate anything valuable in practical life; while many a lad with no more brilliant faculties than the Pennsylvania farmer's boy survived to stand before kings!

Learn, all, from this, not to be afraid of starting on a way novel and untried. If a project of seeing the world on foot had been projected to a thousand men, nine hundred and ninety-nine would have pronounced it chimerical and unsafe. No one thought of Greeley, who encouraged an expedition and became its primary patron. He ambitious young traveler was more on his feet a year than others have seen their $100.

American pedestrianism in Europe was yet untried, but in this case became so successful that it has had uncanceled imitators. Be not disheartened from undertaking anything useful because others have not taken it. Do your work in your own way.

If you're given a light to see
What a child of God should be—
See it.

Whether life be bright or drear,
There's a message sweet and clear,
Whispered down to every ear—
Hear it.

The Soul in The Face.

Beauty of soul and character is reflected in the features. Life's opportunities of nobleness, or even forty years of opportunity, if well used, are enough to make much beauty within that it cannot slip but come through to the surface in the fine habits of the nerves and muscles. The transfiguration of a pleasant smile, the lightings of the eyes, the lines of the control about the lips, the shining of the face as great thoughts kindle inwardly—these things no parent makes inevitably ours, and no fitful week or two of idleness gives them, and no schooling of the visage, either; but only habitual nobleness and graciousness within; and this will live them all.

If our love were but more simple,
We should take Him at His word,
And our lives would be all sunshine
In the sweetness of our Lord.

In thy weakness, in thy peril,
Raise to heaven a trustful call;
Strength and calm for every crisis
Come in telling Jesus all.

At Bethlehem.

Traveler arrives in the City of David—Pilgrims Flocking thither for Christmas—The Grotto of the Nativity.

PILGRIMS are arriving in Bethlehem by thousands in advance of Christmas week and we are among the number. Our first inquiry is for the Grotto of the Nativity. The Grotto is reached by a stone staircase of thirteen steps, leading down from the Church. It is a natural cave, and the church, having been built directly over it, shuts out the light of day. Before visiting Bethlehem we have carefully looked into the evidence tending to substantiate the genuineness of the claim of the Grotto to the high honor bestowed upon by the Christian world.

One of the earliest authorities as to the birthplace of Our Lord was Justin Martyr, whose generation overlapped that of the apostle John. St. John lived to be nearly a hundred years old, and Justin Martyr, less than one hundred and fifty years after the birth of Christ, says explicitly that his Lord was born in a cave very near to the village. This Christian Father of the early church was a native of the ancient Shechem, (now Nablous) and very possibly may have himself talked with John. It is nearly certain that he must have known people who recollected hearing in childhood the wonderful story of the Messiah's miracles, death and resurrection from their parents who had been eyewitnesses of these things. A very student of Roman history, as associated with the early life of the Church, is familiar with Hadrian's daring impetuosity in planting a grove and building an altar to Adonis over the grotto in which the Jewish peasant, whose followers were turning the world upside down, as said to have been born of a virgin. This was done between 7-138 A. D. Fifty or sixty years after Hadrian's death Origen, another of the early Fathers, writes that even the pagans acknowledged the cave to be the place where Christ was born. In the fourth century the saintly Jerome took up his abode in a neighboring cave that he might study and write, live and die as near as might be to the spot of our Lord's incarnation. A church had already been built upon the exact site once desecrated by the idolatrous rites commended by the Roman emperor.

When the Crusaders occupied Bethlehem they found Christians there treasuring with pious zeal the tales handed down to them of the honors lavished upon their own, the city of David, and the birth-place of David's lineal descendant. There are still families in Bethlehem who pride themselves upon the intermarriages of ancestors with the Crusaders and upon the superior physical and mental strain that survives to this day in the offspring of these unions.

In all ages, and among all sects of Christians, there has been no doubt as to the truth of the statement that Our Lord was born in the place where we now stand. The exact spot is said to be the arched recess directly before us. The first thought with the devout visitor is invariably a regret that the natural walls of rough rock, appearing only in two or three parts of the cave, and especially that the Shrine of shrines is overlaid with colored marbles and further adorned with gold and silver—a display that absolutely vulgarizes it. A silver star is set into the marble floor of the semi-circular niche kept bright by the tears and kisses of pilgrims. We do not kiss it, but we kneel to lay a reverent hand upon the symbol of the Light of the World, the Star of Bethlehem.

"Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary," is the translation of the Latin inscription.

We are sorry, on some accounts, to have visited it for the first time at a season when throngs of devotees make quiet meditation impracticable. We have to move aside almost immediately to make way for those who are waiting for their turn to prostrate themselves and press their lips to the Star. A crowd of Russian pilgrims have walked up from Jerusalem this morning. Most of them are peasant women past middle-age, and it goes to my heart to see them kneel, mutely, one after another here, and touch the holy spot with forehead and mouth,

We do not pretend to believe in the authenticity of any or all of these legendary localities, but we listen interestedly to something Mrs. Jamal, our dragoman's wife, has to say apropos to this crypt. It is said that there are always more boys than girls born in Bethlehem,—stronger and handsomer than those of other Palestine towns.

"Because the dear Lord will make up to Bethlehem women through all ages for what they have suffered and lost when the innocents were killed."

It is a beautiful thought, and we cannot deny that we have, before hearing the tradition, remarked upon the number of fine-looking urchins playing in the streets and attending the services of the church with their mothers.

The cave tenanted by St. Jerome is close at hand and in it his tomb is shown with that of Paula, the disciple to whom he refers in his works.

Coming out of the upper church, David Jamal, our dragoman, directs our attention to the venders of crosses, beads, candles and other mementoes of Bethlehem, who have stalls or tables in the vestibules and even hawk their wares inside of the doors. There are actually money-changers just outside, ready to take up and exchange foreign coins for Turkish money.

"It was such as these that Christ Our Lord drove out of the Temple declaring that they had made it a den of thieves," he utters in grave disapprobation.

We go in quest of David's Well under the retired potentate is in high feather, receiving our party and other visitors. He sits cross-legged in a corner, a snowy turban setting off his swarthy face which is strong and intelligent, and issues orders to each member of the household staff. His wife, his married daughter and a daughter-in-law are at his beck and call, and a relative who chances to drop in is bidden to pound the coffee to be roasted by the ex-sheikh himself, after one woman has brought it, another the shovel in which it is to be browned, and a third has blown up the charcoal fire in the brazier before him. With palpable enjoyment of the little bustle of preparation, he turns the hot grains into an olive-wood mortar which is, he tells us, an heirloom in his family and scolds the guest, good-naturedly, but dictatorially, for not beating the "grinding-tune" in proper time against the sides of the mortar. His daughter has a Madonna-face; the daughter-in-law a beautiful one. Yet as Mrs. Jamal tells me aside, the handsome son had set his fancy upon another woman, and even dared to reason with the parent who ordered him to espouse the village beauty.

"Marry her, or leave my house!" rejoined the father. "You will obey me, or be no longer my son."

We agree privately that the family despot is not a bad type of Jesse in dignity and authority, and the impression deepens with each minute of our stay in this better-class household. The son is now very happy in his father's choice, we are told, and that his sad eyes are the expression of bodily illness,—a sort of low fever he cannot shake off. He smiles pleasantly, and even proudly, as the bride of three months' standing, to please us, retires to her room and puts on her wedding-dress, returning blushing for our inspection. The gown is of red and green silk, in alternate "gores" of each color put together with a sort of "herring-bone" pattern. Over this is worn an embroidered jacket, parting over a vest wrought in many stitches and colors. Upon her head is a stiff, helmet-like cap of green-and-red woolen stuff made upon a paste-board frame, and bordered above the forehead with over-lapping rows of gold coins. Strings of silver "pieces" depend from the sides, and join low below her chin in one larger gold coin. These are an important part of her dowry, and after marriage, she seldom lays off the heavy head-dress, even sleeping in it.

I exclaim at this:

"I should think it would make your head ache!"

"It did at first. Now, my head aches if I do not wear it."

The weight of the cumbersome thing is materially increased by a linen veil richly wrought at the ends with silk thread in an intricate pattern. It is three yards long and a yard wide. The texture and needle-work of these veils vary with the means and station of the wearer. Girls wear veils of linen or cotton, but not the stiff construction beneath it.

Next week, I will describe the Christmas festivities at the present day, in the city wherein was born the Saviour of the world, "who is Christ the Lord."

MARION HARLAND.

THE GOSPEL IN THE HOP-FIELDS.
The Rescue Mission of Syracuse, N. Y., H. B. Gibbud, Superintendent, sent its Gospel wagon with workers to the hop-fields during September. The trip extended over one hundred and fifty miles through the hop-region and lasted twenty days. Over 5,000 pickers were addressed in the fields and 150 wards were visited, and forty-four meetings held with an attendance of 8,880. Fifty-five requested prayers and there were forty who professed conversion. Many interesting cases were reported. There were some threats of violence made against the workers if certain localities were visited, but God gave them favor in the sight of the people and good order prevailed at all the meetings, which were held principally in the open air. Calls came for the evangelists to retrace their steps over the same field and last month a series of special services were held throughout that section.

kissing it passionately, over and over, sometimes sobbing quietly, yet never uttering a word.

Light from a semi-circle of silver lamps suspended by silver chains shows the star, the vari-colored marbles, and above, the embroidered lambrequin hung from a marble shelf furnished with the usual appurtenances of a Roman Catholic altar. This is guarded by a silver grating from careless or sacrilegious touch. We are thankful that the space beneath has no such defence.

We bestow but a glance upon the so-called manger, disfigured by ecclesiastical millinery and fenced about with gilded wires behind which swing more silver lamps. Overhead, angels hold a scroll inscribed in Latin with the Angel's Song, "Peace on earth, good-will to men." We care even less to linger at the altar erected where as the Church has it, the Three Wise Men adored the Holy Child. The sacristan shows us, also, the place of Joseph's warning dream and the crypt in which the slaughtered babies were buried.

the conduct of our worthy dragoman, who takes us to three, all having equal claims upon our credulity.

We refrain from mentioning the unsatisfactory search during a visit we pay to an old inhabitant of Bethlehem and a chief among his people, who will have us drink a tumbler of water "from the well of Bethlehem which is by the gate." There are several mouths to the one spring of living water upon the ridge on which the city is built, and there are no signs of a gate there now, but the old inhabitant may be in the right. He is an imperious, yet jolly and kindly patriarch, and has a history. In earlier and troublous times, he exercised a sort of sheikship in the territory around Bethlehem, having such influence with his lawless neighbors that he was frequently chosen to escort travelers through doubtful passes and over hills that had more than doubtful reputation. As David tells me this in English, the host catches his meaning and points proudly to his gun, sword and spear hung against the wall.

Christmas will be a universal holiday, and

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
Bible House, New York City.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

OUR FAVORED LAND.

THE most popular country of all the earth is this country. Thank God that you live here and now. While there are outrageous evils in all the cities that need to be thundered down, do not let us ignore the privileges we possess but try to live worthy of them. We are apt to take our privileges as a matter of course. Do you realize what a great advantage we have in worshipping God as we please and where we please? Do you realize that in this country among all the denominations not one can lift its head half an inch above the other denominations and say: "I am more respectable than you, or more honored than you?"

In lands where there is a State religion, people outside that national religion are not quite up in favor with those who worship of the governmental wing. But in this land in the great army of God the different regiments march shoulder to shoulder and the question is not even asked whether you are Calvinist or Arminian, Baptist or Pedo Baptist, Unitarian or Trinitarian, Jew or Gentile, Protestant or Catholic; and if the attempt were made to oppress any one denomination of Christians, all the others would band together for the defence of that one oppressed and the right of every man to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience would be demonstrated if need be at the point of the bayonet though the blood flowed up to the bits of the horses' bridles. If the Norwegian boasts of his home of rocks and the Siberian is pleased with the land of perpetual snow, if the Romans thought that the muddy Tiber was the favored river in the sight of heaven; if the Laplander shivers at his eulogy of his native clime, shall not we, born under these fair skies and standing amid these glorious civil and religious liberties, be public-spirited?

For such a country you can afford to vote and speak and pray and rejoice that whoever is President, the heritage of national blessing which we received from our fathers will be the inheritance of our children, and the patriotic cry of David, the Psalmist, which we make now in regard to our country, may be made a century after we are gone by those who come after us: "Go around about her; tell the towers thereof; mark ye well her bulwarks; consider her palaces that ye may tell it to the generation following; for this God is our God forever and ever. He will be our guide even unto death."

But there is one thought that keeps me calm about this nation. It has been set apart as no other nation ever was for divine uses, and from the moment that, on one October morning in 1492, Columbus looked over the side of the ship and saw the carved staff which made him think he was near an inhabited country and also saw a thorn and cluster of berries—type of our history ever since; the piercing sorrows and the cluster of national joys—until this hour, our country has been bounded on the north and south and east and west by the goodness of God. The Huguenots took possession of the Carolinas in the name of God. The Hollanders took possession of New York in the name of God. The Pilgrim fathers settled New England in the name of God. Preceding the first gun of Bunker Hill, at the voice of prayer all heads uncovered. Prayer at Valley Forge. Prayer at Monmouth. Prayer at Atlanta. Prayer at South Mountain. Prayer at Gettysburg. So this is particularly God's land. He has mercifully guided it through all the perplexities of the past, and he will guide it through all the perplexities of the future. To most of us this country was the cradle and to the most of us it will be the grave. We want the same glorious privileges which we enjoy to go down to our children. We cannot sleep well the last sleep until we are assured that the God of our American institutions heretofore will be the God of our American institutions forever. When all the rivers which empty into the Atlantic and Pacific seas shall pull at factory bands, when all the great mines of silver and gold shall be laid bare for the nation, when the last swamp shall be reclaimed and the last jungle cleared and the last American desert Edenized, and from sea to sea the continent shall be occupied by more than twelve hundred million souls, may it be found that moral and religious influences were multiplied in more rapid ratio than the population.

THE CHILDREN.

AS our work chiefly belongs to the nineteenth century, our children's work will altogether belong to the twentieth. Next century will decide questions which this century has propounded. It will decide the color question. It will decide for all the world as between monarchy and republic. It will decide whether the Bible will go under, or infidelity go under. That century will see Christianity triumph over all the earth, or extinct. Many of the battles which are now drawn battles, will be fought over, and fought to the end. This nineteenth century has been a mighty century. It has been the birthplace of telegraphy and the telephone, and the phonograph, and stenography, and the sewing machine, and the reaper. But these things will do a greater work in the twentieth century than in the nineteenth. The bands have just been put upon the wheels. The bit has just been put into the mouth of the lightning; the chemist's laboratory has just begun its work, and the wonders of communication yet to be revealed, as compared with the wonders already unrolled, will be as the vestibuled Chicago lightning express compared with an Erie canal boat. The children are going into scenes that will eclipse in interest and power all that our eyes have ever witnessed, or our ears have ever heard.

Will you parents, and you Sabbath School teachers, who have any opportunity of rightly impressing the children, be sure to get them well equipped? What you do with them and for them, you will do in five years, or be for all time and all eternity too late. They do not seem to be of much importance in the eyes of many. "It is only a child," they cry out. The children might better cry out, "It is only a man; it is only a woman." They have a lifetime yet before them; a large portion of ours is already gone. They are to be the achievers. Our prayer is that this rising generation may be all consecrated to God, and that the poor work we have done may be somewhat atoned for by the mightier moral and religious achievements of those who make the earth and the heavens ring with their music. Our prayer is that of the patriarch of old: "The angel which redeemeth us from all evil, bless the children."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

MANY letters have been received from different parts of Kansas, Nebraska and Texas, stating that widespread suffering exists in the agricultural districts of those States, owing to the almost total failure of crops during the last two seasons. Our friends in these States are requested to forward to THE MAIL-BAG, the name of one reliable person in each of the afflicted districts, who will consent to act as the distributor of any clothing, or supplies that may be sent to him for that purpose by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Jane Renfew, Cleveland, O. Who was the author of the phrase: "I expect to pass through the world but once?"

Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire. The sentiment entire, which was engraved on his tombstone reads: "I expect to pass through the world but once; if, therefore, there be any kindness I can show, or any good thing I can do to any fellow human being, let me do it now. Let me not defer or neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

Mrs. A. Palmer, Baltimore, Md. Sometime ago, you offered maps of Palestine and I now forget the size of them and the price. Will you kindly give the desired information through THE MAIL-BAG?

Our map of Palestine is 28 x 37 inches; printed in seven colors, on bond paper, and neatly folded and placed in a convenient and durable receptacle. The price of the map to subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is 25 cents; to non-subscribers 60 cents. In each instance the map is delivered all charges prepaid. We have only a limited number on hand, which cannot be duplicated.

Sam. R. Armstrong, South Park, Ky. A man owns a piece of land and rents it to a tenant, furnishing seed, team, etc., to work it, the owner to get half the proceeds. If the tenant gathers and hauls off on Sunday stuff raised on the ground, is not the owner as much implicated in the Sabbath-breaking as the tenant, and does he not equally break the Fourth Commandment?

If he consents to the sin or permits his team to be used for such purposes, or accepts any portion of the revenue derived from the Sunday labor, he is equally responsible.

E. D. M., Scranton, Pa. My subscription is due at the beginning of the year and of course I shall renew it. I am coming to New York soon and would like to renew personally, so as to see the office in which my favorite paper is printed. In what part of the city is the Bible House, where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices are?

The Bible House occupies an entire block between Third and Fourth Avenues with Eighth street for its southern and Ninth street for its northern boundaries. Several well-known buildings are in its immediate neighborhood. Cooper Union faces its southern side; Clinton Hall, which stands on Astor Place, the scene of the famous Draft Riot of 1863, is near the Bible House on the west, and one block northward is the enormous dry-goods store built by A. T. Stewart. The Third Avenue Elevated Railroad has a station at Ninth street close to the northeast corner of the Bible House. Several lines of surface cars pass the doors. They are the Fourth Avenue line from the Post Office to Harlem; the Third Avenue cable line; the blue cars of the Second Avenue line; and the Eighth street cross-town line which runs from Christopher street ferry on the North River to Tenth street at the East River.

Mr. David Jamal, dragoman, Jerusalem, writes concerning Mrs. Jamal's "Training School for Neglected Syrian Girls," in the Holy City:

About six new girls came last week, and, with timid hearts and faltering lips, asked my wife to receive them in her classes. They belong to the Greek Church. My wife was much affected and sympathized with them. She was compelled, greatly against her will, to tell them that she regretted her inability to receive them at present, as she has now twelve girls and cannot take more, all available funds for the support of the classes being exhausted. As you know, the work is wholly dependent upon the charity of good Christian people, who take an interest in the spiritual and educational welfare of these poor neglected children. We have no doubt God will bless this work, which has thus far been greatly encouraged by the prayers and help of Christian friends in America. The girls left the house quite downcast. We are both thankful for the assistance the work has received from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A number of our readers have kindly promised to contribute fifty cents per month toward the support of this excellent missionary and training school, and we shall be pleased to add to the list of patrons any other names of Christian mothers, who may feel interested in Mrs. Jamal's work.

Reader, Philadelphia, Pa. One of my employees has been detected in robbing me. As it is his first offence, I am inclined to simply discharge him and not to prosecute him. Am I justified in doing so? I am told that the law calls it compounding a felony.

We do not think you would be justified in discharging him. The theory of the law is that you owe society a duty which you must perform by punishing the offender and not turning him loose to prey on some other employer. But a wiser and more merciful course and one that would be fulfilling the spirit of the law is open to you. It is that of retaining the employee in your own service and trying to reclaim him. If you are successful, as you probably will be, you will be doing society a greater service than you could render by prosecuting him, besides the great achievement of saving soul from ruin.

Subscriber, Aspen, Colo. Shall I recognize my dear father in heaven and be recognized by him? I shall we, as I have been told, be all as one.

No direct information on the subject is given in the Bible. All that we are told, however, leads to the inference that friends will recognize each other. "We shall be like him," John says (1 John 3:2), and we know that the body which Christ ascended, though unlike ordinary human bodies was perfectly recognizable. There may, too, be means of recognition that we know nothing of. Moses and Elias were recognized by the disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration although they had never seen them before. People will not lose their identity there. To suppose that they will, would make many passages of Scripture meaningless. We may therefore infer that if each know himself he can make himself known to others.

Mrs. D. A. Marvin, Dayton, O. My children are growing up and like others of their age, are fond of amusement and games. Husband is rather liberal in his ideas, but I dislike their participation in theatre parties, card parties and similar amusements. They are good children, but pains me to know that they may be indulging recreations that may wear them away to Christ.

There are thousands of mothers in the same predicament and we know how difficult it is when parents are divided in opinion on such matters, for a conscientious Christian father or mother to bring the other to a proper way of thinking and acting. There are many recreations that are pure and helpful, and unfortunately there are others that prove effectually stumbling-blocks in the path of spiritual growth. To the latter class belong the theatre, and games into which the element of chance gambling enters. Theatres, cards and dance have ruined countless thousands morally, physically, while it is not on record anywhere that they have ever helped a single individual since the world began. At best, they are a sinful waste of time, and in their worst aspect unqualifiedly pernicious, by reason of the objectionable associations they invite, the emotions they excite and the dissipated habits they encourage. A conscientious parent will find little difficulty in discriminating between proper and improper relaxations for his children, and will still leave enough for them to pass their leisure agreeably.

A Young Man.—Mass. I earnestly desire to overcome an evil habit; may I not claim in it matter the fulfilment of Christ's promise (Matt. 7:7). "Ask, and it shall be given you?"

Certainly you may claim it, but it will not be honored if you claim it idly. You may remember the story of a child who, hearing of God's answers to prayer, prayed that she might cite her lesson well next morning in school. Having so prayed, she went off to play with looking at her lesson. God expects you to your part. You must find out by your own intelligence what that part is. It depends very much on the nature of the habit. In a general way you should notice what places and circumstances give occasion to indulgence and avoid them. Another suggestion is to take some study or occupation for which you have a predilection, so that the mind, becoming absorbed by something else, will have no leisure to listen to the tempter. You may be sure that if you thus show your earnest desire to get rid of the habit, Christ will deliver you according to his promise.

J. J. Anderson, Pittsburg, Pa. Is a person ever justified in stating what is untrue? Am I right in holding that, to save human life if need be, I may be justified in misleading by a false statement of who would be enabled to commit a greater crime—that of murder—if I told the truth? If a liar enters my room and demands my gold, I tell him where it is, or may I deny it? Or lawless mob seek the life of my friend, whom am I concealing, must I admit that I have him hiding, or am I justified in denying any knowledge of his whereabouts? I find in the Bible that such subterfuges were occasionally resorted to in Scripture times, and apparently were approved by the Almighty to pass without distinct approval.

One who makes faith in God and obedience to his will the supreme rule of his life, will never find excuse or justification for a man's extremity is God's opportunity and in such crises, when our faith is put to the ultimate test, that the Almighty reaches out and succors our weak nature with his Divine strength and help. We are distinctly told that to do evil that good may come and that liars "shall have their place in hell fire, who are the second death." God can deliver the who trust in him in every conflict and those who are so situated are safe according to the measure of their faith. See Isa. 26:4; Ps. 135:5 and 118:8; also Psalm 15. Lying in its forms is expressly forbidden by the Lord (Lev. 19:11; Col. 3:9). It is hateful to God (Prov. 6:16-19). It shuts out the harbor of heaven (Rev. 21:27), and those who are guilty of it find their ultimate abode in hell. (Rev. 8:1.) A full faith, such as that of the glorified men and women who have illumined the world with their lives, will not hesitate to tell truth and leave the result in God's hands, trusting to the Omnipotent arm for safety. Besides, there is the alternative of silence, which our correspondent seems to have overlooked.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

RUSSIA'S NEW RULER.

On the same day upon which Alexander III., Emperor of all the Russias, breathed his last at Livadia, the accession of his eldest son, Grand Duke Nicholas, took place, and the oath of allegiance to the new Czar was administered to the members of the imperial family, while cannon thundered forth to the world the intelligence that Nicholas II. had succeeded to the throne of the Romanoffs. Thus closely do life and death press on each other, in a palace no less than in a peasant's hut. Emperor Nicholas was born on May 6, 1868, and is the eldest of five children. He is a soldierly and accomplished young prince, amiable in disposition, and greatly resembling his father in his reserved nature, but lacking the inflexible will that was a dominant trait in Alexander. At different times, his faith has been a cause of concern in the imperial household, but of late years evidences of physical weakness have largely appeared. On Nov. 2, the morning after death invaded the royal home at Livadia. Brilliantly uniformed heralds, accompanied by trumpeters, appeared in the public places of St. Petersburg and proclaimed the death of Alexander, and the oath of allegiance is administered to the various legislative bodies, the civil officers of the government and the military garrison of the capital. Emperor Nicholas issued a proclamation in which, after referring to the death of his father in terms of deep sorrow and affection, solemnly declares that his policy will be one of peace. This assurance is universally welcomed throughout Europe, as it was apprehended that the young Czar might be influenced by the "war party," which is known to be strong in Russia, and which Alexander had repeatedly antagonized by his resolute determination to avoid war by all honorable means. Nicholas, like his father, is an ardent soldier, having entered the army at eighteen. He has traveled considerably, and three years ago made a tour round the world. In 1892, during the great famine in Russia, he was appointed president of the Extraordinary Commission, having charge of the distribution of aid to the starving peasants. In the summer of that year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ordered the steamship Leo, and sent her to St. Petersburg with a cargo of food, consisting of nearly 20,000 sacks of flour, besides a great variety of delicacies for the sick. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of this journal, accompanied by Rev. Dr. Talmage, its editor, went to Russia to superintend the distribution of the Leo's cargo in the interior provinces. While there, they were summoned to Peterhof, where Emperor Alexander thanked Dr. Talmage in the name of Russia for America's generous gift to his afflicted subjects. Shortly after returning to New York, they each received from the then Czar (now Nicholas II.), whom they had the pleasure of meeting in Russia, a photograph of himself, inscribed in his own hand, and enclosed in a leather case stamped in gold with the imperial Coat-of-arms. One of these royal souvenirs is reproduced on this page, and is a striking likeness of the young Emperor, among the multitude of cablegrams of condolence received by the Czar from all parts of the world immediately after the death of his father was the following:

H. M. Nicholas II., Emperor of Russia, Livadia. Please accept my heartfelt sympathy in this hour of distressing bereavement. May God graciously comfort you, and richly bless you, and grant you a long, peaceful and prosperous reign. Louis Klopsch. Princess Alix Victoria Helena Louisa of Hesse, the betrothed of Czar Nicholas, is the youngest daughter of the late Grand Duke of Hesse, a grand-daughter of Queen Victoria, and cousin of Emperor William of Germany. Her marriage with the Czar will unite Germany, England and Russia by close matrimonial ties. She is twenty-three years of age, and is of a very sweet and pleasing disposition. Her portrait also appears on this page. The new Emperor's proclamation shows that he is not so much elated by his elevation as pressed by the responsibilities it involves.

That he should be so is a hopeful augury. It will be well for him and for the nation if with that feeling he follows the example of another young king, who, placed in a like position, said to God: "Thy servant is in the midst of thy people—a great people that cannot be counted for multitude. Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart that I may discern between good and bad." To Nicholas, as to Solomon, God will answer: "If thou wilt walk in my ways to keep my commandments I will lengthen thy days." (II. Kings 3: 7-14.)

An Actor's Peril.

At a recent celebration, when a large number of actors were present, a veteran of the stage related a story of his early experience, which is more thrilling than is common in a theatre. The scene was in Virginia City, Nev. The house was crowded to witness the play of Othello. The narrator, who took the part of Iago, the false friend, who incites Othello to jealousy, performed his part with the realistic power of a young and ambitious man. He was so successful that the miners, at that time unaccustomed to theatrical representations, were deeply moved. To his consternation, in the crucial scene, when the villainy of the character he portrayed was clearly exhibited, a man in the gallery levelled a pistol at him and fired. A bullet whizzed past his head, and instantly his assailant's example was followed by several other men. One bullet grazed his hand and another struck his sword hilt. He promptly flung himself on the floor and rolled to the wings out of range. He did not dare go on the stage again during the play, and so loud were the threats of lynching that he remained in the theatre all night. The actor said that he had never been there since, although he could not complain that his audience was not appreciative. Unhappily, the audiences in our churches too often make a converse blunder. While the actor was treated as if his role was fact, the minister is treated as if his words were an idle tale. Even Christ likened his people to children complaining: "We have piped unto you, and you have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and you have not wept." (Luke 7: 32.)

The story of an eagle's capture and death as told by the Suffern, N. Y., "Independent," has a pathos of its own. It appears that a farmer shot the bird. It was caught, and after a severe struggle, was caged temporarily in a large dry-goods case with wooden bars across one of its sides. It was a genuine live American Eagle such as is represented on our banners and coins. All the neighborhood came to see the noble creature who posed in majestic attitudes worthy of the king of birds. But from the moment of its being caged it refused to eat. Every kind of delicacy suited to its appetite was introduced into the box, but the eagle would not touch anything. On the seventh day of its captivity its flashing eye became dull and it was evidently near death. It was weak from its stoical starvation and appeared to be suffering acutely. It turned its back to the light and crouched with head erect to meet its fate. A short time before it died, there were movements in the wings, slow, graceful, spasmodic opening and folding. In the delirium of death the bird was in imagination again soaring above the crags. The head was turned to one side with one sightless eye upward, and so it died apparently free in its imagination, although a captive. In dying, the Christian's thoughts like the eagle's are occupied with a flight heavenward; but, unlike the eagle, it is with him anticipation not retrospect. (Luke 16: 22.)

In the Grip of a Waterspout.

A dispatch from Galveston, Tex., reports the strange death of the captain of an oyster sloop at Pepper Grove Bay, about fifteen miles from that city. The story was brought to Galveston by the captain of another vessel who witnessed the tragedy. He says that both vessels were at the bay a few minutes before noon. The captain of the oyster sloop, whom he knew well, was busy superintending the operations of the crew. In the distance on the south-west was a curiously shaped cloud that was being driven swiftly toward the bay. As it came nearer, its character was perceived by its appearance. It was funnel-shaped and revolved swiftly, like a boy's top, as it came with its pointed lower end just touching the surface of the water. It appeared to be three hundred feet wide, and its top extended to the clouds above it. In an incredibly short time it swooped across the bay with a horrible boiling, hissing noise. It moved with awful majesty. It passed close to the sloop, and as it came, the narrator saw his old friend, who was leaning at the moment over the side of his vessel, caught in its mighty suction, whirled around several times and then disappear. After it had passed, several capsized boats lay in its path and their crews were struggling in the water, but, although diligent search was made, no sign could be found of the captain. The narrator said he had never received such a shock in his life as he did when he saw his friend snatched out of his ship in that awful manner by the giant cloud and carried off to his death. It must, indeed, have been an appalling sight. The Bible says that the doom of the wicked is like it; for "a tempest stealeth him away in the night. The east wind carrieth him away and he departeth, and a storm hurleth him out of his place." (Job 27: 21.)

PRINCESS ALIX OF HESSE, BETROTHED TO THE CZAR.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's Evangelistic Services at Hackensack, N. J., have been blessed to the conversion of a large number of persons.

Evangelists Billings and Byers are conducting a successful campaign in Nebraska. At the First and Second Congregational Churches of Plymouth the meetings were largely attended, and a number of persons were added to the church.

Canon City, Colo., has been Deeply Stirred by a series of meetings held there recently by Rev. A. P. Graves, D. D. The Opera House was engaged for the meetings, as no church in the city was large enough to hold the crowds which came.

Mr. Ralph P. Goddard, the Talented Young American sculptor, has just completed a remarkably life-like bas-relief plaque of Rev. Dr. Talmage, in old ivory finish and of a size suitable for parlor or library. The face has the familiar look of inspiration, caught in a moment of intense emotion and spirituality, as the great preacher stands transfixed in the midst of his sermon.

The Presbyterian Church at Hinckley, Minn., lost with its edifice in the great fire, its communion service, which was of glass. When the news of its loss reached the ears of Dr. Charles J. Jones, of Stapleton, N. Y., he made the Hinckley Church a present of a solid silver set. In that respect, at any rate, the church has profited by misfortune.

Rev. S. M. Zwemer, a Converted Jew, is taking a tour in Arabia. He carries with him a large supply of New Testaments in Hebrew and Arabic, and finds a ready sale for them. He writes that he has found several Jews who are secretly Christians, having a thorough acquaintance with the New Testament, but are afraid to confess Christ.

An Evangelical Work in Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic, was commenced in 1889 by Rev. William C. Morris. He began with a school for boys, in which he preached on Sundays. He has now a large Mission Hall, where he preaches on Sunday and on week evenings, and his day-school contains 290 pupils, who attend his Sunday School also.

Dr. Mary Bradford, the Devoted American Medical Missionary, whose portrait appeared some months ago in this journal, is to have a hospital entirely under her charge. Some wealthy merchants who admired her courage in remaining at her post during the recent cholera epidemic in Persia, have undertaken to build and equip the hospital.

A Discovery is Reported by Dr. Bliss the superintendent of the excavations being made in Jerusalem through the Palestine Exploration Fund. The workmen have found at the depth of several feet below the surface a portion of a wall of immense thickness. In the wall was a doorway; the door was gone, but the post still showed the holes in to which the bolts were thrust. Dr. Bliss believes it is part of the original city wall.

Father Ivan, of Cronstadt, who attended the late Czar in his last days is a notable character in Russia. He persisted in giving to the poor all his income, so that nothing was left for his own family. Some years ago his wife complained of him on this account to the Czar, who told her that he would provide for the family and she must let her husband give as much as he wished. After that the family lived at the Czar's private expense.

Dr. George D. Dowkontt, the Founder and Director of the Training College for Medical Missionaries in New York, has received letters from Drs. Vinton and Hall, two of his former students, who are now laboring in Korea. They report that the war has seriously interfered with their work, but has opened new doors of usefulness. They believe that the issue of the conflict will be to enlarge their opportunities of preaching and healing the sick. The cable dispatches from Korea describing the great battle of Ping Yang, say that Dr. Hall and two companions were the first white men to venture on the battlefield after the conflict was over to attend the wounded soldiers of both armies.

TRIUMPH THROUGH TRIAL.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Pastor

A. J. Gordon, D.D. Text: Micah 7: 8, "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy: when I fall, I shall arise; when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me."

HERE is one of those paradoxes of grace with which Scripture abounds. Man rarely advances in a straight line, but through repeated reactions and recoils. And many of us, after long experience have to confess that downward is the directest way upward, and backward the short way forward, and inward the surest way outward.

fectly keep the commandments of God, what need have you of the atonement of the cross? Because Christ regarded the world as hopelessly in debt to the moral law, "he suffered the just for the unjust," that he might cancel our debt. But if you count yourself perfectly solvent before the claims of the decalogue, is nothing to you, and is an impertinence! Then, too, it is in the nature of things that one cannot be enriched who is not first of all sensible of poverty. We say that there must be repentance in order to salvation. But the need is in us, as deeply as in God's plan of redemption. "The full soul loatheth the honey-comb," says the Scripture. It is a proverb of universal application. Who can pray very fervently, who has nothing to ask for? Who can eat very heartily who is not hungry? Who can flee very earnestly for his life, who has no apprehension that an enemy is on his track? Need is the mother of desire, and danger is the incentive to flight.

Christ's Work

Oh, what fruitless work we have in preaching the Gospel in these days of ease and fulness! Down goes Sodom into the lake of fire and brimstone, though Abraham had prayed for it, and Lot had pleaded with it, and angels had been sent from heaven to warn it; down it goes to suffer "the vengeance of eternal fire." Ask the reason of its fall, and the answer of the prophet Ezekiel is: "Behold this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom; pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness was in her."

These same conditions prevail to-day to keep thousands away from Christ; pride which will not suffer one to bow the knee to Christ in penitence; fulness of bread which does not permit one to hunger and thirst after righteousness; and abundance of idleness which will allow no place for the serious and of Christ's great redemption. The same Christ who pronounced the beatitude of the mountain sermon: "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled," said also, "Woe unto you that are full, for ye shall hunger." The atmosphere rushes to fill a vacuum but you cannot force it into a full air-chamber. Fulness and emptiness need only to be introduced, to run to each other's arms. But I can never persuade self-righteousness to make even the most distant friendship with the righteousness of Christ. When I see the throngs pressing to Christ in our rescue missions, I ask, "Is it so that men must become drunkards and outcasts and moral wrecks, before they will come to Christ? Is it so that Christ looking upon many sober and honest and virtuous ones in this congregation, points to these castaways and says, 'these that are fallen shall enter in before you that stand on your feet?' and must men become drunkards before they are saved?" God forbid. But this I do say that you will have to take the sinner's place before you can claim the sinner's Saviour. Many of the highest saints were once the lowest sinners—Augustine, Bunyan and Newton. As the ball-player flings the ball upon the ground with all his might that it may bound back into his hand, so God flung these in bitter remorse and agony of soul upon their sins, that they might rebound into his hand. It is not necessary that one should be a moral reprobate in order to become an earnest Christian; but it is needful that we should recognize and acknowledge our true position in order that grace may abound in us.

The simple fact is that we are in a fallen condition by nature. Yes, worse than fallen, we are in a burdened condition. We bear the weight of inherited transgression in our bodies and souls. Every man carries his father and grandfather on his back. People sneer at the doctrine of original sin; but let them look at the facts of human life and be silent. Nathaniel Hawthorne, in his notebook published after his death, says: "I have been reading Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress.' What a strange figure Christian cuts, going through the country with that burden on his back. I wonder what he had in his pack!" Had the great novelist no dealings with his own conscience, that he should ask such a question? Had he had no observation of human life and marked how men come into the world weighted down with hereditary tendencies to wrong-doing, under which they stagger to the grave? The Pilgrim carried his own sins and the burden of original sin, inherited from his forefathers. And he could never get ease from that burden, till he came in sight of the cross, where at one look of faith, it rolled away to be seen no more.

What we need is a divine release and a divine reinforcement. We need to be rid of the old burden, and then to be subjects of the new birth. Christ gives both—a divine forgiveness and a divine heredity—his own blessed life comes into us to hold us up in right doing after he has lifted us up; to give a new ancestral law which impels us to do right as the old impelled us to do wrong.

Illumination Through Darkness.

"When I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me." "Shut your eyes in order that you may see?"—Isn't that strange advice to give one? Yet this is what you do when you pray. You draw the curtains of the eyes, and enter into the closet of the soul, and shut to the doors that you may see God. You realize instinctively that you must exclude the world in order to commune with God. The inward eye, in other words, sees most clearly when the outward eye is shut.

The whole secret of the power of self-denial and fasting lies just here. Why does the gardener cut off half the branches of an apple tree, in order to make it more fruitful? Because in this way he can concentrate the vital forces of the tree in fewer branches, and so nourish the bud and fruit of these, as to double their capacity for fruit-bearing. So exactly, you cut off the fleshly senses from indulgence, in order to make the spiritual senses more active and keen. In other words, the same amount of vital force is more powerful when concentrated in one sense, than when divided between two. Therefore it is that a blind man has often so much keener hearing, and so much finer sense of touch, than he who is not so afflicted.

During a heavy London fog a few years since, so heavy that it was impossible for one to see anything a foot beyond his eyes, a merchant got lost in trying to find his way home. Running against another man in the dark, he told him his dilemma, when he replied, "O, come along, I will guide you home; the darkness does not trouble me, for I am blind." It is A Significant Story.

The loss of one sense had strengthened the others, so that the sense of feeling had now come to fill the place of the sense of sight.

And what says the Scripture concerning the Christian? "For we walk by faith and not by sight." And faith looks "not at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen." And the man of faith can lead the man of reason when the latter cannot find his way: "When I sit in darkness the Lord shall be a light unto me." If you are willing to choose the darkness of faith instead of the illumination of reason, wonderful light will break out upon you from the Word of God.

The deepest things in Scripture can never be discovered by the natural understanding. This is what is meant by that saying, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for those that love him." The sense of sight, the sense of hearing, the sense of feeling—these cannot grasp the mysteries of God contained in the Bible. "But," it is immediately added, "God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit." And the eye of faith is the organ by which we appropriate what the Spirit reveals. If you have been brought into darkness through trial or chastisement, be assured that God can use it for the clearer illumination of the soul. "Unto the upright there ariseth a light in the darkness, says the Psalmist; and we have to add that unto the worldly there ariseth darkness out of the light.

Alas! it must be said, the happy well-to-do people of our time, as a rule, care little for that thing which God holds first and supreme,—the attainment of eternal life. This is why God has so often to hurt us before he can help us. "What is that man doing?" asked a little child in a frightened way as she sat for her photograph. What he was doing was, he was pulling a black cloth over his head, while he was adjusting his camera. And that was what God was doing for you when that black sorrow-cloud came to you. He wants your picture. The great end of his redemption is, that we should be "conformed to the image of his Son." And shame on us, that it is so, I had to hide his face.

Behind the Dark Pall of some dark providence, before he could impress Christ's image upon our hearts and lives. We find plenty of desperate drunkards pressing forward to be saved in the days, plenty of Magdalenes; but a happy well-bred and well-fed young man or woman reaching forth eager hands for salvation is a rarity indeed. Must Jesus say again to us, "The publicans and harlots go in the kingdom of God before you."

Not only this, but respectable moralists take offence at us when we tell them that if they would enter the kingdom of heaven they must not depend upon their morality as the ground of acceptance with God, but be saved by grace alone. What, O preacher, will you force me into spiritual bankruptcy and compel me to take the poor debtor's oath, and set down all my assets of righteousness as filthy rags, and cry "God be merciful to me a sinner!" I assure you, from my personal knowledge, they will not endure such doctrines from us. "Make the people think well of the selves, if you would have them think well of you," said Chesterfield, the great master of etiquette. My hearers, I would could make you think meanly of yourself this morning, that thereby you may be able to think well of Christ, who came "not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Only those who have struck the deepest note of penitence, can reach the highest note of praise. Only those who have confessed themselves the "chief sinners," have been able to worship Christ as the chief among ten thousand.

Cast Down to Rise.

And mark, what I am saying, is preaching; it is fact. "Except a man be cast down, he will not rise," is the sentence the prophet. "Except ye be converted, ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven," says Jesus. This is the doctrine and life answers to it literally. The Old Testament and the New Testament stereotyped plates from which human history is printed than can ever be bound up and catalogued. Listen! An aged man with whom I was a guest, told me into his closed parlor one morning, pointing to a sweet face hanging on the wall, said: "There she is; we lived together fifty years and now she is gone; but I never knew what communion with Christ is, till I lost her." And a brilliant lady of fifty, keen and unscrupulous as a sword, said: "See those empty baby shoes hanging on the wall. Until the feet which once filled them, were taken to walk in Paradise, I never prayed or believed in Jesus Christ; but now he is my all."

"Oh, fools and slow of heart to believe! well may our Lord say to us again. A man that we have to be driven by the last care for those things, which are high and divinely! My friend must you be goaded into heaven? Must you be sore and bleeding by being hurt upon the sharp point of afflictive providence, before you will obey him? God forbid! Let the love of Christ constrain you; he is the love of the Lord shall overtake you.

THE BLINDED TRAVELER.

Writing on the walk of faith (II. Cor. 5: 7), a minister says: Alpine guides on blindfold the traveler who seeks to ascend to those awful heights where dwell eternal frosts and ice. When the danger is felt, the bandage is removed, and the traveler sees for the first time the slippery path along which he has been led. In like manner our Heavenly Father mercifully veils the future with its trials and dangers till we are safely past.

The Christian Herald for 1895.

Attractive Original Features in Store for Our Readers.

DURING the coming year, as heretofore, the Management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will put forth every effort to maintain its high reputation as the brightest and best family paper of our day and generation. Week after week it will put forth its literary and artistic treasures in generous measure, presenting them, as regards paper, type and press-work, in a most attractive and acceptable manner.

Our new and vastly improved mechanical facilities enable us to do full justice to the requirements, even though our circulation should reach, which at the time of this writing seems quite probable, the enormous figure of 300,000 copies weekly.

Dr. Talmage, having just completed his wonderful tour of the world, in the course of which he was most enthusiastically greeted by countless thousands of ardent admirers in Hawaii, Samoa, New Zealand, the Australias, Ceylon and India, will describe in his own matchless style some of the marvellous scenes he witnessed.

His vigorous editorials, and his best sermons, carefully revised by himself, will be retained as standard features of the paper.

Margaret E. Sangster, whose sweet verses and delightful prose have endeared her to the hearts of the American public, will contribute liberally each week to the edification and entertainment of our readers.

Ira D. Sankey, the sweetest singer in all Israel, whose soul-stirring music has moved multitudes and given a mighty impetus to Christian effort the world over, and whose name is a cherished household word in two continents, will contribute weekly a charming piece of sacred music.

Marion Harland, now returned from her CHRISTIAN HERALD tour through Palestine and Syria, will here and there, in a most interesting manner, describe the strange customs that still obtain among the people of the Holy Land, very much as they did in the time of our Saviour's ministry on earth. Every article called the "prince of preachers," will be represented in our columns at regular intervals.

Mrs. M. J. Mallary, the gifted and popular Southern authoress whose books are known and read throughout the length and breadth of our land, has written for our exclusive use an unusually bright serial story, entitled:

utterances and writings command universal respect.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week devotes a whole page, with portraits and illustrations, to events connected with Young People's Societies. Every King's Daughter, and every member of a Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League, Young People's Baptist Union, or Young Men's Christian Association should read it.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives every week full information on Secular Topics of interest at home and abroad, which are occupying public attention, and its readers are made thoroughly acquainted with the religious, social and political significance of current important telegraphic and cable news.

In addition to this array of brilliant features, our unique exposition of the International Sunday School Lessons, interesting stories of Missionary life at home and abroad, numberless choice Anecdotes, delightful Poetry, entertaining extracts from the newest books; a Mail-Bag which answers thousands of inquiries annually, and hundreds of exceptionally fine original Illustrations, will contribute to prepare a feast which, for variety, quality and attractiveness, cannot be excelled.

Thus, every week, fifty-two times a year, does THE CHRISTIAN HERALD set a table so bountiful and appetizing, that all who will may eat and be nourished. Come and join us. There is a chair at the table for you.

A Request From Dr. Talmage.

May I ask you to have the kindness to show these Premium Offers to your friends, especially those who meet with you in Church and Sunday School. Many of them have been unintentionally overlooked in the distribution of these copies, and you can help me, in a measure at least, to make good this oversight.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

Her Majesty, Queen Victoria.

I am commanded by the Queen to thank you for your kindness in presenting Her Majesty with a copy of your book, "The Pathway of Life," which she is reading with great pleasure. I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

HENRY F. PONSONBY,
Her Majesty's Private Secretary.

Ex-President Benjamin Harrison.

I have received with very great pleasure the copy of your book, "The Pathway of Life," which you were kind enough to send me. I have looked at it sufficiently to admire its letter-press and illustrations, and am willing to commend it on my faith in the author.

Benjamin Harrison

Major-General O. O. Howard.

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE ATLANTIC,
GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, NEW YORK.

A most beautiful book, "The Pathway of Life," from the pen of Dr. Talmage, is received. His own last words in the introduction are choice words. The pictures are well chosen, and I am enjoying a retrospect in them without the labor and expense of traveling. It is, indeed, a grand book.

O. O. Howard

Miss Frances E. Willard.

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, EVANSTON, ILL.

This new book is like a panorama of art and an epicurean feast of eloquence, both successfully provided as the Overture of the Oratorio of the Messiah. The incitement to a holy, happy life was never made more pleasant to the eye or heart. Choice pictures by the score from the best masters, set to music of a tropic gorgeousness of Dr. Talmage's diction, all dedicated to Christ and his Gospel, make a household book of unequalled value and charm. May an army of young soldiers of the cross be enlisted by the wonderful recruiting officer who pleads as no other can in the pulpit, where he preaches as no other man dares.

Frances Willard

Hon. Neal Dow.

PORTLAND, MAINE.

I find words hardly sufficient to express the pleasure with which I read "The Pathway of Life," by Rev. Dr. Talmage. It abounds in entertainment and instruction on every page. The grandest subjects are treated with a spirit and vigor which render them attractive, even to the casual reader. I know of no other writer, of any day, whose way of putting things attracts and captivates so much as that of the author of this superb book. It has in it topics closely related to almost all phases of life; the present and the future treated admirably in the forcible style of Dr. Talmage, so well-known to the English-speaking world. The book abounds in illustrations, all of them grand, and many of them specimens of high art, adding greatly to the interest and value of the work. I know of no book printed in our day more worthy of a place in every library and upon the centre table in every drawing-room.

SENATE CHAMBER, WASHINGTON, D. C.

I am taking great pleasure in reading and examining with care your wonderful book, "The Pathway of Life." It is a choice contribution to the household library. I only wonder that you find time in your pressing clerical duties for such a task; but you are, perhaps, only another example of what a good reaper can do when the harvest is ripe. Your name is already a household word in millions of families in the United States; and now I trust that your book may be so widely circulated that you may be as well known as a writer as you are as a preacher.

Bishop John F. Hurst.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I have received a copy of your wonderful new book, "The Pathway of Life." I do not think when I took it up for the first time that I had time to examine it, but I was mistaken. The variety of topics, the vivid and strong treatment, and the abundant striking illustrations chained me to its pages. I congratulate you upon this magnificent piece of work. It will go into all parts of the country, and will be gathering sheaves into the good garner of our Lord long after you have ceased to be in the harvest field. Yours

U. S. Senator Henry W. Blair.

I have read "The Pathway of Life." It is as nearly perfect as books are made in this world. In matter, illustrations and outward presentment—all perfect, nothing to desire. It is Dr. Talmage at his best in every line. That's enough. The book will live as long as "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress." It will go down with family treasures to children and grandchildren. The author has paid his full debt to humanity by producing this one master book. The charm of style and variety of thought and all matter, make this book a very Central Park in literature. Every home should have it and everybody should read and re-read it.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

"The Pathway of Life" lies before me, splendidly bound, profusely and beautifully illustrated with engravings and colored plates, an ornament for the centre table, an attraction for the eye, and an appetizing and wholesome feast for the mind. Dr. Talmage is the writer, fresh, startling, stimulating in style, commending good lessons, the flavor of humor, fancy and pathos. Grandma will love this book and grandchild too; both will love it for its counsel, stories, imagery and pictures. Fill your home with good books.

I have received your appeal to the multitude in "The Pathway of Life," that grand book for the home, and a blessed guest at the fireside. It is bound to find its way into thousands upon thousands of our American homes. I wish it success.

John H. Vincent

BISHOP JOHN H. VINCENT.

"The Pathway of Life," written in Dr. Talmage's matchless style, and beautifully illustrated by over 200 engravings, set in large type, printed on fine paper, and bound in rich cloth, ornamented with emblematic decoration, has never before been offered to the public at anything less than $3.75 a volume. It is printed from new type and new electro plates, and makes a book of 544 large pages, weighing about three pounds. There are few books that will afford the different members of the household more delight and more instruction than "The Pathway of Life." THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

PSALM 1.

Happiness of the godly, misery of the wicked.

BLESSED ^ais the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful:

2 But his delight is in the law of the LORD; and in his law doth he meditate day and night.

3 And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

4 The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.

5 Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

6 For the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous; but the way of the ungodly shall perish.

PSALM 2.

1 Kingdom of Christ. 10 kings and judges exhorted to accept of it.

WHY do the heathen ^arage, and the people ^bimagine a vain thing?

2 The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the LORD, and against his Anointed, saying,

3 Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us.

4 He ^athat sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the LORD shall have them in derision.

5 Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure.

6 Yet have I ^aset my king upon my holy hill of Zion.

7 I will declare the decree: the LORD hath said unto me, ^aThou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee.

8 Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, 10 Be wise now therefore, O kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth.

11 Serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling.

12 Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

PSALM 3.

Security of God's protection.

A Psalm of David, when he fled from Achish his son.

LORD, how are they increased that trouble me? many are they that rise up against me.

2 Many there be which say of soul, ^aThere is no help for him from God. Selah.

3 But thou, O LORD, art a shield for me; my glory, and the lift up of mine head.

4 I cried unto the LORD with voice, and he heard me out of holy hill. Selah.

5 I laid me down and slept awaked; for the LORD sustained me.

6 I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people that have set themselves against me round about.

7 Arise, O LORD; save me, O God: for thou hast smitten all mine enemies upon the cheek-bone; thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly.

8 Salvation ^abelongeth unto the LORD: thy blessing is upon people. Selah.

PSALM 4.

1 David prays for audience. 2 Man's happiness in God's favour.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, A Psalm of David.

HEAR me when I call, O God: my righteousnessness: thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress.

T. De Witt Talmage
EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

DR. TALMAGE TELLS HOW AND WHERE HE WROTE "From Manger to Throne."

"IN my American home, on the Atlantic, on the Mediterranean, on camel's back, on mule's back, on horseback, under chandelier, by dim candle in tent, on Lake Galilee, in convent, at Bethel where Jacob's pillow was stuffed with dreams and the angels of the ladder landed, at the brook Elah, from which little David picked up the ammunition of five smooth stones, four more than were needed for crushing like an egg-shell the skull of Goliath, in the valley of Ajalon, over which, at Joshua's command, Astronomy halted, on the plain of Esdraelon, the battle-field of ages, its long red flowers suggestive of the blood dashed to the bits of the horses' bridles, amid the shattered masonry of Jericho, in Jerusalem that overshadows all other cities in reminiscence, at Cana where plain water became festal beverage, on Calvary whose aslant and ruptured rocks still show the effects of the earthquake at the awful hemorrhage of the five wounds that purchased the world's rescue, and with my hand mittened from the storm, or wet from the Jordan, or bared to the sun, or gliding over smooth table, this book has been written."

* * * Not a word of Latin or Greek in all the book, unless it be translated. We tell the story in Anglo-Saxon, the language in which John Bunyan dreamed and William Shakespeare dramatized, and Longfellow romanced, and John Milton sang, and George Whitefield thundered. * *

* * * Blessed to me was the hour when my mother taught me how to frame the first sentence out of it, and my last word on earth shall be a draught upon its inexhaustible treasury."

ANSWERED PRAYER.

able Recent Instances of it at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting.

MR. CHARLES F. CUTTER, who conducts the Fulton Street Daily Prayer Meeting, relates, the following facts, which will encourage Christian people to go to God in their troubles: For some years lately there has been in attendance at the Fulton Street Noonday Prayer Meeting a gentleman whose home and business are in the West Indies. He is now crossing the ocean on his way to visit his early home and associations. His story to me here at Fulton Street is something like this: "Mistake, as the world calls it, brought me a financial misfortune, that's the sort the world seems to feel the keenest. Last year I started from the West Indies for England, leaving my business in satisfactory shape; but I was hardly away from me before altogether unexpected complications arose, and I had to return. These complications were of such a nature as to threaten financial ruin, and I saw no relief, except as a man of prayer, believing that the Bible and Divine Providence were well suited to all human extremities. I sought comfort in prayer and in the word of God. But for some days no relief came, and no escape offered itself from impending ruin.

"A note for £500 would be due on the day that it would have best suited me to sail, could I have carried out my plan for a visit to England. As with you here in New York, banking hours close at three. I vainly sought God in prayer. The steamer that should have left our port was delayed day after day. At half past two, one-half hour before the close of banking hours, a customer called and paid an account which I had no expectation whatever would be paid soon, and which amounted to $2,500, enough to meet my £500 note and buy my passage also.

"I am here," he added, "to express my attitude to God for having first been rendered to Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, and to ask especially that you pray that I may have the power of speech given me to testify openly of these things, and to all God's infinite goodness to me, to my soul, and to my business."

Another marked illustration comes from the Pacific Coast in these words: "I wrote to the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting last April, requesting prayer for our Undenominational Chinese Mission, and also that we might receive financial assistance to furnish a home for the Christian Chinese of our school. I write now to the praise and glory of God that he has heard and answered prayer and granted the requests.

"In May we secured a floor over the Mission, consisting of twelve rooms, and in some of the rooms were furnished sufficiently for occupancy. Now nearly all are comfortably furnished, and we have the services of a minister and his wife, who take charge of the home and assist in the mission. Truly, God has been very good to us. We are saying with the psalmist, Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."

Readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD will be glad to see how leaders in church life and work co-operate in the exercises of Fulton Street Noonday Prayer Meeting. For the month of November the following leaders have already been secured, with dates set when they will be present and preside: Major-General O. O. Howard [1st], Rev. Frank Rogers Morse [2d], Rev. Peter Fryker, D.D., [8th], Mr. A. Burr Chalmers [9th], Mr. John Stewart [16th], Rev. Abbott E. Kittredge, D.D., [10th], Mr. J. J. Meserole, Brooklyn City Missions, and Rev. Robert F. Sample, of Westminster Presbyterian Church, [20th]; Rev. S. MacArthur, D.D., Calvary Baptist Church, [30th], and others. This is one of the most important progressive steps lately taken at Fulton Street, and we hope, with the above recent testimonials to answered prayer, will not only interest readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD, but incline leaders of church life and work to frequent the meeting and add their prayers and testimonies, or send their written request that his blessed centre of Divine power may be increased to a degree commensurate with the advance of Christ's kingdom throughout the world, and with the dignity and power of the Christian church in our own great city, which in so many things is a sample to the world.

LOOKING UNTO GOD.

"God's hand in all things and all things in God's hand."

I LOOK to thee in every need,
And never look in vain;
I feel thy touch, Eternal Love,
And all is well again;
The thought of thee is mightier far
Than sin and pain and sorrow are.

Discouraged in the work of life,
Disheartened by its load,
Shamed by its failures or its fears,
I sink beside the road;—
But let me only think of thee,
And then new heart springs up in me.

Thy calmness bends serene above,
My restlessness to still;
Around me flows thy quickening life
To nerve my faltering will;
Thy presence fills my solitude,
Thy providence turns all to good.

Embosomed deep in thy dear love,
Held in thy law, I stand;

Thy hand in all things I behold,
And all things in thy hand;
Thou leadest me by unsought ways,
And turn'st my mourning into praise.
—SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

THE NEW SONG.

BEYOND the hills where suns go down,
And brightly beckon as they go,
I see the land of far renown,
The land which I so soon shall know.

Above the dissonance of time,
And discord of its angry words,
I hear the everlasting chime,
The music of unjarring chords.

I bid it welcome; and my haste
To join it cannot brook delay,
O song of morning, come at last,
And ye who sing it, come away.

O song of light, and dawn, and bliss,
Sound over earth, and fill these skies!
Nor ever, ever, ever cease
Thy soul-entrancing melodies!
—HORATIUS BONAR.

OUR COMING LORD.

His Return Promised—To be Personal and Pre-Millennial—How He will Come.
BY D. L. MOODY.

I DON'T want to teach anything dogmatically, on my own authority; but to my mind this precious doctrine—for such I must call it—of the return of the Lord to this earth is taught in the New Testament as clearly as any other doctrine in it; yet I was in the church fifteen or sixteen years before I ever heard a sermon on it. There is hardly any church that doesn't make a great deal of baptism, but in all of Paul's epistles, I believe baptism is only spoken of thirteen times, while it speaks about the return of our Lord fifty times; and yet the church has had very little to say about it. There are three great facts foretold in the Word of God. First, that Christ should come; that has been fulfilled. Second, that the Holy Ghost should come; that was fulfilled at Pentecost, and the Church is able to testify to it by its experience of his saving grace. Third, the return of our Lord again from heaven—for this we are told to watch and wait "till he come." Look at that account of the last hours of Christ with his disciples. What does Christ say to them? If I go away I will send death after you to bring you to me? I will send an angel after you? Not at all. He says: "I will come again and receive you unto myself." If my wife were in a foreign country, and I had a beautiful mansion all ready for her, she would a great deal rather I should come and bring her to it than to have me send some one else to bring her. So the Church is the Lamb's wife. He has prepared a mansion for his bride, and he promises for our joy and comfort he will come himself and bring us to the place he has been all this while preparing.

It is perfectly safe to take the Word of God just as we find it. If he tells us to watch, then watch! If he tells us to pray, then pray! If he tells us he will come again, wait for him! Let the Church bow to the Word of God, rather than try to find out how these things can be. "Behold, I come quickly," said Christ. "Even so come, Lord Jesus," should be the prayer of the Church.

Some people say, "I believe Christ will come on the other side of the millennium." Where do you get it? I can't find it. The Word of God nowhere tells me to watch and wait for the coming of the millennium, but for the coming of the Lord.

But how is he going to come? We are told how he is going to come. When those disciples stood looking up into heaven at the time of his ascension, there appeared two angels, who said unto them (Acts 1:11): "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as you have seen him go into heaven." How did he go up? He took his flesh and bones up with him. "Look at me; handle me; a spirit has not flesh and bones as ye see me have." I am the identical one whom they crucified and laid in the grave. Now I am risen from the dead and am going up to heaven. He is gone, say the angels, but he will come again just as he went.

Some people think that at the coming of Christ everything is to be all done up in a few minutes; but I do not so understand it. The first thing he is to do is to take his Church out of the world. He calls the Church his bride, and he says he is going to prepare a place for her. We may judge, says one, what a glorious place it will be from the length of time he is in preparing it, and when the place is ready he will come and take the Church to himself.

A brief interval of time ensues between this meeting of all his saints in the air and his coming with all his saints to execute judgment upon the ungodly, to chain Satan in the bottomless pit for the thousand years, and to establish the millennial reign.

"Behold, I come quickly," said Christ to John, and the last prayer in the Bible is, "Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Were the early Christians disappointed, then? No; no man is disappointed who obeys the voice of God. The world waited for the first coming of the Lord, waited for 4,000 years, and then he came. He was here only thirty-three years, and then he went away. But he left us a promise that he would come again; and, as the world watched and waited for his first coming and did not watch in vain, so now, to them who wait for his appearance, shall he appear a second time unto salvation.

THE REJECTERS OF CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Dec. 16. Mark 15: 6-11; Heb. 6: 4-6.

MARVELOUS is it that Christ should be rejected by any; but that he is rejected by a large number we know by the commonest observation. Among those who reject him four types of character are prominent. There is the man who does not understand, or misunderstands his mission. By association with wicked people, or by hasty inferences from the discourse of some injudicious preacher, or by assuming that the inconsistent life of some professing Christians represents the effect of Christ's work, he is repelled and rejects Christ. He prefers to lead a good moral life and take his chance of the future. This is the most hopeful of all the characters opposed to Christ because there is always the possibility of his learning the true nature of Christ and his mission and of correcting his mistaken attitude. A second type is the man who does understand and yet rejects. He loves his sinful life, he loves pleasure, has strong sensual proclivities and delights in their indulgence, and he sees no beauty in the clean, virtuous, self-denying life which Christ requires in his followers. A third type is the weak, compromising, postponing man. He knows and understands the grandeur and beauty of the Christian life, probably means to accept Christ at some future time, when he has made his fortune, or has enjoyed the pleasures of the world to the full; but generally dies as he has lived, not so much rejecting Christ as neglecting to accept him, which has the same result. The fourth type is the man who has professed to follow Christ, has enrolled himself among his people, has just tasted, but has not drunk deep of the fountain of life which Christ opens to believers, and has grown weary of it, or been drawn away by strong temptation around him and has deserted the Lord. There are other types of character to be found among the rejecters; but under some one of these four categories the great mass of those outside the pale of Christ's true church may be found. The real ground of rejection in nine cases out of ten is the high standard of life which Christ set up. The forgiveness of sins, which he grants, is welcome to all; but to that he adds: "Go, and sin no more." He came to save his people from their sins. When a man loves sin, he does not wish to be saved from it; or, wishing it, shrinks from the pain involved by the process. So, in one way or another, according to a man's character, he rejects Christ, and misses the boon of eternal life.

THE B. Y. P. U. IN NEW YORK.

An effort has been made to perfect the organization of Baptist Young People's Unions in New York. Dr. MacArthur, who is well-known to our readers through the eloquent sermons by him which appear from time to time in this journal, is taking a warm interest in the movement. A meeting was held recently in his church in West Fifty-seventh street, to discuss plans of organization. Mr. Frank Harvey Field, who represents the B. Y. P. U. A. in the New York District, attended to advise and assist in the movement. It was decided to unite the various societies in connection with the Southern New York Association. Mr. George E. Crosby of the First Baptist Church was elected President and the following three Vice-Presidents were elected: Mr. George N. Bayne of Calvary Church; Mr. C. H. Naake of the Riverside Church and Rev. A. W. H. Hodder of the Sixteenth Street Church. Mr. W. I. C. Carpenter of Yonkers was appointed Secretary. It is expected that the Union will formally affiliate with the B. Y. P. U. A., and that an orphanage and other institutions may be the outcome of the movement.

"THE GOSPEL COACH."

How a Band of Young People became Evangelists of Christian Helpfulness.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE big house stood on top of a hill in the most beautiful country on earth. Away off to the left were rolling fields and orchards which wooed the bees all summer, and bided their time to blossom all winter, and the fields and orchards standing around substantial homes stretched on and on, until they reached the mountains. Down on the right was a little village where many small houses clustered around a factory, and here were three churches, each with its white spire pointing heavenward.

It was after breakfast one Sunday morning in the big house, and the carriage ordered to take the family to church.

Elizabeth and Katharine, the two older girls, were in consultation. Presently they called their brothers Tom and Richard to join their talk. The outcome was an appeal to their parents.

"Mother," said Elizabeth, coaxingly, "I have a plan to propose: Why not take the three-seated wagon, and let us children walk, you and father driving to church?"

"The three-seated wagon for two people! What are you thinking of, child?" said the mother, very naturally surprised.

"And pray," interposed the father, "why should you children take a long walk when we have horses and carriage room?"

"This is what we were thinking of," said Elizabeth, slipping her little hand into her father's big one. "Kathie and I have been visiting this week among our neighbors in the village. There are a half-dozen dear old ladies and invalids who can never go to church simply because they cannot walk there. Mrs. Montgomery, poor blind body, has not been to church in four years. Miss Molly Peters cannot get so far as the nearest church on her crutches; old Lucy Samuels says she is hungering for a sermon, but she never expects to hear one again, now that she is so feeble. We thought how nice it would be to give the dear souls a surprise, and take them with us this morning. A drive would be a treat, and would make it easy all round."

There was some questioning whether the old ladies could be ready on such short notice, but Mrs. Renwick decided to try it, and so the family party divided, the boys and girls, a merry set of young people, starting off for the long walk, and rather and mother driving.

Their first stop was at Mrs. Montgomery's. The poor lady was sitting by the window. On her countenance the peculiarly pathetic expression of patience one frequently sees on the faces of the blind. She heard the carriage stop.

Mrs. Renwick called to the little grandchild of the cottage. "Susie, run and get grandma's cloak and hat; I have come to take her to church. There is no time to spare! Hurry, dear!"

A very few moments later and a happy old lady was helped tenderly into the seat and covered up with robes and rugs. "Twill be like having a peep into the many mansions, honey," she said as she settled herself upon the cushions. "To think that you remembered me!"

Ah! friends, we all love to be remembered! The crippled Miss Peters was next on the list, and she was disposed to make excuses, but Mrs. Renwick herself jumped from the wagon as agile as a girl, helped Miss Molly smooth her hair and exchange her brown calico for her best merino, and then with brave, cheery words she encouraged her to strong cream-colored horses, which stopped at door after door and picked up its cheery and thankful Sunday load. Some of the passengers were blind, some lame, some only very tired and discouraged, but a wore the little air of pleasure and importance which belongs to those who are not left out when the good times are going by.

Somehow the ministers in the three churches all preached better after the Gospel Coach began its rounds. For the Renwicks did not insist on taking people to a church in particular; they dropped the passengers just where the passengers preferred. It was a real inspiration to God's servant in the pulpit to catch a glimpse of those fervent, sweet and reverent old faces in the pews, faces which bore out an expression I used to hear in my youth, that they belonged to "godly women."

The Gospel Coach was the golden chariot of a great revival that began soon after the poor and the lame were specially brought to the sanctuary. It swept in to the Lord altar a great multitude, and in every village home there was rejoicing, and great praise and gladness in the big house on the hill where a whole family joined hands as followers of the Master.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

There are now in Great Britain 17 branches of the Young People Society of Christian Endeavor.

An Excellent Suggestion for Baptist Young People's Unions came from Canada. The President of the Hamilton, Ont., Union prepared for each meeting of the Sacred Literature Course a few questions on the subject of the day, which a printed and supplied to the members, who write their answers and hand them in at the meeting.

A most enthusiastic Christian Endeavor Convention was in progress in Melbourne, Australia, when the last mail left. All the Societies in Victoria were represented. At the Consecration meeting which closed the Convention, the Town Hall was crowded and more than six hundred persons were holding an overflow meeting in an adjacent Congregational Church.

The Junior Epworth League in India is extremely popular. Rev. J. E. Scott writes that he recently attended the session of one of the Juniors. He found a company of bright young people sitting on mats on the ground, under the branches of a wide spreading "neem" tree. They were regularly organized with Leader, Secretary, Treasurer, etc., and were conducting their meeting in good order.

An Epworth League in northern New York, looking around for a pleasant and profitable way of occupying a social, divided the company into two parts. A number of Bible quotations were given on both sides were invited to locate them in chapter and verse. Correct answers made by either side were credited to it and at the close of the evening the record was added up. The friendly contest was enjoyed, and was found useful.

A circle of Kings' Daughters in Toronto has provided a tree bed in Grace Hospital and borrowed the furniture for the room. The members were anxious to have furniture of their own, and although they were all very busy girls, gave an evening week to music rehearsals until they were prepared to give a concert. The concert was held in a room freely lent for the purpose and more than sufficient funds were realized to comfortably furnish the Kings' Daughters' room in the Hospital.

The Young Women's Christian Association of Glasgow, Scotland, has just dedicated its new home. It cost $24,000 and has been opened free from debt. Lord Overton, in his dedicatory address, said that few people knew how many girls there were in that city district of mills and factories. He had made inquiries and found that there were no less than fourteen thousand and young women between the ages of sixteen and thirty, and this was the class that the Y. W. C. A. was organized to benefit.

Summary of the Preceding Chapters.

Two charming girl cousins are introduced to the reader at the opening of the story. One of them is Annie St. Clair, the idolized daughter of Col. Royal St. Clair, in whose magnificent home, surrounded with every luxury that money can buy, she is living with her parents and her brother Roy. She has finished her education, has traveled through Europe and has seen much of fashionable life. Visiting her, is her cousin, Valeria Vernon, the daughter of the Colonel's only sister. The two girls are sharply in contrast, in character and circumstances, for Valeria is a quiet, pious, unsophisticated country girl, who has never been in fashionable society. Her mother, who is a widow, has brought her up with a strict regard to economy so she is astonished, and a little embarrassed, by the luxury of her uncle's home. Annie welcomes her cordially and, in order to introduce her to a social circle superior to any she has yet seen, gives a garden party in her honor. There, Valeria meets Dr. Gordon, a physician high in the favor of the aristocratic families, who, admiring her fresh and unspoiled nature, solemnly warns her against fashionable life, as an empty, rapid and disappointing existence. Valeria repeats his remarks to Annie who ridicules Dr. Gordon and his sombre notions and describes her own idea of what constitutes a happy life. Valeria objects that a life spent in idle self-indulgence cannot be a useful life and is therefore a wasted life. Before her return to her country home, where she subsequently marries James Carlisle a God-fearing business man, Valeria fears that Annie is engaged to a young man whom Valeria has noticed indulging somewhat freely in wine, and she warns her cousin of the danger of becoming a drunkard's wife. Annie, however, laughs at her fears and afterwards marries him. The wedding festivities end tragically, for Col. St. Clair is seized with sudden illness and dies among the wedding guests. Annie's husband becomes more and more addicted to liquor, as the years pass; he loses her fortune at the gambling table, in lavish generosity and in imprudent investments, and at last dies in one of his drunken fits. She is left a penniless widow, with one child, who is her sole consolation. But he, too, dies, and Annie falls ill with nervous prostration. Her brother Roy, who shared their father's wealth with her, would gladly support her in the former luxurious style of living, but Annie is anxious to support herself and Roy yields when her physician assures him that some occupation is necessary to her restoration to mental and physical health. She then accepts a position as music and art teacher in a girls' college. The girls become very fond of her and call her "Miss Annie" although they know that her proper name is Mrs. Deveraux. One of the teachers conducts a prayer-meeting in the college which Annie does not attend. A pupil, who does go, in conversation with her refers to the simile of the camel and the needle's eye and Annie is interested and, for the first time in many years, reads in her Bible.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A Child's Probing.

LIGHT rap at Annie's door.

"Come in. Ah! it is my little Bessie. Come in, dear."

A girl of thirteen, a bright brunette, sank on the cushion at Annie's feet, instead of taking the chair proffered. It was her favorite seat, for she could rest her arms on Annie's lap, look right up into her face and talk. Now the same happy smile played around the child's lips as when she took her last music lesson, and, thus reminded of the subject of the conversation on that occasion, Annie said:

"Bessie, you did not quote the Bible exactly about the camel and the needle's eye. It is not the rich man in a sweeping assertion, but he who trusts in riches. You see, dear, this makes a great difference."

"Why, Miss Annie, I believe rich people are just satisfied with their money, and don't think much about heaven, or, if they do, they think they will wait till towards the last, and then, by some big gift to the Lord, they try to pay their way up to heaven. I believe they all trust in their money, and I know I'm glad I am not rich, for I'm afraid I'd be as bad as any of them. But, Miss Annie, I came to tell you such good news and I came near forgetting it. You know there has been so much interest in our prayer-meetings lately we concluded to hold them every day. To-day is Saturday, but we thought it would be so nice to hold one just at sunset, such a sweet preparation for the Sabbath. We had it, and it was a glorious meeting, simply glorious! Two of the girls have been converted in the meeting. It does seem so easy to be converted now—just to trust, you know. There is so much rejoicing all over the house, we are all so happy."

Rap! rap! rap!

"Come in."

"Here is Lottie now," said Bessie, but Lottie exclaimed at once:

"Miss Annie, I came to tell you how perfectly happy I am. Oh, I was in the dark so long, just groping about, and I was weeping when Jesus heard me, took all my sins and—Oh, I have been so happy ever since."

She stood with clasped hands, and, though traces of tears were on her face, still it was radiant with new-born joy. Annie looked at her in wonder, and felt compelled to confess that some mighty change had been wrought in this grave, quiet child. She looked at her bewildered, she knew not what to say, but some of the girls calling Lottie relieved her of her embarrassment. As the child left the room, Bessie exclaimed:

"Bless Lottie's heart! I didn't use to love her much, but I do now. I went to praying for her, and I always get to love the girls I pray for, so much."

"Do you pray for the girls, my child?"

"Why, Miss Annie! Certainly I do. That's the way we do in our meetings, we each take some one to pray for. Do you want to know which one I am praying for now?"

Annie nodded her head.

"For you, Miss Annie."

Annie leaned over, kissed the child, her lip quivered, and she could not trust herself to speak, so Bessie went on:

"Miss Annie, next to my home folks, I love you best. I am so anxious for you to be a Christian, I want you to be saved so much. Won't you let Jesus save you, Miss Annie?"

"Why, yes, dear, I hope to be saved."

"Oh, then you are a Christian, I didn't know that you had a hope before, I am so glad."

"I don't know that I am your kind of a Christian, Bessie."

"My kind? I didn't know that there was more than one kind of a Christian, Miss Annie."

What a strange child Bessie was, Annie thought, how she keeps tangling me up!

"Well, dear, perhaps there is not—" she stopped for she had no idea what else to say. Bessie kept on:

"Do you love to pray, Miss Annie, and do you feel that God will answer you for Christ's sake?"

"I can't boast of praying much, Bessie," the answer was evasive.

"Then, my dear Miss Annie, you are not a Christian."

How terribly in earnest she was! In her earnestness, she caught one of Annie's hands, and held it tight.

The retiring bell rang, and Bessie could only give a hurried kiss and say, "Good night;" but, after she had closed the door, she opened it again, put her head in and said:

Miss Annie, you will pray for yourself to-night, won't you?"

Instinctively Annie replied, "I'll try, dear."

The door closed—Bessie was gone.

What was the matter? That child had probed her, had gone to the very depths of her heart, laid it bare, and then denounced her!—Did she answer correctly, perhaps she did not, possibly she herself had misled the child. "Do I love to pray? No, I don't pray, don't know how. I have no use for praying, emphatically, No."

After several moments more of thinking, Annie knelt down to pray, as she had promised to do. She scarcely knew what to say, but her heart framed these few words:

"O, God, teach me how to pray, teach me to love my Bible, to love Jesus and his work, and if I really am lost, as Bessie says, show it to me, and then show me how I can be saved. Bless Bessie with heaven's choicest, sweetest blessings, for Christ's sake. Amen."

When she arose, she thought she would read a little in the Bible, and opening it, her eye fell upon the verse,—

"Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee."

This seemed to her to be very strong language for the Bible, that book of gentle precepts. She read back for the connection, who, she wanted to see was the "fool." Ah, here he is, he who trusts in wealth, he who is contented with the good things of life. What had this man done? Had he robbed, gambled, gained dishonestly? No, evidently not. He was only a hard working man, a business man, pulling down his barns in good season and building larger, to accommodate his increased stores. He was only thinking in advance, only arranging beforehand that his large amount of grain might not be lost, no harm in all that, I am sure. It is a strange thing to denounce a man for. He does talk to his soul in rather a gratulatory way, it does sound a little bold and boastful. I see it now. Every thought revolves around self, not one thought about the poor, or doing others good. This is true, how plainly it rings out—"take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry—thou hast much goods laid up for many years,"—here's the camel again trying to get through that needle's eye. "Thou fool!" Strong, denunciatory language certainly, yet I am coming slowly to the conclusion, that there are more fools in this world than I ever dreamed of. I verily believe that I am one myself, that I am now, and always have been a fool.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Into the Light.

Throughout the next day and Monday at her music, at her painting, in her room, at the table, wherever she went, "thou fool" was sounded in her ears. It was a terrible refrain, and it echoed through the very corridors of her soul. The next night to silence it, she opened the Bible again. Now the words were thrust at her—"he that believeth not is condemned already." She shut the book quickly and threw it impatiently upon the table. She buried her face in her hands, but she could not shut out the words, "thou fool."

"Oh," she exclaimed in distress, "I have been a fool, a worse fool than even that deluded, selfish man. It was business that blinded him, but I was carried away with pleasure—a vain butterfly, flitting about seeking sweets for myself alone. What a veritable nothing, a worse than nothing, I have been in the sight of heaven! How must I have looked to God? What have I ever done for him? Nothing. How many times have I ever worshipped him in truth? Never. I have lived only for myself, cared only for myself."

Very miserable she was as she sat and thought over her past life, reviewed it, condemned it. Bitterly she wept over the years gone past recall. If she could, she would have brought them back and lived them over again, but that, she knew, was impossible. Then a heart-felt prayer fell from her lips:

"O, God! lead me! lead me!"

As in the case of the Syro-phenician woman, she "he answered her not a word." It was a genuine prayer, yet the Saviour seemed to turn away, for the only answer came in an intensified utterance of "thou fool." She was still upon her knees weeping, and amid tears and sobs she said:

"I know it, O, God! I know I am a fool. But, O Jesus, so full of compassion, look in pity on my ignorance and teach me. O God, I know not how to pray, yet thou wilt hear for Jesus' sake. For Jesus' sake, for Jesus' sake, hear me!"

The answer did not come that night. It was spent in sleepless wrestlings. The house was still, not a sound broke the silence, for all were asleep. As usual, one gas jet burned dimly in the hall. Should she go to Bessie's room, wake the child and beg her to pray with her? She could not do this without waking her room-mates,—but were not the angels right there hovering over that slumbering, angelic child? Was not God himself near her? Perhaps if she were to kneel right down by that child, God might see her, his ear might catch her petitions, he might see her tears, her agony, and in pity, hear. She started forward, stood close by the bed, but the fear of all the girls waking and finding their teacher weeping, kneeling and praying, deterred her. She went back to her room, closed the door and remained alone. Morning dawned, but its light brought none to her soul. All was darkness, gross darkness there. Her face was distressed, her eyes were red from weeping, she was sick soul and body, she could not eat, she could not teach.

A light rap—it was Bessie. As soon as she entered, with a flood of tears, Annie exclaimed:

"Bessie, I am lost!"

"Then you are the very one Jesus came to save, Miss Annie," and Bessie's eyes were brimming over, too.

"Not me; he did not come to save such a sinner as I am."

"He came to save sinners, all kinds of sinners,—you too, Miss Annie."

"Why don't he do it then? I have asked him over and over again, all night,—why don't he do it then?"

A teacher calling Bessie, she could not pause long enough to say:

"Pray, Miss Annie; pray hard. Don't give up. I am praying for you. God pledged to hear us, for he has promised and he never breaks his word."

She was gone, and again Annie was alone. Then she paced the floor, wept and prayed. She went to Bessie's room, knelt by the child's bedside and prayed, thinking God was oftener in this room than in her but God's face was hidden. She walked up and down the long hall and cared not that it was broad daylight, cared not who witnessed her tears. There was vacant room at the end of the hall, where she knew the girls often went to pray with their companions,—it may be, she thought, God will hear me there. She knelt in that room, poured out her soul before God,—but still no answer.

"He will not hear me!" she exclaimed in despair, as she went back to her room. She did not deserve his notice. Why should he expect it, when I am so unworthy?"

In despair, she threw herself on her lounge, still weeping, still praying. The in that despair, the answer came in a flood of joy that filled her heart. She could not find utterance for two words:

"Precious Jesus! Precious Jesus!"

And how precious he was! She had never dreamed of such happiness as this truly it was heaven-born; earth could never have yielded it. She took up her Bible and pressed it to her lips, and then to her heart it was the nearest thing to God, nearest embracing Jesus; and over and over again she kissed it. She wanted to die right then so as to be with Jesus, and be free from sin. She longed to fly, to tell everybody of her Saviour, but everyone was in school and she must wait. Then followed earnest pleadings for her mother, brother, and family and all of the unconverted girls.

A rap—Bessie's head was thrust through the small opening without a word, but with an eager, inquiring look. As soon as she caught sight of Annie's face, she bounded in, threw her arms around her neck, laughing and crying by turns, as she exclaimed: "I knew it! I knew it! I suspected it! I am not one bit surprised. Oh, I am glad, Miss Annie! Isn't God good?"

Annie drew the child down in her lap and folded her arms around her, as she answered:

"Indeed, indeed he is. Dear little Bessie I never knew what joy was till now. I am so happy, so happy. Now I can say, you Saviour and mine. Only to think, darling mine, too! Isn't it too good to believe? Dear child, I owe it all to you."

But Bessie interrupted her—

"Don't say that, Miss Annie, it hurts me. I was only trying to work a little for Jesus, and then I loved you so much. I could not bear the thought of your being lost; but you are safe now. Jesus did all. Oh, I am so happy!"

"So am I, dear Bessie. I never dream of such peace, such joy. Wealth, a good life, all earth could lay at my feet never brought me a thousandth part of such joy as this. This satisfies the immortal soul and how it increases the joy to know that it will never end. 'Life long, eternity long' truly. Now, darling, we will go to heaven together, my little Bessie and I."

"Oh, Miss Annie, I can't hold in minute longer; I cannot wait—let's go to the good news, and let everybody rejoice with us."

So they went—and such welcomes, such sweet kisses from everyone, teachers and pupils! How dear everyone was—how beautiful everything looked! As they were rejoicing, a girl, still struggling, burst into tears. Annie stopped, put her arm around her, and said:

Keep on, dear, don't give up. Jesus has saved me, he will save you, too. Put your trust in Jesus,—only believe."

"Gone to work already, Miss Annie," exclaimed one girl.

"Yes, indeed; I have no time to lose. I put it off so long, and now, I see, I must work for my Saviour all the harder."

essing to the community. People naturally turn to him in any trouble, sure of finding sympathy and help. Heydrick is never met, at home or abroad, without someone on his hands of some one in affliction, whose burden he has made his own and is trying to relieve. Now, it is a sick man whose rent is over-due, and Heydrick has become the landlord to let the man stay, and become surety for the debt. To-morrow, it will be some indigent aged Christian ladies for whom Heydrick has provided home, and they have sent word to him that their larder is empty. Or he has heard at a young man is to be discharged from prison, and does not know how he can live honestly with the prison stain upon him.
Heydrick wants to provide him with a decent suit of clothes, and to find a place for him to work. Or a family is in dire distress, because a son or a daughter has fallen to disgrace and has run away from home, and Heydrick is searching the dark places of the city for the missing one, to pour out words of mercy and hope, to reclaim the sinner. Or he has a number of sickly children whom he is going to take to the country or the sea-beach for a day if he can find some one who will provide the funds. Every man's servant, no man leads a busier life or has more to do.

The amount of money Mr. Heydrick spends every year in relieving the poor whom sickness and misfortune have placed in a strait, is almost incredible. Where does he get it? It would puzzle Mr. Heydrick himself to tell. He knows the Highest Source of the means, he holds that God sends it all; but it reaches him in the strangest ways, and through the most unlikely channels. The money will come as it is needed.
Of that Mr. Heydrick is quite sure; but he has no more idea than a child of how or from whom it will come. Some morning he may be found starting away from his home without a cent in his pocket, having spent all he had in providing food or coal for some starving family, and with the obligation to pay by noon next day several accounts for rent, or funeral expenses, or some other necessity, aggregating one hundred and fifty dollars, or some such seemingly unattainable sum. How does he expect to get it? he is asked. He does not know, but he has committed it to the Lord.
He will be all right. Two or three days later he is seen hurrying along the street, his face bright and cheerful as usual, and his usual, in need of money. Did he meet his obligations the other day? Oh, yes; there was a letter in his mail with fifty dollars in it from some man whom he had helped years ago, and who, thanks to his exertions, is now prosperous, and desires to show his gratitude to God and to Heydrick by this gift, which is to be used in helping someone else. And he met a Christian merchant who wanted to give some money in the Lord's service and did not know who needed it most and was too busy to find out, so he put a check or some bills in Heydrick's hand asking him to spend it for him. Not infrequently men come to him saying, "I do not know how it is, but the impression came to me that you were in urgent need of money, so I have brought you this." One way or another the obligations were met and met on time and Hey-drick thanks

God, knowing assuredly that it is to him that thanks are due.

So, day by day, he lives by faith, with a firm, unwavering belief that God is the Hearer and Answerer of prayer and that none who trust in him will lack any good thing. We hope the day is far distant when an epitaph will be needed for his tombstone;

but when it is, there could be none found more appropriate than the words, which were spoken of the Master whom he serves, and whose example he follows unflinchingly. "He went about doing good."

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but I must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Benlah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however,
I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills,
&c., and should be kept in every home.

formed in nostrils, one roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my years I was almost entirely deaf, and contin-failed. In despair I commenced to use the

in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

THE PERFECT BIBLE.*

MUCH of the witchery and fascinating charm of Edward Irving's oratory was due to his dramatic power and picturesque personnel; and as this is, of course, lost to the mere reader of his discourses, it should be duly allowed for in our estimate of his genius and of the man. The following extract is from the exordium to his first oration:

"There was a time when each revelation of the Word of God had an introduction into this earth, which neither permitted men to doubt whence it came nor whereto it was sent. It, at the beginning of each several truth, a star was not lighted up in heaven, as at the birth of the Prince of Truth, there was done upon the earth a wonder to make her children listen to the message of her Maker. The Almighty made bare his arm; and through mighty acts, shown by his holy servants, gave demonstration of his truth, and found for it a sure place among the other matters of human knowledge and belief. But now the miracles of God have ceased; and nature, secure and unmolested, is no longer called on for testimonies to her Creator's voice. No burning bush draws the footsteps to his presence chamber; no invisible voice holds the ear awake; no hand cometh forth from the obscure, to write his purposes in letters of flame. The vision is shut, the testimony is sealed, and the word of the Lord is ended; and this volume is the sum total of all for which the chariot of heaven made so many visits to the earth, and the Son of God himself tabernacled and dwelt among us. The truth which it contains once dwelt, undivulged, in the bosom of God; and on coming forth to take its place among things revealed, the heavens and the earth, and nature, through all her chambers, gave it reverent welcome. Beyond what it contains, the mysteries of the future are unknown. To gain it acceptance and currency, the noble company of martyrs testified unto the death; the general assembly of the first-born in heaven made it the day-star of their hopes, and the pavilion of their peace.

"If you get not the soul's attachments to the world loosened before death, there will ensue such a rending and agony upon your departure as no loss of country, of wife, or children can be compared with; and if you take not a cool forethought of the future, nor prepare to meet it, there will come such a brood of tears, such a wreck of hopes as no improvident spendthrift ever encountered. O ye sons of men, if these things are so, and ye tread every moment upon the brink of time, and live upon the eve of judgment, what avail your many cares and your un-resting occupations? Will your snug dwellings, your gay clothing, and your downy beds give freshness to the stiffened joints or remove the disease which hath got a lodgment in your marrow and in your bones? Will a crowded board, and the full flow of jovial mirth, and beauty's wreathed smile, and beauty's dulcet voice charm back to a crazy dwelling the ardors and graces of youth? Will yellow gold bribe the tongue of memory and wipe away from the tablets of the mind the remembrance of former doings? Will worldly goods reach upward to heaven and bribe the pen of the recording angel, that he should cancel from God's books all vestige of our crimes, or abrogate the eternal law by which sin and sorrow, righteousness and peace are bound together?"

A BOY'S LOVE OF HOME.*

To insure love of home in the heart of the boy, an interest in a fixed location, a devotion to his native country, John gave him a piece of land. Not much to be sure, but a parcel of ground, as soon as he was old enough to appreciate it. "It is better than money," John said. Money can be squandered, shifted from place to place; it but represents real value at the best. But this acre was a part of his country, a plot of ground, taxed and valued by comparison with other properties. It was his to cultivate and care for, and enjoy the products of.

"The sense of possession," John said, "is a God-given principle. It ought to be gratified, or even created where it does not exist. Give the child something which is absolutely his. It will stimulate the art of acquirement, and make him feel that personal interest in law and government, which is an impossible condition in community of property, even a family community."

A home of his own was a delight to which, even as a boy, he was taught to look forward. Not a gilded palace, but a certain undefined place of abode, about which should cluster the virtues and pleasures of a mature life.

THE RESCUE OF LILYBEL.*

AS they drove up the avenue, near to the entrance of the park, Philip's attention was attracted by a group of boys gathered around a forlorn, ragged little negro. The black mite's back was turned toward Philip, his fists were crammed into his eyes, and he was boo-hooing loudly. There had been a fight, and evidently the little ragamuffin had had the worst of it. Philip was interested instantly, and turned to stare at the group. Suddenly he started to his feet and almost shouted:

"It is—it is Lilybel! Thomas," he cried, seizing the colored coachman by the arm, "stop, and let me get out! It's Lilybel, and those boys are ill-treating him. Stop, and let me go, quick!"

Thomas drew up his horses shortly at the imperative command, and without a word to Madam Ainsworth, Philip sprang out of the carriage, and rushed into the group of boys.

The old lady did not know what had happened until, almost overcome with surprise and mortification, she saw the boy push through the throng, who scattered right and left, and clasp—yes, actually clasp—the hands of the worst-looking specimen of colored humanity, she thought, that she had ever seen.

Thomas, with a knowing grin, turned, and, touching his hat, looked at his mistress interrogatively.

"Yes," she said, faintly, "go on quickly; the boy must be insane."

When the group of rough-looking gamins saw the handsome, well-dressed boy spring from the fine carriage and hurry toward them, they scattered instantly, and left Philip and Lilybel the center of a crowd of curious spectators.

At first the little negro did not recognize Philip, who almost deluged him with a stream of questions. "Where did you come from? How did you get here? When did you come? Is Seline with you?" and the like, to which Lilybel replied, still whimpering and rubbing his eyes:

"Is 't you, Mars' Philip? My, my! I did n't know 't war you—an' a coat on like a b'ar! I's done been a-huntin' ev'rywhar fer ver; an' what good clo'es yer got!" And Lilybel looked at his old friend admiringly, while he shivered as much from his joy and excitement as from the cold.

"How did you get here?" repeated Philip, excitedly. "Tell me how you came here."

"I done cum in one o' dem big steam-boats. My ma she gwine ter whip me good 'ca'se—'ca'se I los' her money. I jes' tuk it ter go ter er circus an' buy some ging'pop, an' my ma she war awtl mad; she say she war gwine ter whip me till I could n't stan', so I jes' run erway an' hid on one o' dem bustin' big steamboats; an' I was sick—I was awful sick."

And Lilybel sniffed again at the thought of the miseries of his involuntary sea-voyage.

An hour after, Philip, all energy and animation, rushed into Mrs. Ainsworth's room without even the ceremony of knocking.

"Oh, Mamma," he cried, joyfully, "Lilybel is here!"

"Who is Lilybel?" asked Mrs. Ainsworth, surprised and puzzled. She had quite forgotten the name of the droll little dandy who had brought the basket when Philip came to stay with them.

"Why, Mamma, don't you remember Seline's Lilybel?" demanded Philip, in a hurt voice.

"Oh, yes, I remember now; the little colored boy in New Orleans."

"Yes, that's the one; he's here, and he has n't any clothes; he's ragged and cold. I found him in the street; he ran away and come here on a steamer, and he's been looking for me. Some boys were fighting him because he had n't any one to take his part; they hit him after he was down. Don't you call it mean to hit a fellow after he's down? But when they saw me they ran away like cowards. If they had n't, I would have paid them off."

Future Wonders of Prophecy

WHEN DR. TALMAGE DETERMINED TO BELT THE WORLD

he personally invited the Rev. B. FAY MILLS to occupy the Tabernacle pulpit during his absence. The sermons which Mr. Mills would have preached in that ill-fated edifice, and some of which he did preach to the Tabernacle congregation in the Columbia Theatre, Brooklyn, together with a number of others, have just been issued in the first volume of Mr. Mills' sermons ever published, entitled:

GOD'S WORLD.

BY THE REV. B. FAY MILLS.

It embraces fifteen grandly spiritual sermons which have been delivered in all the larger cities of the United States and Canada. Great audiences were held spell-bound by the eloquence and spiritual force of these remarkable discourses which were richly blessed in the bringing of a harvest of souls to the Kingdom. They are the choicest examples of this great revivalist's marvelous gift of exhortation and imploration and their rich variety of anecdote and wealth of illustration will make them especially welcome to all Christian workers and readers.

SPECIAL OFFER.

TO "CHRISTIAN HERALD" READERS. The published price of this volume of 320 pages, bound in handsome cloth covers, with gold lettering on back and side, is $1.25, but to readers of this paper who will send us their orders before January 1, 1895, we will send it for $1 POST-FREE.

CLEAR AND DIM VISION.

happened not long ago, writes Margaret Sangster, that a friend of mine, who has been very near-sighted all her life, her eyes fitted with glasses which have given her a new sense of the wonderful world she lives in. The first time she went to church after the new glasses had been fitted to her the manner of place the world was, she felt embarrassed at seeing so much and so clearly. Walking through the aisle to her pew, she beheld for the first time though she had heard him preach for years, the benevolent face of the pastor. She saw the choir, too, and elders and deacons. The new glasses had introduced her to a new world simply by revealing to her what has always been there. No change had been wrought on the world, and her environment remained what it had long been. But it was altered to her. Revelation had been granted, and she could almost say, "whereas I was blind, now I see!" Sometimes like this happens when one who has never realized the loving kindness of God suddenly awakens to a sense of it.

A YEAR'S WORK AT FORDHOOK FARM (BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED)

IN this new book just published the pen and camera transport its reader to "Fordhook," the Model Seed Farm of America—in so far as such a thing is possible—by affording him a comprehensive view of it as it actually appears. Although the price is 10 cents, we will, upon receipt of two 2-cent stamps, mail a copy to any planter who desires to read it before sending this season's order for seeds. Shall we mail you a copy now?

In addition to the many charming views of "Fordhook," it contains photographic illustrations of a unique Floral Wonder to appear in 1896—something absolutely without parallel in the annals of Horticulture. One dollar per seed would not buy a packet now; but we believe flower lovers the world over will be glad to learn, a year in advance, of the coming of the greatest novelty that has yet rewarded the scientific cultivation of flowers. 'Twill produce a profound sensation in '96, and it were wise for you to write to-day. Address,

ON THE ROAD TO BETHLEHEM.

Marion Harland Passes Through the Historic Valley of Rephaim — The Traditional Stony Pillow of Elijah and the "Well of the Kings" — Musing by Rachel's Tomb and Reading the Sacred Volume Amid Bible Scenes full of Hallowed Memories.

No other stage of our eventful journeyings has seemed so like a beautiful dream, from which we keep thinking we must presently awake to disappointment, as this glorious December morning on which we find ourselves actually setting out for Bethlehem. When the plans for this tour were first discussed by us, we had but one definite idea as to the dates and methods of our travels:

It is a cloudless December day. Going, as is my custom every clear morning, to the loggia on the roof of the Grand Hotel, for a view of the city, I see the sky of a clear amber behind the far-off mountains of Moab: the silver-gray olives on the descent of the Mount of Olives shining softly in the rising sun, and upon the western horizon the round crown of the hill where Rizzpah, the daughter of Aiah, watched the bodies of her dead sons "from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them

It is not, perhaps, unnatural that the vision suggested by the sight of the lonely hill-top should be joined in my mind with that of another mother, David's descendant, Mary of Bethlehem, who was to watch upon the brow of another Mount of Expiation, her soul pierced through by as sharp a sword as that which rankled all those anguished days and nights in the fierce heart of her who had borne unto her kingly lover, Armoni and Mephibosheth. The joys, the pains, the sorrows, and the com-

Jerusalem to Hebron, past the birth-place of David and "David's Greater Son." Our carriage is one of many that take it to-day. The blue of the sky is like that of Switzerland: there are no mists in the valleys between the russet-red and gray-green hills. Our horses are good and the rush of the air in our faces and lungs is an ecstasy. At every hundred yards we are thrilled by the mention of names as well-known and as dear as those of our own kindred and the laces trodden by our childish feet.

THE ROAD LEADING FROM THE JAFFA GATE, JERUSALEM TO BETHLEHEM

(Photographed in the Holy Land for "The Christian Herald.")

"If we go," we said, resolutely, "we will spend Christmas in Bethlehem!" Our itinerary, as then sketched, has undergone many changes, some deliberate, others forced upon us by unforeseen exigencies. This one design has stood by us, a fixed pivot upon which all modifications have revolved.

out of heaven, and suffered not the birds of the air to rest on them by day nor the beasts of the field by night."

"And it was told David"—here in his royal capital—"what Rizzpah had done," pensations of motherhood have been the same from Eve's day until now.

There is no question as to the safety of the carriage-road to Bethlehem. A macadamized causeway runs all the way from "The Valley of Rephaim!" says our guide, indicating fertile fields bounding the track and stretching out far to right and left. We stop the carriage to "look it up."

The border-line between Judah and Benjamin was drawn hereabouts. It "went up by the Valley of the Son of Hinnom!"

Round-the-World Sermons, by Rev. Dr. Talmage. THE CITY OF BLOOD.

Text: Psalms 141: 7: "Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth. But mine eyes are unto thee, O God the Lord."

THOUGH you may read this text from the Bible, I read it as cut by chisel into the pedestal of a cross beneath which lie many of the massacred at Cawnpore, India. To show you what Hindooism and Mohammedanism really are, where they have full swing, and not as they represent themselves in a "Parliament of Religions," and to demonstrate to what extent of cruelty and abomination human nature may go when fully let loose, and to illustrate the hardening process of sin, and to remind you how our glorious Christianity may utter its triumph over death and the grave, I preach this my second sermon in the "Round the World" series, and I shall speak of "The City of Blood," or Cawnpore, India.

Two hours and ten minutes after its occurrence, Joseph Lee, of the Shropshire Regiment of Foot, rode in upon the Cawnpore massacre. He was the first man I met at Cawnpore. I wanted to hear the story from some one who had been here in 1857, and with his own eyes gazed upon the slaughtered heaps of humanity. I could hardly wait until the horses were put to the carriage, and, Mr. Lee, seated with us, started for the scene, the story of which makes tame in contrast all Modoc and Choctaw butcheries.

It seems that all the worst passions of the century were to be impersonated by one man, and he, Nana Sahib, and our escort at Cawnpore, Joseph Lee, knew the man personally. Unfortunately, there is no correct picture of Nana Sahib in existence. The pictures of him published in the books of Europe and America, and familiar to us all, are an amusing mistake. This is the fact in regard to them: A lawyer of England was called to India for the purpose of defending the case of a native who had been charged with fraud. The attorney came and so skillfully managed the case of his client that the client paid him enormously for his services, and he went back to England, taking with him a picture of his Indian client. After a while the mutiny in India broke out, and Nana Sahib was mentioned as the champion villain of the whole affair, and the newspapers of England wanted a picture of him and to interview some one on Indian affairs who had recently been in India. Among others the journalists called upon this lawyer, lately returned. The only picture he had brought from India was a picture of his client, the man charged with fraud. The attorney gave this picture to the journals as a specimen of the way the Hindoos dress, and forthwith that picture was used, either by mistake or intentionally, for Nana Sahib. The English lawyer said he lived in dread that his client would some day see the use made of his picture, and it was not until the death of his Hindoo client that the lawyer divulged the facts. Perhaps it was never intended that the face of such a demon should be preserved amid human records. I said to our escort: "Mr.

Lee, was there any peculiarity in Nana Sahib's appearance?" The reply was, "Nothing very peculiar; he was a dull, lazy, cowardly, sensual man, brought up to do nothing, and wanted to continue on the same scale to do nothing." From what Mr. Lee told me, and from all I could learn in India, Nana Sahib ordered the massacre in that city from sheer revenge. His father abdicated the throne, and the English paid him annually a pension of $400,000. When the father died, the English government declined to pay the same pension to the son, Nana Sahib, but the poor fellow was not in any suffering from lack of funds. His father left him $80,000 in gold ornaments; $500,000 in jewels; $800,000 in bonds, and other resources amounting to at least $1,500,000. But the poor young man was not satisfied, and the Cawnpore massacre was his revenge. General Wheeler, the Englishman who had command of this city, although often warned, could not see that the Sepoys were planning for his destruction, and that of all his regiments, and all the Europeans in Cawnpore.

Mr. Lee explained all this to me by the fact that General Wheeler had married a native, and he naturally took her story, and thought there was no peril. But the time for the proclamation from Nana Sahib had come, and such a document went forth as never before had seen the light of day. I give only an extract:

"As by the kindness of God, and the good fortune of the Emperor, all the Christians who were at Delhi, Poonah, Sattara and other places, and even those 5000 European soldiers who went in disguise into the former city and were discovered, are destroyed and sent to hell by the pious and sagacious troops, who are firm to their religion, and as they have all been conquered by the present government, and as no trace of them is left in these places, it is the duty of all the subjects and servants of the government to rejoice at the delightful intelligence, and carry on their respective work with comfort and ease. As by the bounty of the glorious Almighty and the enemy-destroying fortune of the Emperor, the yellow-faced and narrow-minded people have been sent to hell, and Cawnpore has been conquered, it is necessary that all the subjects, and land-owners, and government servants should be as obedient to the present government as they have been to the former one; that it is the incumbent duty of all the peasants and landed proprietors of every district to rejoice at the thought that the Christians have been sent to hell, and both the Hindoo and Mohammedan religions have been confirmed, and that they should, as usual, be obedient to the authorities of the government, and never suffer any complaint against themselves to reach to the ears of the higher authority."

"Mr. Lee, what is this?" I said to our escort as the carriage halted by an embankment. "Here," he said, "is the entrenchment where the Christians of Cawnpore took refuge. It is the remains of a wall which at the time of the mutiny was only four feet high, behind which, with no shelter from the sun, the heat at 130 degrees, 440 men and 560 women and children dwelt nearly a month. A handful of flour and split peas was the daily ration, and only two wells near by, the one in which they buried their dead, because they had no time to bury them in the earth, and the other well the focus on which the artillery of the enemy played, so that it was a choice between death by thirst and death by bullet or shell. Ten thousand yelling Hindoos outside this frail wall and 1000 suffering, dying people inside. In addition to the army of the Hindoos and Moslems, an invisible army of sicknesses swooped upon them. Some went raving mad under exposure; others dropped under apoplexy. A starving, mutilated, fevered, sun-struck, ghastly group waiting to die. Why did not the heathen dash down those mud walls and the 10,000 annihilate the now less than 1000? It was because they seemed supernaturally defended.

Nana Sahib resolved to celebrate an anniversary. The 23d of June, 1857, would be one hundred years since the battle of Plassey, when under Lord Clive, India surrendered to England. That day the last European in Cawnpore was to be slaughtered. Other anniversaries have been celebrated with wine; this was to be celebrated with blood. Other anniversaries have been adorned with garlands; this with drawn swords. Others have been kept with songs; this with execrations. Others with the dance of the gay; this with the dance of death. The infantry and cavalry and artillery of Nana Sahib made on that day one grand assault, but the few guns of the English and Scotch put to flight these Hindoo tigers. The courage of the fiends broke against that mud wall, as the waves of the sea against a lighthouse. The cavalry horses returned full run, without their riders. The Lord looked out from the heavens, and on that anniversary day gave the victory to his people.

Therefore Nana Sahib must try some other plan. Standing in a field not far from the intrenchment of the English was a native Christian woman, Jacobee by name, holding high up in her hand a letter. It was evidently a communication from the enemy, and General Wheeler ordered the woman brought in. She handed him a proposed treaty. If General Wheeler and his men would give up their weapons, Nana Sahib would conduct them into safety; they could march out unmolested, the men, women and children; they could go down tomorrow to the Ganges, where they would find boats to take them in peace to Allahabad.

There was some opposition to signing this treaty, but General Wheeler's wife told him he could trust the natives, and so he signed the treaty. There was great joy in the intrenchment that night. Without molestation they went out and got plenty of water to drink, and water for a good wash. The hunger and thirst and exposure from the consuming sun, with the thermometer from 120 to 140, would cease. Mothers rejoiced at the prospect of saving their children. The young ladies of the intrenchment would escape the wild beasts in human form. On the morrow, true to the promise, carts were ready to transport those who were too much exhausted to walk.

"Get into the carriage," said Mr. Lee, "and we will ride to the banks of the Ganges, for which the liberated combatants and non-combatants started from this place." On our way Mr. Lee pointed out a monument over the burial place which was opened for General Wheeler's intrenchment, the well into which every night the dead had been dropped. Around it is a curious memorial. There are five crosses, one at each corner of the garden, and one at the centre from which inscription I to-day read my text. Riding on, we came to the Memorial Church built to the memory of those fallen in Cawnpore. The walls are covered with tablets and epitaphs. I copied two or three of the inscriptions: "These are they who come out of great tribulation;" also, "The dead shall be raised incorruptible;" also, "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer: I have overcome the world also;" "The Lord gave; the Lord hath taken away;" also, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden."

"Get into the carriage," said Mr. Lee, and we rode on to the Ganges, and got to at a Hindoo temple standing on the bank. "Now," said Mr. Lee, "here is the place which General Wheeler and his people came under the escort of Nana Sahib." I went down the steps to the margin of the river. Down these steps went General Wheeler and the men, women and children under his care. They stood on one side of the steps, and Nana Sahib and his staff stood on the other side. As the women were going into the boats, Nana Sahib objected to only the aged and infirm women and children should go on board the boats. The young and attractive women were kept out. Twenty-eight boats were filled with men, women and children, and floated out into the river. Each boat contained ten armed natives. Then three boats fastened together were brought up, and General Wheeler and his staff got in. Although orders were given to start, the three boats were somehow detained. At this juncture a boy twelve years of age hoisted on the top of the Hindoo temple the banks two flags, a Hindoo and a Mohammedan flag, at which signal the boats and armed natives jumped from the boats down the shore; and from innumerable guns the natives on the bank fired on the boats and masked batteries above and below roared with destruction, and the boats sank with their precious cargo, and all went down save three strong swimmers, who got to the opposite shore. The who struggled out nearby were dashed to death. Nana Sahib and his staff with their swords slashed to pieces General Wheeler and his staff, who had not got well away from the shore.

I said that the young and attractive women were not allowed to get into the boat. These were marched away under the guard of the Sepoys.

"Which way?" I inquired. "I'll show you," said Mr. Lee. Again we took seats in the carriage and started for the place of desperation and diabolism. There we are on the way to a summer-house, called the Assembly Rooms, which had been built for recreation and pleasure. It had two rooms each 29 x 10, and some windowless closets, and here were imprisoned 206 helpless people. It was to become the prison of these women and children. Some of these Sepoys got permission of Nana Sahib to take one or more of the ladies to their own place, on the promise they should be brought back to the Summer Garden next morning. A daughter of General Wheeler was so taken and did not return. She afterward married the Mohammedan who had taken her to his place. Some Sepoys amused themselves by thrusting children through with bayonets and holding them up before their mothers in the Summer House. All the doors closed behind the Sepoys standing guard, the crowded women and children waited their doom for eighteen days and nights amid sickness, and flies, and stench, and starvation.

Then Nana Sahib heard that Havelock was coming, and his name was a terror to the Sepoys. Lest the women and children imprisoned in the Summer House, or Assembly Rooms, should be liberated, he ordered that their throats should be cut. The officers were commanded to do the work, and attempted it, but failed because those of caste would not allow the Hindoos to hold the victims while they were being murdered. Then one hundred men were ordered to go through the windows, but they fired at the heads of the imprisoned ones, and only a few were killed. Then Nana Sahib, in a rage, and ordered professional butchers from among the lowest of the gypsies to go to the work. Five of them with hatchets, and swords and knives began the work, but three of them collapsed and fainting under the ghastliness, and it was left to two butchers to complete the slaughter. The struggle, the sharp cut, the blinding blow, the cleaving through scalp and skull, the being for life, the death agony of hour after hour, the tangled limbs of the corpses, the piled-up dead—only God and those who were inside the Summer House can ever know. The butchers came out exhausted, thinking they had done their work, and the doors were closed. But when they were again opened, three women and three boys were still alive. All these were soon dispatched, and not a Christian or a European was left in Cawnpore. The murderers were paid fifty cents for each lady slain. The Mohammedan assassins dragged by the heels the dead bodies out of the Summer House and threw them into a well, by which I stood with such feelings as you cannot imagine. But after the mutilated bodies had been thrown into the well, the remainder of the scene remained in hieroglyphics on the floor and wall of the slaughter-house. An eye-witness says that, as one walked in, the blood was shoe deep, and on this blood were tufts of hair, pieces of cousin, broken combs, fragments of pinafores, children's straw hats, a card-case containing a curl with the inscription, "Ed's hair, with love;" a few leaves of an Episcopal prayer-book; also a book entitled, "Preparation for Death;" a Bible, the fly-leaf of which was written, "For my dear mamma, from her affectionate daughter, Isabella Blair"—both the one who presented it and the one to whom it was presented, departed forever.

"Mr. Lee, I have heard that indecipherable things were found written on the wall." He answered, "No; but these poor creatures wrote in charcoal and scratched on the wall the story of the brutalities they suffered."

When the English and Scotch troops came upon the scene, their wrath was so great that General Neill had the butchers executed, and before being shot, compelled them to wipe up part of the floor of this place of massacre, this being the worst of their punishment, for there is nothing that a Hindoo so hates as to touch blood.

When Havelock came upon the scene, he had this order annulled. The well was now not only full of human bodies, but corpses were piled on the outside. The soldiers were for many hours engaged in covering the dead. It was about five o'clock in the evening when I came upon this place in Cawnpore. The building in which the massacre took place has been torn down and a garden of exquisite and fragrant flowers surrounds the scene. Mr. Lee pointed out to us some twenty mounds containing bodies or portions of bodies of those not thrown into the well. A soldier stands on guard to keep the foliage and flowers from being ruthlessly pulled. I asked a soldier if I might take a rose as a memento, and he handed me a cluster of roses, red and white, both colors suggestive to me: the red typical of the rage there enacted, and the white for the pity of those who from that spot ascended. But, of course, the most absorbing interest centered at the well, into which hundreds of women and children were flung or vered. A circular wall of white marble closes this well. The wall is about twenty feet high. Inside this wall there is a marble pavement. I paced it, and found it twenty-seven paces around. In the center of the enclosure, and immediately above the well, is a sculptured angel of resurrection, with illumined face, and two olive branches, meaning victory. This angel is looking down toward the slumberers beneath, but the two wings suggest the rising of the Last Day. Mighty consolation to marble! They went down under the hatchets of the Sepoys; they shall come up under the trumpet that shall wake the dead. I felt weak and all a-tremble as I stood reading these words on the stone that covers the well: "Sacred to the perpetual memory of a great company of Christian people, chiefly women and children, cruelly massacred near this spot by the rebel, Nana Sahib, and thrown, the dying with the dead, to the well beneath on the 15th day of July, 1857." On the arch of the mausoleum were cut the words: "These are they who came out of great tribulation."

The sun was sinking beneath the horizon as I came down the seven or eight steps of that palace of a sepulchre, and I bethought myself, "No Emperor, unless it was Napoleon, ever had more glories around his pillow of dust, and no Queen, unless it were the one of Taj Mahal, had reared for her grander cenotaph than crowns the resting-places of the martyrs at Cawnpore. But where rest the bones of the Herod of the nineteenth century, Nana Sahib? No one can tell. Two men sent out to find the whereabouts of the daughter of General Wheeler tracked Nana Sahib during a week's ride into the wilderness, and they were told that for awhile after the mutiny Nana Sahib set up a little pomp in the jungles. Among a few thousand Hindoos and Mohammedans he took for himself the only two tents the neighbors had, while they lived in the rain and mud. Nana Sahib with one servant carrying an umbrella, would the jackals! Ask the midnight Himalayas! Much criticism has been made of Sir Henry Havelock, and Sir Colin Campbell because of the exterminating work they did with these Sepoys. Indeed, it was awful. My escort, Mr. Lee has told me that he saw the Sepoys fastened to the mouths of cannon, and then the guns would fire, and for a few seconds there would be nothing but smoke, and as the smoke began to lift, fragments of flesh would be found flying through the air. You may do your own criticism. I here express no opinion. There can be no doubt, however, that that mode of finally treating the Sepoys broke the back of the mutiny. The Hindoos found that the Europeans could play at the same game which the Asiatics had started. The plot was organized for the murder of all the Europeans and Americans in India. Under its knives and bludgeons American Presbyterianism lost its glorious missionaries, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Campbell, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. MacMullin, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Freeman. The work of slaughter to be pulled out from under the corpses. Mrs. Carey, who survived, was taken by the Indian Nabob into his harem and kept a prisoner six years. Lucknow in 1857, was only an echo of Calcutta in 1756. During the mutiny of which I have been speaking, natives who had been in the service of Europeans and well treated by them, and with no cause of offence would at the call of the mutineers and without any compunction stab to death the fathers and mothers of the household and dash out the brains of the children. These natives are at peace now, but give them a chance and they will re-enact the scenes of 1756 and 1857. They look upon the English as conquerors and themselves as conquered. The mutiny of 1857 occurred because the British Government was too lenient and put in places of trust, and in command of forts, too many of the natives. I call upon England to stop the present attempt to palliate the natives by allowing them to hold positions of trust. I am no alarmist, but the only way that these Asiatics can be kept from another mutiny is to put them out of power, and I say beware! or the Lucknow, and Cawnpore and Delhi martyrdoms over which the hemispheres have wept will be eclipsed by the Lucknow, and Cawnpore, and Delhi martyrdoms yet to be enacted. I speak of what I have seen and heard. I give the opinion of every intelligent Englishman, and Scotchman, and Irishman, and American whom I met in India. Prevention is better than cure. I do not say it is better that England rule India. I say nothing against the right of India to rule herself. But I do say that the moment the native population of India think there is a possibility of driving back Europeans from India they will make the attempt, and that they have enough cruelties for the time suppressed, which if let loose would submerge with carnage everything from Calcutta to Bombay, and from the Himalayas to Coromandel.

Now, my friends, go home, after what I have said, to see the beauties of the Mohammedanism and Hindooism, which many think it will be well to have introduced into America; and to dwell upon what natural evolution will do where it has had its unhindered way for thousands of years. And to think upon the wonders of martyrdom for Christ's sake; and to pray more earnest prayers for the missionaries and to contribute more largely for the world's evangelization, and to be more assured than ever that the overthrow of the idolatries of nations is such a stupendous work, that nothing but an Omnipotent God through the Gospel of Jesus Christ can ever achieve it. Amen!

THE LORD'S PRAYER IN ACROSTIC.*

MAKE known thy Gospel truths, our father, king,
Yield us thy grace, dear Father, from above;
Bless us with hearts which feelingly can sing,
"Our life thou art forever, God of love."
Assuage our grief in love for Christ, we pray.
Since the bright prince of heaven and glory died,
Took all our sins and hallowed the display.
Infant being, first a man and then was crucified,
Stupendous God! thy grace and power make known,
In Jesus' name let all the world rejoice,
New labor in thy heavenly kingdom own;
That blessed kingdom for thy saints the choice.
How vile to come to thee is all our cry,
Enemies to thyself and all that's thine,
Graceless our will, we live for vanity.
Loathing thy very being, evil in design,
O God, thy will be done from earth to heaven
Reclining on the Gospel let us live
In earth from sin delivered and forgiven.
Oh! as thyself but teach us to forgive,
Unless its power temptation doth destroy,
Sure is our fall into the depths of woe,
Carnal in mind we've not a glimpse of joy.
Raised against heaven; in us hope bestow,
O give us grace and lead us on thy way.
Shine on us with thy love and give us peace,
Self and this sin that rise against us stay.
Oh! grant each day our trespasses may cease,
Forgive our evil deeds that oft we do,
Convince us daily of them to our shame,
Help us with heavenly bread, forgive us, too,
Recurrent lusts, "and we," will bless thy name,
In thy forgiveness we as saints can die,
Since for us and our trespasses so high,
Thy Son our Saviour—bled on Calvary.

*The acrostic reads, "My boast is in the glorious Cross of Christ." The words in italics, read from top to bottom—left—and from bottom to top—right—form the Lord's Prayer. By experts this is thought to be one of the most remarkable compositions on record.

go every day to bathe, and people would go and stare. For some reason after awhile he forsook even that small attention and disappeared among the ravines of the Himalayan mountains. He took with him in his flight that which he always took with him—a ruby of vast value. He wore it as some wear an amulet. He wore it as some wear a life-preserver. He wore it on his bosom. The Hindoo priest told him as long as he wore that ruby his fortunes would be good, but both the ruby and the prince who wore it have vanished. Not a treasure on the outside of the bosom, but a treasure inside the heart, is the best protection. Solomon, who had rubies in the hilt of swords, and rubies in the lip of the tankards, and rubies in his crown, declared that which Nana Sahib did not find out in time: "wisdom is better than rubies." When the forests of India are cleared by the axes of another civilization, the lost ruby of this Cawnpore monster may be picked up, and be brought back again to blaze among the world's jewels. But who shall reclaim for decent sepulture the remains of Nana Sahib? Ask the vultures! Ask the reptiles! Ask had begun in all directions on an appalling scale, and the commanders of the English army made up their minds that this was the best way to stop it. A mild and gentle war with the Sepoys was an impossibility. The natives of India ever and anon have demonstrated their cruelty. I stood on the very spot in Calcutta where the natives of India in 1756 enacted that scene which no other people on earth could have enacted. The Black Hole prison has been torn down, but a stone pavement twenty feet by twenty indicates the ground covered by the prison. The building had two small windows and was intended for two or three prisoners. These natives of India crowded into that one room of 20 feet by 20 feet, 146 Europeans. The midsummer heat, the suffocation, the trampling of one upon another, the groaning and shrieking and begging and praying of all, are matters of history. The Sepoys that night held lights to the small windows and mocked the sufferers. Then all the sounds ceased. That night of June 20, 1756 passed and 123 corpses were taken out. Only 23 people of the 146 were alive, and they had

THE PRINCE OF PEACE.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 23. Isa. 9: 2-7. Golden Text Luke 8: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE prophecies of the Word of God have often a double or treble fulfilment. This is strikingly the case with the chapters in Isaiah which foretell the birth of Christ. Written in the time of king Ahaz, the wicked, idolatrous father of the good Hezekiah, they had a significance for him and for his people, in the times of which he lived. Already, seven hundred years and more, before the fulness of the time was come, God was anticipating the sending of his Son, and the great purpose of his heart which lies behind the coming of the Messiah,—the bringing out from among the Gentiles of "a people for his name," who should be made partakers of the Divine Nature, and fulfil the depth of his thought in that wonderful word: "Immanuel." Men will not have God. Men will seek deliverance at the hand of any one rather than God; and he must let them have their way until they have learned to the full the lesson of their nothingness. "Make an uproar, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces; and give ear, all ye of far countries; gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces." Take counsel together, all ye people, and it shall be brought to nought; speak the word, and it shall not stand: for God is with us. Again, the same word, Immanuel which had no meaning for an unbelieving Ahaz, which has no signification for an unbelieving world, but which is everything to a people called, "according to his purpose," to be "conformed to the image of his Son." Perhaps the prophet himself understood only dimly the wonderful glory of the words he uttered. But one thing was clear to him, he must not be one with

The Spirit of the Age

in which he lived, he must not live and act, speak and think as they did. "For the Lord spake thus to me with strong hand and instructed me that I should not walk in the way of this people." But the light God gave Isaiah to give out to the people was for the future. "Bind thou up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples." And the prophet was obedient, he bound up the testimony for the latter days, which only he and a few others would receive in his time; a few like Zacharias and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, in the time of the actual birth of God's Immanuel. And Isaiah responded to his God: "I will wait for the Lord, that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for him." He became then what the members of Christ's Bride are now, a child of light, in whose heart the Star of Bethlehem had already arisen. But he looked around, and his heart grieved for the miserable generation in which he lived, seeking "to them that have familiar spirits, and to wizards which chird and which mutter," to all the jugglery of idolatrous priests and devil-worshippers, and he asks, "Should not a people seek unto their God? On behalf of the living should they seek unto the dead? To the law and to the testimony. If they speak not according to this word, surely there is no morning for them." (Isa. 8: 17-20, R.V.) The prophet looked out beyond the deep night which had settled down upon his people, and his eye was upon the coming dawn, but the unbelieving world never knew the morning. "They shall tret themselves, and curse by their king and by their God, and shall turn their faces upward; and they shall look unto the earth, and behold distress and darkness, the gloom of anguish; and into thick darkness shall they be driven away. But the remnant, those few who bear the burden of the Lord, and who look for redemption in Jerusalem, shall be made an exception: "There shall be no gloom for her that was in anguish," such as sigh and cry for all the abominations which are done in Jerusalem. They shall see the morning which was dawning upon Isaiah. "God with us," should take form in their expectations. "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; and they that dwelt in the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined." It was not in Jerusalem, it was not even in Bethlehem where he was born that the light of "God with us" was manifested in his words and works, but in Capernaum, in the border of Zebulun and Naphtali, in Galilee of the nations, among the most despised of the dwellers in Palestine. "For unto us a Child is born, unto us

A Son is Given."

All which has gone before in the two previous chapters has led up to this: incarnate God, Divine Man. And God gives Isaiah a wondrous glimpse of his glory when he writes, "And his name shall be called, Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of peace." It was the same prophet to whom was given to prophecy of the suffering Saviour. He who understands the inner nature of Christ will enter into the fulness of Redemption, and he only who knows God's hand and God's glory in Redemption will know how to look for our coming Lord, and to prepare for his return. Isaiah had seen with deep sorrow, his people, the outward people of the Lord, turning to miserable idols and to the lying wizards "which chird and which mutter," while he had to announce the coming of Immanuel who should be Wonderful, past finding out, and, at the same time, "Counsellor," "wonderful in counsel." He saw what his people were losing, he saw what his God was losing, through their unbelief, and his heart was grieved. Yet, instead of giving way to despondency he waited for the Lord and looked for him. It did not trouble him that the Messiah was to come on earth as a child; to Isaiah he was still, in all his weakness, the Mighty God, the Father of Eternity, (R.V. margin), for God should give him power to give eternal life to as many as he hath given him and "the Prince of peace." Isaiah's time was one of war. Israel and Judah were at war and at war one with the other. All the accompaniments of war were present before his eyes, the mourning and desolate widows and orphans, the scarcity of food, the sickness which always follows in the wake of war, above all the failure of God's people to receive, and to set upon his promises to them in the time of war. He saw before his eyes both king and people afraid. But he looked on to the morning, to the coming of Immanuel, "the Prince of peace." He saw that a time was coming when they should learn war no more; again and again bright glimpses of the reign of peace were given to the man of God, and his heart goes out in his prophetic utterance, "Of the increase of his government and of peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to establish it, and to uphold it, with judgment and with righteousness from henceforth even for ever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts shall perform this."

But the Prince of peace has his own kingdom of "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost," even here now. When his people let him reign there when the government is put upon his shoulder, no other shoulder bears the weight of it, and there most surely, peace is established, whether it be in a heart or life, or in a family, or a church. Where the reins of government are handed over to the Prince of peace, there peace always deepens, and nothing can disturb the peace of his reign. Whatever disturbs the deep settled peace of our souls when we have accepted him as our true real King, comes from some interference with his government. He can keep us in peace in the deepest trials, in the hottest furnaces of temptation, but the moment we shoulder the government in the smallest thing there comes a disturbance of our peace, and, what is of far more consequence, dishonor to him. "Great peace have they which love thy law, and nothing shall offend them," his law is the rule of his reign, and as we come under the Scripture, we come under his government and the increase of it. He conquers us by his Word yielded to, and sets up his rule of peace. And he gives us an eye to understand his working and to know that he is making all things work together for good to them that love him. He has the government of his church, of his cause, of his coming kingdom: this fact makes us understand how to be patient unto the coming of the Lord. The true characteristic of his waiting ones is the undisturbed peace in which he maintains them under all circumstances.

He Reigns Already—

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

ISAIAH prophesied in a period of national trouble. There had been a time of great prosperity caused chiefly by the opening up of trade with foreign countries. But wealth had drifted into the possession of a class of unscrupulous and avaricious men. They had used it to increase their power, buying up the estates of their needy neighbors or acquiring them by craft. The poor were worse off than ever, being cheated and oppressed by the upper classes. The king was the weak and pleasure-loving Ahaz, whose idolatrous wives guided his policy and encouraged him to trust in their gods.

The whole court was given up to gaiety and luxury, heedless of the want and suffering around them. Isaiah uttered his warning to king and court and wrote a book comprising several chapters of the book which bears his name in our Bible. They did not heed him, however, but continued their corrupt and vicious course. But they were startled when they heard that the king of Israel and the king of Damascus had formed an alliance against them and were moving against the capital with a large army. Ahaz and his nobles could think of nothing better than to invite the help of the powerful king of Assyria. He would gladly come to their assistance and crush their allied enemies, for he wanted an excuse to enter Palestine. Then Isaiah spoke again. He warned Ahaz that the king of Assyria would exact a price for his help which would ruin the country. The king of Assyria would be his master demanding subjection and the payment of a heavy tribute. Isaiah implored Ahaz to take no such suicidal course. He advised something very different. Let the king purify his court and do justice; let him quit his idols and turn to God and he would be delivered. His trouble had come because of his sins, and it would be removed when he repented and amended his ways. His advice was not taken and the event happened as he had foreseen. In the subsequent trouble Isaiah issued another book. He had conceived the idea of a remnant (see Isa. 6: 13), a people who should serve God in the midst of the idolatrous nation. A real Israel, true to God, while the kingdom went its wicked way. He sees that the nation was doomed, but this remnant should survive. As he writes, a light breaks upon him, the true meaning of which he probably did not understand. He sees his people delivered, happy and prosperous under a heaven-sent king. The light comes from that north-eastern district where the misery was most severe—that Galilee, in which seven centuries later, Christ was to do his great work. The king was to come as a child, wonderfully gifted and endowed and under him there would be perpetual peace, all the paraphernalia of war would be destroyed and of his rule there should be no end.

The people that walked in darkness. A traveller in Egypt and Asia Minor writes that he never met any people with such a dread of darkness as these. He says, "On one occasion, having bathed and dined, we set out on our return to the boat; our guides urging us all the time to hasten lest we be benighted. They said that serpents and venomous reptiles always come down in the night to the water to drink, and we might tread upon them. The dread of robbers also seemed to harass them continually. I remember, too, that when at Dendera, a left an Arab in charge of our goods while we made an excursion, he deserted them at nightfall. Nothing would have induced him to remain alone at his post alone in the dark." They do not have the same horror of moral or spiritual darkness.

A great light. Light is a revealer of perfections, as well as a protection from hidden dangers. Many a person has thought himself fairly good until he came into God's light and then discovered his own wickedness. "It is the fault of the sunlight," said a servant to whom her mistress was pointing out the dirt in the corners of a room which had been recently swept. She said that she swept it in the evening and it looked clean when she finished. It was the sunlight that made it look dirty. The natural reply was that there was no fault in the sunlight; it simply showed the dirt that was there where it should not have been.

Of the increase of his government there shall be no end. Christ has gained the victory of all realms extending to every land and yet to be universal, and he gained it by his voluntary humiliation. He is endeared to all hearts by coming as a child in a humble family and living a life of poverty and hardship. When Alexander began his career of conquest, he gave away everything he possessed, and in his early victories he distributed the spoils among his followers. When his friends expostulated with him for such profuse generosity, reminding him that he would need something for himself, he is said to have replied that all such things were beneath him, and that he who aspired to universal dominion must forget himself and his own interests. Alexander's motive was only another form of selfishness, because he was only sacrificing his present interest to his future interest; but our Lord sacrificed himself that he might save the world.

Unto us a child is born. At the centre of the birth of George Stephenson, the pioneer of steam locomotion, there was a great celebration in England. Processions and demonstrations of various kinds were organized. As one of them was being unrolled at Newcastle, there came up a troop of humble, poorly-clad peasants whom no one knew. They had no grand soldier-like the trade unions, whose delegations were already in line, but they carried a flag on which was rudely inscribed "we was one of us." They were people from a little hamlet in which Stephenson was born, and they had come to do honor to their low townsman. Their claim was recognized, and they were stationed at the head of the procession. It will be the glory of the saved host of humanity in heaven that Jesus, by assuming human form, became "One of us."

Every battle of the warrior. The glories of the world are given to the kings and generals who have won them by awful slaughter and by the tears of widows and orphans; but the day is coming when the great honors will be laid at the feet of him, whose name is the Prince of Peace. As a great preacher has said: The palace of Versailles, with its countless representations of battles, sieges, stormings, surprises, and all other forms of wholesale and retail murder dedicated, according to an inscription on its front, "To all the glories of France." So well consecrate a shambles to all the glories of a butcher. But what a glorious spiritual palace is the Church, and how truly dedicated to all the glories of the Lord Jesus! Within its walls hang the memories of battle far more worthy of the historians' quill than those of Austerlitz or Waterloo; for the contests are with evil principles, and the conquests are triumphs over iniquity and rebellion; there are no garments red in blood; tire and vapor of smoke are not there, but the efficacy of atonement, the energy of grace, the omnipotence of the Holy Ghost, the puissance of eternal love, all these are there, and happy are the eyes that see them.

The Prince of Peace. It is a glorious name and Christ well deserves it having made peace with God for men, and because his rule means peace in the heart and peace in his future reign. A member of the Christian Commission relates that in going out to the field after a battle he found a dyed soldier. "What can I do for you?" he asked. "Only one thing," said the man, "glancing around at the dead and dying about him, 'read to me that passage about peace.'" The missionary understood him and read Christ's last words, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you,"

"There is the Valley of Hinnom!" interjects the dragoon.)
"Unto the south side of the Jebusite: same is Jerusalem. And the border went unto the top of the mountain that lieth between the Valley of Hinnom westward, which is the end of the valley of the giants" (Rephaim) "northward."
We turn back to Genesis:
And in the fourteenth year came Ched-omer and the kings that were with him, and smote the Rephaims"—giants and powerful 1921 years before the birth of Christ.
If the Captain will look at Second Samuel, fifth chapter and eighteenth verse"—
David, modestly.
The Philistines also came and spread themselves in the Valley of Rephaim."
The figure of rolling hosts like spreading sowers over the fertile reaches, is apt as we view the twice-chosen battle-ground.
The exquisite episode of the "sound of drumming in the tops of the mulberry trees" follows, after which David "smote the Philistines from Geba until thou come to Bezer."
On turning the next leaf of what we note as "a peripatetic Bible lesson, with illustrations from actual scenes,"—we alight on a stone at the roadside for an obstructed view of the landscape we have overpast. Just here, Abraham must have caught sight of Mount Moriah on the third day of his journey from his quiet house in Beer-sheba, where he had left his servant, and where he had sojourned for many days before receiving the divine command to sacrifice his son—"thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of."
Then, on the third day, Abraham lifted his eyes, and saw the place afar off.
And Abraham said unto his young men,
"Abide ye here with the ass: and I and the boy will go yonder and worship, and come again to you."
"Here"—where we read the story, our eyes turned upon the Mount of Promise, our way to worship upon the Mount of Fulfillment, the birthplace of the Divine Only Son whose day Abraham saw the long, long vista of the ages and was ad.
Our guide has a tradition—frankly admitted to be only a tradition—to relate of another and a flat stone on the other side of the road. Elijah, also coming from Beer-sheba where he had left his servant, went a day's journey into the wilderness and sat down under a juniper tree; and requested for himself that he might die:
and said, 'It is enough! now, O Lord, take away my life; for I am not better than my thers."
After the miraculous refreshment of "a cake baked on the coals," and water, he laid him down again," and slept so long and hard that he left a shallow impress of his body in the rock, says the legend. The face of the flat stone is slightly indented, and with the utmost aid of willing imaginations, we cannot trace the outline of a human form. A thrifty olive tree shades the prophet's hard bed, and near by is a large, substantial building—the monastery of St.
Elias.
Another monastery is pointed out on our right when we have bowed along the north road for ten or fifteen minutes longer. "The House of Benjamin" means little until the information is added that here, it is said, Benjamin was born on the way from Bethel, when "there was but a little way to come to Ephrath."
We are out of the carriage again, open able in hand and walk up the shaded alley leading from the gate to the convent.
A thrifty olive orchard hides the house from the highway and we do not care to go up to the door of what we can see is a modern building. The sunlight flickers between the aves over the page upon which we read now "it came to pass, as her soul was in departing (for she died) that she called his name 'Ben-oni' but his father called him Benjamin."
The grove is very sweet and peaceful, adding lilies are springing luxuriantly along the walks. We find ourselves wondering at what season the poor mother laid her own, unexpectedly upon her bed of pain and death, and if olives and lilies grew here then.
On the other side of the way is another traditional land-mark, the Well of the Three Kings, where, as the story runs, the three Wise Men from the East stopped to water their horses when Herod had sent them to Bethlehem to search diligently for the young child, and again beheld the Star which they had seen in the East, going before them

"till it came and stood over where the young child was. When they saw the star they rejoiced with exceeding great joy."
The legend may be, like a thousand others, the work of monkish fancy, but heard here, with the white roofs of Bethlehem in sight, it is exceedingly beautiful and impressive. The well or spring is surrounded by stone-work said to belong to the Roman period.
Our next and longest pause in the wonderful series of object lessons is at the Tomb of Rachel, one of the best-authenticated localities in Palestine.
"And Rachel died, and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Bethlehem. And Jacob set a pillar upon her grave: that is the pillar of Rachel's grave until this day."
"When thou art departed from me today, then shalt thou find two men by Rachel's sepulchre in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah," Samuel told Saul between six and seven hundred years after Rachel's burial. The inimitably pathetic prophecy of Rachel weeping for her children quoted by Matthew as fulfilled in the massacre of the children of Bethlehem and the coats are needed to protect the bodies from hyænas. Recollecting how often we have heard the horrid laughter of the unclean beasts through our tent walls, we shudder at the weird scene conjured up by a fancy enlightened by this new scrap of knowledge. Of the bare and lonely sepulchre, dim under the stars or defined by the moonlight, the midnight silence broken by the growls of the baffled brutes as they tear at the heavy stones, or shriek with delight over the rif-fling of a shallow grave into which the tenant was thrust with careless hands and left unguarded except by the gravelly sand we crunch under our feet. It is a dreary resting-place for the patriarch's petted wife.
The only vegetation near it is a woolly-leaved plant growing under the wall. I pluck a spray and press it in my note-book.
Beneath I pencil the touching digression from the main line of Jacob's narrative to Rachel's elder son forty years after he had laid his darling down for the long sleep on the roadside.
After speaking of Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, as entitled to a place among his father's brethren, rather than among his issue, the old man begins to wander backward in his talk and never completes what he had begun to say at the first: "And as for me, when I came from Pa-dan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when yet there was but a thereof, refers to the tomb of Benjamin's mother within sight of Bethlehem-Eph-ratah.

A chamber about twenty feet square, and as many high is surmounted by a low dome.
Behind this is a sort of quadrangular courtyard with a flat roof. The entire building is of stone, put roughly together with cement. There is no attempt at decoration without, nor, as we are assured, within.
This we take upon hearsay, as visitors are not allowed to enter the inner chamber.
To-day, the building is closed in every part.
We stroll quite around it, finding it blank, mean and desolate. The Jews are the custodians of the tomb, but the graves scattered all around it are of Bedouins. A few are enclosed by rude masonry; the great majority are irregular heaps of stone, collected at random and piled with no attempt at order. An oblong ring of the larger stones marks the confines of each grave, the rest are huddled within this, making a sort of cairn.
The sight is forbidding enough before we learn that the heaps pressing down the dead little way to come unto Ephrath; and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath;

the same is Bethlehem."
Did something in Joseph's eyes bring up the face of his beautiful mother to the dying husband who had never ceased to be her lover? Or had the father a vague intention of commending to the son the charge of her grave and the pillar Jacob had set upon it? MARION HARLAND.

THE COMMON OFFERING.
It is not the deed we do.
Though the deed be never so fair.
But the love, that the dear Lord looketh for,
Hidden with lowly care
In the heart of the deed so fair.
The love is the priceless thing.
The treasure our treasures must hold,
Or ever the Lord will take the gift.
Or tell the worth of the gold
By the love that cannot be told.
Behold us, the rich and the poor.
Dear Lord, in thy service draw near.
One consecrath a precious coin,
One droppeth only a tear:
Look, Master, the love is here!

God has Blessed the Work.

Thirty-two New Sunday Schools Organized by "The Christian Herald"
Missionary in the Past Eight Months.

REV. George W. Sharp, THE CHRIS-TIAN HERALD'S Sunday School
Missionary in the Southwest, makes this extremely interesting report of his recent work. Writing from Kirksville, Mo., under date Nov. 26th, he says:
"In October I preached at a country church, and addressed its Sunday School, west of the Chariton river in Adair county.
I reminded the people that when I organized a Sunday School for them, early in my missionary work, it was in a school-house, and that I also organized schools in four other school-houses—east, west, north and south. Now, every one of those country neighborhoods has a church organization, and a church house.
"The church in which I was speaking is called Mt. Moriah, and occupies a position nearly central between the others referred to, viz: Mulberry on the east, Novinger on the north, Bald Knob on the west, and Temple Union on the south—neither being over five miles from where I was speaking.
In these five churches there have been frequent revival meetings and numerous conversions. The churches belong to different denominations; most of them, and probably all, contribute to spread the Gospel beyond their bounds. How far my labor as missionary has contributed to these results will only be known in eternity; but the facts stated, occurring in a small area, illustrate forcibly the progress of the work, in needy districts, and encourage a continuance of prayer, labor and liberality to reach the tens of thousands who are in outlying and un-evangelized districts.
"Since I was in the locality above referred to, I have written out a subscription to build a church house in another neighborhood, several miles distant, where there is much poverty and illiteracy. I have helped them in Sunday School work repeatedly, and the superintendents and officers have labored under many discouragements.
Souls have been saved there, and their school has been a lamp shining in a dark place, and if the effort to erect a church succeeds, they will be greatly helped. These cases are given as illustrations of the planting of Sunday Schools in school-houses and the like, and their growth, by the grace of God, into churches.
"Last year, my field suffered the most severe financial panic it has ever known, and this year it has suffered from the most prolonged drought known in forty years.
I have great reason, therefore, to praise
God, who in answer to prayer, has blessed me with health, and enabled me to accomplish the work tabulated below, in the eight months from March 1, to November 1:

	Scholars,	Teachers,
New Schools organized,	32	135
Schools re-organized, addressed, or otherwise aided,	24	138
Visits and aids to schools previ- ously reported,	18	92
Total schools,	74	365
Visits to families 826, addresses and sermons 141, miles traveled 460.	1249	1509

"This record is for two-thirds of a year, and does not include the stream of Sunday School and Gospel literature distributed.
Only yesterday I gave two Bibles to two poor families and a Testament to a boy about ten years old who said he never heard of one before and asked me what it was!

GEORGE W. SHARP."
"Christian Herald" Missionary of The Am. S. S. U.

Our missionary's report will doubtless afford sincere gratification to all the readers of this journal, and more especially to those among them, who, no less by their financial aid than by their earnest prayers, have strengthened and supported him in the work during the year now closing.

WHEN WRITING TO THIS OFFICE
In order to secure the promptest attention for your communications, please bear in mind that the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is divided into the following three departments, and that communications intended for anyone of these departments should never contain matters of interest to any other department:
Subscription Department in which only new subscriptions or renewals are handled.
Address Department where all changes or rec-tifications of name, address or date are made.
Complaint Department in which only complaints of irregular delivery receive attention.
Communications to two or three departments each

TEPID PIETY.

AFTER we have been taking a long walk on a summer's day, or been on a hunting chase, a draught of cold water exhilarates. On the other hand, after standing or walking in the cold air and being chilled, hot water, mingled with some beverage, brings life and comfort to the whole body; but tepid water, neither hot nor cold, is nauseating. Now, Christ says that a church of that temperature acts on him as an emetic: "I will spew thee out of my mouth." The church that is red-hot with religious emotion, praying, singing, working, Christ having taken full possession of the membership, must be to God satisfactory. On the other hand, a frozen church may have its uses. The minister reads elegant essays, and improves the session or the vestry in rhetorical composition. The music is artistic and improves the ear of the people, so that they can better appreciate concert and opera. The position of such a church is profitable to the bookbinder who furnishes the covers to the liturgy, and the dry-goods merchants who supply the silks, and the clothiers who furnish the broadcloths. Such a church is good for the business world, makes trade lively, and increases the demand for fineries of all sorts, for a luxurious religion demands furs and coats and gaiters to match. Christ says he gets along with a church, cold or hot.

But an unmitigated nuisance to God and man is a half and half church, with piety tepid. The pulpit in such a church makes more of orthodoxy than it does of Christ. It is immense on definitions. It treats of justification and sanctification as though they were two corpses to be dissected. Its sermons all have a black-morocco cover, which some affectionate sister gave the pastor before he was married, to wrap his discourse in, less it get mused in the dust of the pulpit. Its gestures are methodical, as though the man were ever conscious that they had been decreed from all eternity, and he was afraid of interfering with the decree by his own free agency. Such a pulpit never startles the people with the horrors of an undone eternity. No strong meat, but only flour and water, mostly water. The church prayer-meeting is attended only by a few grey-heads, who have been in the habit of going there for twenty years, not because they expect any arousing time or rapturous experiences, but because they feel only a few will be there, and they ought to go. The minister is sound. The membership sound. The music sound. If, standing in a city of a hundred thousand people, there are five or ten conversions a year, everything is thought to be "encouraging."

Better warm up or freeze over. Better set the kettle outside in the atmosphere at zero, or put it on the altar of God and stir up the coals into a blaze. Let all arouse! The nearness of our last account, the greatness of the work to be done, and the calls of God's Word and Providence, ought to stir our souls. After having been in the harvest field so long it would be a shame in the nightfall of death to go home empty-handed. Gather up a few gleanings from the field, and beat them out, that it may be found that Ruth had at least "one ephah of barley."

LANTERNS WANTED.

THIS is a dark world to many people, a world of chills, a world of fog, a world of wet blankets. Nine-tenths of the men we meet need encouragement. Your work is so urgent that you have no time to stop and speak to the people; but every day you meet scores, perhaps hundreds and thousands, of persons upon whom you might have direct and immediate influence. "How? how?" you cry out. We answer: by the grace of physiognomy. There is nothing more catching than a face with a lantern behind it, shining clear through. We have no admiration for a face with a dry smile, meaning no more than the grin of a false face. But a smile written by the hand of God, as an index or table of contents to whole volumes of good feeling within, is a benediction. You say: "My face is hard and lacking in mobility, and my benignant feelings are not observable in the facial proportions." We do not believe you. Freshness and geniality of soul are so subtle and pervading that they will, at some eye or mouth corner, leak out. Set behind your face a feeling of gratitude to God and kindness toward man, and you will every day preach a sermon as long as the streets you walk, a sermon with as many heads as the number of the people you meet, and differing from other sermons in the fact that the longer it is the better.

The reason that there are so many sour faces, so many frowning faces, so many dull faces, is because men consent to be acrid and petulant and stupid. The way to improve your face is to improve your disposition. Attractiveness of physiognomy does not depend on regularity of feature. We know persons whose brows are shaggy, and whose eyes are oblique, and whose noses are ominously longitudinal, and whose mouth straggles along in unusual and unexpected directions; and yet they are men and women of so much soul that we love to look upon them, and their presence is an evangelism. They get married sooner than the painted doll-babies that call themselves young ladies, and make home happy long after the curls have turned gray, and the walk has turned to a rheumatic shuffle.

VICTIMS OF POLITICS.

DON'T enter politics for fun. It may be fun at the start, but it is crucifixion at the last. The path of politics in all lands is lined on both sides with the bleached skeletons of mighty men. "Hand us another," says public life, as it pitches one man aside and clutches for some promising man in law or merchandise or social position. Politics must be reformed, and if you have the martyr spirit, go into them, but if you undertake that style of life for regalement and profit, you make a mistake that cannot be corrected. A United States Senator writes this advice to his boy: "If I were to express any regret or designate any great error of my life, it would be that I had ever connected myself with any party politics or accepted a political office. If you would be happy or useful, or self-respecting, I would advise you to let party politics and political positions severely alone."

The only safe spirit in which to enter politics is the martyr spirit, and then if you are sacrificed, you will not be surprised. The fact that you have great brains affords no safety. That is the very reason why you will be put down or viciously handled. The political parties don't want great brains hanging around prominent places. I am surprised to find how little brains it takes to make a great man in this country. Do not enter politics because you have unusual mental equipment or especial fitness for office, but in the martyr spirit. Generally, as soon as a man gives himself up to politics, he either lowers to the standard of the roughs, or for his integrity and nobility of character is put in the pillory.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

MANY touching letters have been received from the agricultural districts of Kansas, Texas, and Nebraska, containing pathetic details of the wide-spread suffering there, owing to the total failure of crops for two successive seasons. It would be peculiarly appropriate and timely at this Christmas season, if those of our readers who are able to do so, would aid the destitute in these States, by preparing contributions of clothing, supplies, etc., and forwarding the same in time to be available for Christmas week and without cost to the recipients. In response to a note in THE MAIL-BAG, we have received the names of a number of reliable Christian men and women to whom the packages can be addressed and who will act as faithful distributors of the same. We trust that this appeal, from sufferers in our own land will not pass unheeded, but will be productive of a season of blessing to the givers and the recipients. The following persons have consented to act as distributors in their own sections:

J. B. Hughes, Cozad, Neb.

Mrs. Nathan Smith, Amenia, N. Y. We want to prepare a Christmas box of various useful articles and hope to send them where we can hear from them, as to their acceptance and use, for the encouragement of the young members. Where shall we send them to do the most good?

Send them to the sufferers in the farming districts of the West, where all help is needed at present that Christians can render. See the list of names above, to any one of whom you can forward your Christmas box.

Mrs. D. C. K., Van Buren, N. Y. Did the Apostles perform any miracles before the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost?

We conclude that they must have done so, as Christ gave them the power (see Matt. 10: 8). The report of the seventy who "returned with joy, saying even the devils are subject to us" (Luke 10: 17), implies that they had effected cures, from which we may conclude that the Apostles did so, too.

Mrs. J. W. Dobbs, State Centre, Ia. Who was David Brainerd, whose name I recently read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD?

He was a celebrated missionary to the Indians. Born at Haddam, Conn., in 1718, and educated at Yale, his twenty-fifth year found him laboring among the Delaware Indians under the auspices of a Scottish society. Within a year seventy-seven Indians were baptized. He next labored among the Susquehannas. He labored among the red men till 1747, doing a work which for Christian courage and devotion has rarely been equalled.

D. G. Smith, Indianapolis, Ind. 1. Is it possible to harmonize the genealogies of Christ given by Matthew and Luke? 2. How is it that the historians contemporary with Christ do not mention him? 3. How is it that the massacre of the children by Herod is not mentioned in history?

1. That the two were harmonious may be inferred from the fact that the Jews never challenged Christ's descent from David, as they would have been sure to do if it had been possible. Again, at his birth Mary and Joseph were at Bethlehem as descendants of David. The clue is now lost, but there is good reason for believing that Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph and Luke that of Mary. Luke would not mention Mary by name, as it was the Jewish custom in tracing the female line to treat the husband as the son of his wife's father. Thus Joseph is said by Matthew to be the son of Jacob, while Luke speaks of him as the son of Heli. The two statements would not be considered contradictory by the Jews if, as probable, Heli was Mary's father. 2. If you read the histories of the present day you will notice how much space is given to battles, political movements, and how little to religion. Are you then surprised that in an age when there was neither telegraph nor printing-press, so unassuming and unostentatious Jesus was not mentioned by the historians of Greece and Rome? The remark of Festus (Acts 25: 19), shows that although he was at Caesarea he had scarcely heard of Jesus. 3. The same explanation may be given as to Herod's massacre. There were probably not more than ten or fifteen children killed and so small matter occurring in a distant province would not make much stir in Rome.

Francis Altman, Reading, Pa. If I am deterred a man-made statute, local or otherwise, from doing certain acts which nature and conscience approve, but which I find nowhere condemned in God's Word, can I violate that statute? I have read what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has counseled as to the peaceful obedience to laws and law-makers, but is that obedience compulsory part of Christian duty when the law-makers enact statutes that deprive many others of rights and privileges that nature and conscience claim should be enabled, as the right to breathe the air and walk on the turf of the hills, to eat the wild-fruit fish in the rivers and lakes?

If a law is contrary to a man's conscience, that is, if the law requires a man to do something which he believes to be wrong, he is justified in breaking the law, because he is obeying the higher law which God has implanted within him. But if there is any law which abridges his rights or deprives him of privileges which he believes belong to him as a man, he must obey the law and forego those rights. A should work to get the law repealed. So long as it is a law he should obey it. The example of Christ in paying tribute under protest (Matt. 17: 27), applies in this case. Peter's advice in line with this: "Submit yourselves to the ordinance of man for the Lord's sake." (1 Pet. 2: 13.) The Christian should set an example of respect for, and obedience to the law.

Mrs. E. Langdon, Waterbury, Ct. At what date and what season of the year was the Saviour born?

According to the leading modern authorities and many others of former times, the birth of Christ took place four years before the opening of what is known as the Christian era. Dionysius Exiguus, a monk who made the calculations upon which the Christian calendar is based, lived in 526 A. D., and it has long been conceded that he erred to the extent of six years in fixing the date of the Nativity. The date, however, is unimportant, as far as it affects Christ's mission or character, although there has been a subject of discussion for centuries. There was no agreement as to the date, in primitive Christian church, nor as to the season. Clement of Alexandria regarded the 25th of May as the date of the Nativity, others the 12th of April. Modern chronologists differ, so holding it probable that either June or July (when the fields are parched from want of rain) was the time; Lightfoot names September; Lardner and Newcomb, October; Strong, August; Andrews and many others between the middle of December, 749, and the middle of January, 750 (dating after the founding of Rome). Church historians and popular tradition have fixed on December 25.

Subscriber, Hart, Mich. 1. Are all Catholic churches subject to the Pope at Rome? 2. What are Russian and Greek Churches?

1. All Roman Catholic churches are so subject. The word "Catholic," however, does belong to Rome exclusively, although often misapplied. The Catholic Apostolic Church is the name of a body of Christians which I had a separate organization for many years. The Old Catholics are an independent body who refuse to recognize the validity of the Vatican decrees. 2. The Russian Church dates from the tenth century, and was originally incorporated with the Christian Orthodox Eastern Catholic Church. It became an independent organization in 1587, after the fall of Constantinople, and all efforts on the part of Rome and other churches to persuade it to a union resulted in failure. It still holds common doctrine with the Orthodox Eastern Church (commonly known as the Greek Church), although a separate organization. The Greek Church began to exist as a separate body when the popes of Rome and the patriarchs of Constantinople ceased to have ecclesiastical communion together, about the fourth century. Two churches were several times reunited, but the separation was made permanent in 1054. The Greek Church has many doctrines in common with Rome. It has over 80,000,000 adherents throughout the world.

CHINA'S FALLEN FORTRESS.

JAPAN has given a brilliant proof of military genius in the capture of Port Arthur, the stronghold of China on the Yellow Sea. The Chinese believed it to be impregnable. The fortifications were constructed under the supervision of European engineers, and were finished only four years ago. Twelve forts commanded all approaches by land and sea, and were mounted with Krupp guns. Besides this, there were mines under the roads leading to the fortress, from which electric wires ran into Port Arthur. The fortress stands on a peninsula, only two miles wide, running far into the Gulf of Pechili. The Japanese assailed it by land and sea. Knowing the roads were undermined, they marched through the woods, cutting a path for their heavy guns. A fleet of light torpedo and gun boats collected outside the harbor, and as soon as the signal was given that the land forces had reached a position commanding the fortress, they made a bold dash past the forts and safely entered the harbor. For nearly forty consecutive hours the Japanese poured a destructive fire from the boats and the land batteries. The Chinese made a brave defence, but were seized with panic when the Japanese carried the western fort at the point of the bayonet, after a deadly fire from the machine guns. Many effected their escape, but a large number fought to the last, and refusing to surrender, were cut down. The victors found ten thousand tons of coal and an immense quantity of ammunition stored in the fortress. They have now an excellent harbor which serves as a base of supplies for further operations if the war should be prolonged. There is no doubt that China is anxious for peace and professes herself willing to pay any indemnity in money that may be required. This, however, does not satisfy Japan. She insists that China make submission and sue for peace. This is a humiliation the Chinese court is as yet unable to bear; but now that its great fortress has fallen, it must have lost all hope of making successful resistance, and may see the folly of further indulging its pride and arrogance. For it the only way to peace is the way of humiliation. The difficulty of realizing the same fact has kept many a man from peace with God. If a money payment would be accepted it would be easy, but to confess himself a sinner and humbly beg for forgiveness, is a course he often refuses to take until he is stripped of the things he trusted in and was proud of. (Isa. 1: 13-17.)

Poisoned in Church.

The leaking of a natural gas pipe in a church at East Liverpool, O., is responsible for the critical condition of several members of the congregation. The church was well filled on a recent Sunday morning. During the service several persons became faint and left the church. At the close others were so much overcome that they were unable to walk home, and the minister on stepping down from the pulpit fell tumb length and became unconscious. An investigation was made at once and it was found that some plumbers who had been at work in the church during the week had left a defective fitting on one of the large pipes by which natural gas is supplied to the church. The gas is odorless, so the people did not know that it was escaping and sat there breathing the polluted air unaware that they were inhaling poison. The sufferers speedily recovered in the open air, but had they remained longer in the church the consequences might have been serious. The danger was all the greater from the fact of there being no odor to the gas. If it had been coal gas, the people would have smelled it and been warned, but it was so like the ordinary air that it did its work undetected. It is so with some forms of moral and spiritual poison. The most dangerous errors are those that are so like the truth that their malign nature is not perceived until the mischief is done and unhappily these too are promulgated in some of our churches. (Jer. 23: 26-28.)

A Wedding-Guest's Blunder.

An accident which threatens to prove fatal occurred a short time ago at Elizabeth, N. J. A wedding was to take place that evening in Jersey City, and a well known citizen of Elizabeth was on his way to attend it. He had been delayed in his preparations, and when he reached the station had only two minutes in which to get his ticket and catch the train on the Pennsylvania Railroad by which he was to travel. In his hurry and confusion he ran up the wrong flight of stairs which leads to the south-bound track. His train was in sight feared that in a few hours the deadly fire-damp would accumulate to a degree at which an explosion might occur. There seemed little hope of getting the men out alive. In the emergency, two young men who worked in the Boston pit, whose workings have a connection with those of No. 3, volunteered to go down and pilot the ten men out. The risk was frightful, for they had to traverse the underground passages for more than a mile and an explosion might take place at any moment. They were, however, willing to go and, taking their safety lamps, they set out. A crowd of anxious people collected at the head of the pit waiting in agonizing suspense the result of the hazardous journey. In about half-an-hour came the signal for which they had scarcely dared to hope. The ten men had been found and safely piloted into the Boston pit, whence they were hoisted with their guides to the surface. It was a noble and heroic thing that those two young men did. Happily the men whom they hazarded their lives to save, did not act as too many of those do for whom Christ gave his life. They were easily convinced of their danger and promptly fled for safety. (Heb. 10: 26, 27.)

A Deceptive Mine.

A Utah journal reports the discovery of the famous Rhodes gold mine. It appears that a California miner who settled in Utah during Brigham Young's time, on returning aged. Many, however, who have acquired the genuine metal, especially those who have gained it through crime have been disposed to call it also "fool-gold" as it has not secured them the happiness they expected to derive from it. (Jer. 17: 11.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Evangelist Arthur Crane has Just Closed a successful campaign at New Market, O. He is now holding meetings in Baltimore, Md.

There are, all told, Men and Women, About 400 Protestant missionary workers connected with sixteen missionary societies in South America, with its population of 37,000,000.

At the recent Annual Convention of the American Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance at Springfield, Ohio, twenty-seven seminaries were represented by delegates to the number of two hundred.

The Congregational Home Missionary Society reports that for the past seven months the income has been $61,349 in advance of that of last year, and that $21,000 of this was in contributions.

The Netherlands Bible Society, Founded in 1814, has disseminated over 2,300,000 Bibles or portions of the Holy Scriptures. It has had the Bible translated, in whole or in part, into eleven of the languages spoken in the Dutch colonies.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, the Well-Known Evangelist, has been elected vice-President of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago. Dr. Chapman is greatly interested in the Students' Aid Society of the Women's Department and hopes to found auxiliary Leagues in the different towns he visits.

Dr. C. J. Laffin, Writing to the American Bible Society, from Batanga, West Africa, says: "We gladly acknowledge the receipt of two cases containing Benga Gospels and Epistles. The receipt of these books does much to relieve our fears for the Benga churches in the French territory, for the increasing restrictions which the French are imposing on us make us fear that we may soon have to leave the people without a missionary."

In Reference to the Statenent Recently made in these columns as to a half century of eldership in the Presbyterian Church, Miss M.

H. Laid of Lewisburg, Pa., writes that her father's record exceeded that mentioned. He served the church at Lewisburg as elder continuously from Sept. 1, 1823 until his death, which occurred on Nov. 7, 1885, a period of over fifty-two years.

Mr. D. L. Moody has Organized a Colportage Association to supply good literature at a low price. His colporteurs will carry through the country stocks of religious and good standard moral books. The object is to supplant the trashy novels and literary rubbish which are now bought in country districts because nothing better can be secured there at a low price.

The "Chicago Interior" says that this Free Kindergarten Association of that city reaches yearly three thousand children who are not of school age, most of whom are poor and taken from the streets and alleys where the danger of learning laziness and vice is only too well known. Testimony has been received from pastors and church visitors to the effect that the kindergarten has become a most potent factor in missionary work.

A Series of Conferences is Being held in the building connected with the Amity Baptist Church in West Twenty-fourth Street, New York, the object of which is to stimulate and promote public interest in the good government of the city. Rev. Leighton Williams, the pastor of the church, is a member of the City Vigilance League, and has taken a prominent part in organizing the conferences. Meetings are held on alternate Thursday evenings, at which free discussion is allowed. The next meeting is on Dec. 20, when Mr. John Swinton, Mr. Wm. Scudmore, Prof. Geddings, and other prominent men will take part in the proceedings.

A Convention Representative of all the States and cities of the Union, has been called for assemblage at St. Louis, December 11, to discuss and formulate a plan for the care of the homeless and destitute children found in the cities of America. The call has been prepared and signed by forty of the most prominent citizens of St. Louis.

A Large Number of Applications for Admission to the "Martha's Rest Home" for overworked women, have already been received by Mrs. Booth, the Treasurer, at 31 Bible House, N. Y. As recently explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Home is in Saratoga, and it is the desire of the founders to have three rooms endowed for the use of deserving women who may be unable to pay during a sojourn at the "Rest."

Rev. G. W. Mooney has been giving Evangelistic addresses during the past few months at the Margaret Strachan Mission in West 27th Street, New York. Miss Sibthorpe, the superintendent, writes that great good has resulted from his labors. Hundreds of inmates have, in response to his appeals, asked for the prayers of God's people and have given evidence of deep feeling. Dr. Mooney has given his services free of charge.

M. Eugene Reveillaud, one of the Leaders of the McAll Mission in France, is now in this country. He is a brilliant journalist and is here on business connected with his paper. His heart is, however, thoroughly in the Mission for which he often preaches. On November 23, he gave an address in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on the work of the mission and the good it is accomplishing in Paris and throughout France.

A Grim Satire on our Clumsy Methods of bringing the workman and the work together is given by Mr. Jacob Riis, the famous worker among the poor of New York. It seems that while Mr. Riis was hunting in one part of the city for a painter to do some work, a painter in another part of the city was hanging himself because he could not find work. If the churches feel any interest in the poor they could not do a better service than in helping them to obtain work.

THE ENTRANCE TO THE HARBOR AT PORT ARTHUR, CHINA.

and fearing that he would not have time to return and take the other stairs before it left, he climbed the picket fence intending to cross the tracks. But another train was coming in the opposite direction which he did not see. He was struck by the pilot of the locomotive and rolled along the track suffering severe injuries, from which, it is feared, he will not recover. One of the wedding guests witnessed the accident from the opposite platform and his story of the calamity cast a gloom over the ceremony. How sorrowfully must the injured man and his friends regret those few minutes of delay which led him to take the risk of crossing the tracks. But infinitely greater will be the sorrow of many who have been invited to the marriage-supper of the Lamb, but have delayed accepting until death has closed the opportunity. (Matt. 25: 10.)

A Heroic Rescue.

Ten men imprisoned in a dangerous mine near Wilkesbarre, Pa., were rescued recently by the daring of two brave miners from a neighboring pit. The ten men were working in what is known as "No. 3 pit," when the immense coal breaker at the head of the shaft caught fire and within an hour was burned to the ground. The engineer was obliged to stop the fans when the fire broke out otherwise smoke and flame, instead of fresh air, would have been forced into the workings. It was realized, however, that without the fresh air which the fans were accustomed to supply, the men could not live long in the pit and it was from an excursion in the eastern part of the State informed Young that he had discovered a rich gold mine and asked assistance in working it. Young was afraid that if the existence of the mine became known a flood of miners and adventurers would pour into Utah and disturb his colony, so he sternly forbade Rhodes to speak of it. Rhodes, being a fervent Mormon, obeyed, but on his death bed he told his son of it and gave an exact description of its location. At the first opportunity the young man went to seek the mine, taking with him a treacherous man named Davis, who has since been executed for murder. Rhodes never returned. Davis came back with the story that his companion had been killed by Indians, but it was always believed that Davis, desiring to have sole possession of the secret, murdered him. According to Davis's story the mine was one of the richest in the world. The gold was in a cave, the walls of which actually shone with it. Davis tried to make bargains with various capitalists to work it, but his selfishness and rapacity always caused the failure of any arrangement. His execution for murder ended his operations, but his story which was published after his death started several miners in search of it. Two men from Salt Lake City discovered it and their description of it tallies exactly with that of Davis. They found, however, that the shining metal was not gold at all, but iron pyrites or "fool gold" which inexperienced miners often mistake for the precious metal. Their disappointment may be im-

THE QUIET HOUR.*

HOW restful is the quiet hour:
How soothing 't is, and sweet,
When, freed from all the tempter's power,
I rest at Jesus' feet.
Rest from the trials that oppress,
And make life dead to me:
I muse on Jesus' tenderness,
And bathe me in its sea.
How pleasant from the world to keep:
The world of noise and care!
What sweet joy comes to walk and weep
With Jesus, over there!
Not over there, but at my side
He's walking, day by day:
How can I wander, with that Guide
To keep me in the way?
O, heart, why weary grow, and faint,
When presses sore the foe,
When thou canst break from its restraint.
And to thy Captain go?
Why should'st thou struggle on alone,
Trusting in thine own might—
Trying, in vain, to hold thine own
In the unequal fight?

THE NATIONAL CAPITAL.†

THE day of departure drew near. "Uncle Tom's tourists," personally conducted and capitally ciceroned, had seen Washington thoroughly, intelligently, and delightfully.

"Not that you could expect to see everything here," Uncle Tom remarked. "That, I neither hoped nor intended. You have, I suppose, skipped many things, places, and persons notably worth seeing. There are hundreds of details in government work and methods that might be studied to advantage; there are countless things, both curious and entertaining, I should like to hunt up for you in library, museum, safe, and alcove; there are reams of really historic documents worth investigating that are filed and docketed in department bureaus, closets, and pigeon-holes; there are many creative shops and work-rooms that might yet be inspected, where government belongings, from cannons and cartridges to pulp and postage-stamps, are made; there are places of minor interest really worth visiting, if only one could see all and know all. But one can't. Life is too short; feet will get tired; brains will get to buzzing; there is a limit even to the endurance of wide-awake boys and girls. And you have fathers and mothers at home, to whom I am responsible for your health and happiness. So, as the end must come, it may as well come speedily. To-morrow we say good by to Washington. But you have seen a great deal."

They certainly had. They had delved in vaults and crypts; they had climbed into domes and monuments. They had "done" the departments, "covered" the Capitol, and "seen" the city. They had sailed the Potomac, climbed the heights of Arlington, roamed the grounds of Mount Vernon, and, afoot, awheel, or "a-cable," as Marian said, they had seen the squares and gardens, the streets and suburbs of the National Capital.

In the splendid National Museum, crammed with relics and wonders, they had feasted their eyes on historic or beautiful things; in its near neighbor, the Smithsonian Institution,—the gift of an English gentleman to the American Republic,—they had seen many a marvel, and studied hundreds of rare and curious things. They had seen the workmen "jacketing a gun" in the Naval Gun Factory; at the Marine Barracks they had witnessed the morning concert of the famous Marine Band. They were familiar with the President's grounds and the Capitol grounds; they had seen all the fine monuments to soldiers and sailors, statesmen and patriots that adorn the city squares and circles. They had seen where Lincoln was assassinated, the mean little house in which he died, and the spot where Garfield fell. They had seen the store of books in the departmental and special libraries, and had visited the future home of the mighty collection of a million books and pamphlets—the splendid new Library of Congress, facing, with its golden dome, the east front of the great Capitol.

They were fascinated, impressed, almost awed by the grandeur of the buildings, the beauty of the "environment," the air of greatness and of power that make the capital city of the nation its pride, its glory, and its central point.

CHRISTIAN LOVE.*

Love exerts upon us a transforming, or assimilating influence. In other words, we grow into the likeness of that upon which our heart is set. If we love the world, we are apt to grow more worldly. If we love the things of heaven, we grow more heavenly-minded. We learn that the very countenance of Moses, when he came down from the mount, beamed with the divine glory; for God had drawn near to him, and filled him with himself. And as the heart communes with God to-day, it learns to love him; and, as it loves, it is changed into his likeness; becomes a mirror which images the God who dwells within; for "he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him."

It is not asked, nor is it expected, that our love shall be equal in quantity with that which reaches us from God; but it may that does not alter the fact that not one least atom of matter, not one least impulse of force has escaped out of God's sure possession—his absolute control.

Equally sure is it in the second place that God cares infinitely more for men than he does for property. "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" is not asked as a conundrum. It is the solemn announcement of the valuation which God puts upon the soul. Without a moment's hesitation Jesus suffers the devils to enter the two thousand swine and destroy them, that the devil may the more readily come out of a man, because he is giving himself to save men. Doing this, he can regard nothing in the universe for an instant as comparable in value to a man. When the brilliant young McCall of the Livingstone-Congo mission, dying, the other day in mid-work, said, "Lord, I gave myself, body, mind and soul to thee. I consecrated my whole being to thy service, and now if it please thee to take myself instead of my work which I would do for thee, what is that to me? Thy will be done!" he only fell back on the truth before us.

GOD AS A PARTNER.‡

It is well to remember this: that not a man can get any of his possessions, or hold it, except by the will of God. When God undertakes to bestow it upon a man nothing can prevent his having it; and when God undertakes to withhold it from a man no skill or cunning of his can obtain it. Riches take to themselves wings and fly away. Why? Because God scatters them. They come again and our cup is full. Why? Because God fills it. And that whether we know the reason or not. Utterly above any use we may make of it is God's ownership of the earth and everything upon it. We may be permitted to understand his ways of dealing with it and with us by and by; we do not now. Claimants to a Throne.

The Two Bourbon Princes who Aspire to Rule the People of France.

ALTHOUGH the French Republic seems to be firmly established in the hearts of the people of that country, there are still lingering hopes among the partisans of royalty that the "old regime" may be restored either through the influence of a war or by some successful revolutionary coup. Prominent among the possible claimants to the throne is Francois Marie de Bourbon, now a general in the Spanish army, whose portrait, together with that of his wife, Dona Felisa de Leone de Balboa, is presented on this page. Until a recent date, Don Francesco de Bourbon was regarded as the most prominent claimant to the French crown, but he has definitely disavowed all pretensions in that direction, and since the death of the Comte de Paris, the hopes of the royalists and especially the Carlist faction, have centred upon Don Francesco de Bourbon. The Carlist Bourbon princes are descendants of King Charles IV., of Spain, the grandson of King Philip V., who was grandson of Louis XIV, of France, When King Ferdinand, in 1830, procured the abolition of the Salic law, and bequeathed the Spanish crown to his daughter Isabella, grandmother of the present Spanish King, he cut off the hopes of the Carlists in that country. The second son of Don Carlos renounced all kingly pretensions several years ago.

France has been periodically afflicted with "claimants" and "pretenders" for the last twenty years, but the Republic has moved steadily forward, and the people to-day enjoy greater freedom and a larger share of happiness and comfort than was ever possible, even in the palmiest years of the monarchy that fell at Sedan. It is not at all probable that the people of that country will be persuaded, even by the specious promises of princes and the prospective pomp and glitter of a throne, to change their present prosperous and progressive condition. The "claims" of Don Francois De Bourbon and his noble consort will in all likelihood share the fate of similar ephemeral pretensions and soon be forgotten.

EXAMINING AFRICAN CANDIDATES.

The questions put to a candidate for church membership in Africa would surprise some candidates among ourselves if they were put by an American minister. Apparently they form a good test of native sincerity, and they show incidentally how Christian principles are adaptable to every condition of life. Mr. Currie, whose portrait appeared in this journal two years ago, has been forming the first church at Cismamba. Eleven young men were baptized, after answering satisfactorily the questions put to them. Among the questions were the following: "If a younger brother counsels you to do what is right, will you reject his advice because is younger than you?" "If your wife is sick, will you carry her to her relatives and tell them to take care of her until she is better?" "If you have a sick child and the white man's medicine fails to make it better, will you carry it to the witch doctor?" "If the white missionaries leave, is it right to go back to the customs of your fathers?" "If faith in Christ leads you to death, is it right to throw away the Gospel?" Mr. Currie doubtless felt that the answers to these questions showed whether the candidate had really become a Christian.

LISTENING FOR GOD.

I HEAR it often in the dark,
I hear it in the light,—
Where is the voice that calls to me
With such a quiet might?
It seems but echo to my thought,
And yet beyond the stars;
It seems a heart-beat in a hush,
And yet the planet jars.

Or, may it be that far within
My inmost soul there lies
A spirit-skry, that opens with Those voices of surprise?
And can it be, by night and day,
That firmament serene
Is just the heaven where God himself,
The Father, dwells unseen?

O, God within, so close to me
That every thought is plain,
Be judge, be friend, be Father still
And in thy heaven reign!
Thy heaven is mine—my very soul!
Thy words are sweet and strong;
They fill my inward silences
With music and with song.

THE CHRISTMAS JOY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Dec. 23. Isa. 9: 2-7.

ONLY one subject is likely to occupy the minds of a company of Christians meeting together near the day on which by common consent Christendom celebrates the birth of our Lord. The mind turns instinctively to that Babe in the manger. It is the reproach of one Church that it loses sight of the ministry of Christ and dwells exclusively on the Christ in the manger and the Christ on the Cross; but it is well that at least at the seasons with which we connect those conceptions, that the mind should dwell on those aspects of our Lord's mission. Strive as we may, we can never fully realize how much the world is indebted to the mere birth of Christ. It furnishes the link between the divine and the human, which saves the world from Pantheism on the one hand, and idolatry on the other. In the effort to conceive of God as pure spirit, there is the danger of conceiving of a blind force or energy pervading the universe and giving life to the vegetable and animal world—an impalpable, impersonal essence that it is impossible to love. The Pantheist is an orphan, bereaved of his heavenly Father. On the other hand the conception to which men turn in heathenism, in the Buddhist temple and the Roman Catholic Church, while it meets the craving with which the human mind turns from the abstract to the concrete, degrades and demoralizes the man. His devotional spirit is exercised, and by so much is he helped, but inevitably he loses the idea of the representative character of the object of his worship and worships the image itself, paving the way for contempt of himself which must come when he reflects on the folly of worshipping the thing that his own hands have made.

In the Incarnation all the needs of the spiritual nature of man are met. In the sublime words of the Evangelist, The Word that was with God and was God became flesh. In him, says another inspired writer, dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and "he was the very image of his substance." As Jesus himself said, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father." Thus provision is made for the inmost craving of human nature and the prophet's vision is realized: "Unto us a Son is born; unto us a Child is given. No longer is the man who hears and believes this fact, able to worship blind force or images of wood and stone, or even the ineffable glory of the Shekinah. He turns with delighted satisfaction to the Being in whom God was. Thus the Child in the manger becomes the supreme gift of God to the world. We can worship now; we can go to him with the sense of relationship and we can love. It is this conception that lies at the base of all the success of Christian evangelism and Christian missions. The Christian religion divested of Christ would be a system of ethics dead and powerless. Its force, its vitalizing warmth comes from the God clad in flesh having human love, human sympathy, human compassion. This is our Christmas joy, and we may take it into the darkened haunts of the African savage, into the darkened homes of our own land, with the full assurance that it will prove wherever it is received the greatest joy in life.

A JAPANESE Y. M. C. A.

The hieroglyphs on the left of the picture on this page appeared in the "Daily Times" of Tokio, Japan. The Japanese reader would find nothing cabalistic about them, but reading the lines, according to Japanese custom, perpendicularly, beginning on the right, would understand that the Young Men's Christian Association of Tokio would that day dedicate its new building at No. 3 Mitshiro Street, and that addresses would be delivered by Messrs. Hogi Okawa and Siko Ichihara. This was an important matter for the Christians of the city. The hope for Christianity in Japan lies in reaching the young men, and there are a vast number of them in the great city of Tokio. The dedication of the Association building meant therefore an adoption of an organization which has proved a potent means of good wherever it has been established. There are now thirty Associations in Japan, of which this of Tokio is the largest and most important. The new building referred to in the announcement, is, as will be seen from the picture we publish, a substantial one. It contains a large and fully-equipped gymnasium, two parlors, a library and reading-room, a central social hall and five classrooms beside the offices of the Secretary and other officials. A passageway from the main building opens into a large auditorium in the rear which is capable of accommodating one thousand persons. The Association has one hundred members, several of whom are well able to conduct Bible Classes and evangelistic meetings. The members are thoroughly in earnest in their work, and have special committees for reaching various classes of young men in the city, especially the large number who come from the country districts, and are liable to be led astray by the temptations of the metropolis.

AGGRESSIVE B. Y. P. U. PLANS.

The committee of the Blue or Western division of the Baptist Young People's Union has issued in the organ of the Union an address containing suggestions which may be useful in other young people's organizations. They show a systematic way of working which, as it is not copyright, may be adopted anywhere. The Committee's suggestions are in part as follows: First, to organize as many new Unions as possible in their States. There are churches that need the Union. The cause of Christ, considering either the local church or the work in the State at large, cannot be better aided in any way than by concentrating the young people and training them through a young people's organization. One good way to do this is to correspond with pastors and young people where there is an opening, and to offer to visit and assist in such a beginning. The presence of an experienced worker will be a great encouragement.

It will be possible and generally feasible to enlist all denominational agents who are working in the several States. Consult the secretaries of the State conventions, the district missionaries, the entire force of agents of the Publication Society, and if they find it consistent with their duties, secure their active co-operation in establishing Unions. Officers of State Unions, please take hold and push this plan.

Second, to provide a lecture course upon the C. C. work for the local Unions in each State. Four or more pastors can be secured who will agree to prepare one lecture each on a subject connected with the Missionary Conquest or Sacred Literature Course. Let the secretary of each State Union make such arrangement; inform the local Unions that such lecturers will visit them, if desired, and that their service will be free. The Unions would gladly pay the traveling expenses of the lecturers. The secretary preparing the course may determine whether the lectures shall be offered to societies without discrimination, or only to those who are studying the C. C. Courses. This plan, if carried out, will be found to have many advantages.

WHAT ONE LEAGUE DID.

A pathetic incident showing what good a really live sympathetic Epworth League may do at a time of sorrow, is told by his hotel, a kind family had begged the privilege of taking him to their own home. Young Epworthians had borne him there with their own hands; gathering around him they had sung, "Just as I am, without one plea." The dying boy joined in the singing, saying, as they closed the verses, "O Lord, just as I am, I come, I do." A little latter, glancing around the circle with a pleased smile as if recognizing the fact that he was among friends, he asked, "Are you good people Methodists?" adding, "My mother is a Methodist." A little later came the end. The minister's wife closed his eyes, saying: "He was some mother's dear boy."

Here is a ministry worthy of angels. I confess frankly that it never had occurred to me that the League might find one of its best spheres of action in a ministry like this. These Epworthians sought the not knowing who his relations were, they were surprised when they heard of his death in Ohio and Indiana, but a greater surprise awaited them when they shall ask: "When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee?" "Then shall the King answer and say unto them, inasmuch as ye did it unto the stranger boy, ye did it unto me."

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The authorized reports show that there were 1,716 professed conversions in M. C. A. meetings in Massachusetts during the past twelve months.

The B. Y. P. U. is making rapid progress in Alabama. Nearly every important church in the State has a Union. It is proposed to hold a State Convocation soon, either in Mobile or Montgomery. Churches in the cities have issued cordial invitations.

Bishop Fitzgerald will unfortunately be absent from the International Conference of the Epworth League next year as he has been assigned by the Board of Bishops to visit conferences in South America and Europe.

The committee for the management of the Great International Epworth League Conference at Chattanooga, in next year is now fully organized. Mr. T. A. Snow is the Chairman; Mr. J. A. Hemenway, General Secretary; Mr. E. Rust, Transportation, and the other offices are also ably filled. A tent capable of holding twelve thousand persons has been secured.

The Oregon State Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union held recently at Portland and showed a marked increase in numbers. Seventy-six delegates represented their respective societies. It was noticed that the members of the Christian Endeavor Societies were among the most earnest workers and in no way behind their B. Y. P. U. comrades in loyalty to their denominational societies.

Young Women's Christian Associations are making good progress in Germany. A society, which erected a home for girls in Berlin, and intends building another one now, has appointed a permanent secretary for the work.

Over thirteen hundred registered delegates attended the recent Massachusetts State Convention of Christian Endeavor at Fall River, Mass. The International Convention of 1895, which has unexpectedly fallen to the lot of Boston, was a prominent topic, and many offers of help in the way of entertainment were made.

Dr. A. A. Fulton, writing to "The Interior" from Canton, China, says of the Christian Endeavor societies in three provinces by use of the two cents a week plan, "I reached 27,000 patients and preached to more than 100,000 persons in 1,114 villages. I send the three years' report. They have just started on a fourth year's work. If every society in our church used this plan, we should have $250,000 per year."

Homes of the Cannibals.

ospel Progress on the Solomon Islands
The Murderous Soya Tribe of Head-hunters and their "Punishment."

THREE hundred and twenty-six years ago, Mendana, the famous navigator, was exploring a part of the great Melanesian group of islands in the South Pacific, when he discovered a cluster of islets to the west of the New Guinea coast, upon which white men had ever yet set foot. He found them so rich in gold and ivory that at once concluded he had at last discovered the mines of fabulous wealth from which had come the treasures for the adornment of the Temple at Jerusalem, and he therefore gave to the group the name of "Solomon Isles." They were the abode of savage tribes of great cruelty and fierceness and the gloomiest stories were told of their barbarity and heathenism.

It was not until 1857, nearly three hundred years after Mendana's discovery, that the Solomon Islands were first visited by Christian missionaries. Their labors were blessed and at the present day there are churches, schools and native pastors in several places and Christianity has gained a substantial foothold, especially at Isabel, one of the largest of the group. In their quarters, however, the almost untamable spirit of the tribesmen, has been a stumbling-block in the path of Gospel progress. They cling to the old heathenish practices of their ancestors and indulge in cannibalism and "head-hunting," the heads of enemies being eagerly sought for as trophies of war. They are short, but sturdy and well proportioned, with skins of a dark brown or copper color, sp. woolly hair and features that indicate intelligence, combined with crafty, revengeful nature. Trophies of human skulls, curiously preserved and inlaid with shell, are kept in many of the native villages. Rude temples are also found, in which the people assemble to worship spirits. The native houses are neatly constructed dwellings with stout wooden frames and grass thatch on roof and sides.

Many years ago, the captain and crew of a vessel named "The Wanderer" were kidnapped by the Solomon islanders and their fate was never known. Recently, Donald Guy, the captain of a trading vessel, fell to the hands of the head-hunters of the Soya tribe at New Georgia and was cruelly murdered. To punish these head-hunting cannibals, the British warship, "Royalist," as lately sent with a force of mariners to the scene of Captain Guy's death. As they advanced, the cannibals deserted the villages and fled to the heated jungle. Village after village was burned by the mariners, but the inhabitants had fled. In one village (shown in the illustration on this page), they found human arm drying in the sun—the ghastly remains of a cannibal feast, the rest of the body having been eaten. Although many villages were destroyed, not a native of the Soya tribe was encountered. Their chief, Man Choy, is treacherous and cunning, and succeeded in eluding pursuit, and his people are the most determined head-hunters in the world. No new canoe is ever launched unless two human heads are put on her bows. Many attempts have been made to civilize and Christianize the Soyas, but without success.

Abnormal Children.

The best boys I ever knew, writes Dr. Talmage, occasionally upset things or got boisterous or had the fidgets. Goody-goody children make namby-pamby men.

I should not be surprised to find that a colt that does not frisk becomes a horse that will not draw. It is not religion that makes the boy sit by the stove while his brothers are out snow-balling, but the "dumps." The boy who has no fire in his nature may, after he has grown up, have animation enough to grease a wagon-wheel, but he will not own the wagon nor have money enough to buy the grease. There are parents who notice that their daughter is growing pale and sick, and therefore think she must be destined to practically and every moment, and not theoretically and on Sundays, rests on the knowledge that he cares for us at least as much as we care for those who are the dearest to us, will do much to give the tired nerves the feeling of the bird in its nest. Do not spend what strength you have, like the clematis, in climbing on yourself, but lay hold on things that are eternal, and the peace of them will pass into your soul like a healing balm and help you in all the duties of life, indoors or outdoors. Put yourself in the great everlasting currents, and then you can rest on your oars and let those currents bear you on their strength.

Shallow Natures.

An observant writer lately remarked: "There is no study in human nature so difficult to me as a certain class of young girls. I spent a part of this season with two specimens of this sort. They had the usual amount of capacity for observing, understanding and feeling. They had been educated at much cost to the parents; both were constant attendants at church. I saw nothing in their faces or bearing to argue that they were imbecile. Their mother was an invalid, nearing the grave. Nothing could be more touching than the patient, appealing gaze with which her eyes followed them, watching for some signal of affection; but they had eyes and thoughts for nothing but a gown they were making. I walked with them through a forest under the solemn stars. They saw no beauty, no sublimity in them. They chatted incessantly of the new trimming on their bonnets. They were used to the meaning of the trees and stars. The only thing apparently to uniformly joyous; a spirit all sunshine; graceful from very gladness; beautiful because bright. Cheerfulness is always a pleasant and helpful companion; dullness always a wretched one.

STRENGTH FOR TO-DAY.

STRENGTH for to-day; what a precious boon For earnest souls who labor,
For the willing hands that minister To the needy friend or neighbor.
Strength for to-day, that the weary hearts In the battle for right may quail not,
And the eyes bedimmed by bitter tears In their search for light may fail not.
Strength for to-day on the down-hill track For the travelers near the valley,
That up, far up on the other side, Ere long they may safely rally.
Strength for to-day, that our precious youth May happily shun temptation,
And build from the rise to the set of the sun, On a strong and sure foundation.
Strength for to-day in house and home, To practice forbearance sweetly;
To scatter kind words and loving deeds Still trusting in God completely.

THE GOOD MOTHER.

IN all ages, writes Dr. Talmage, God has honored good motherhood. John Wesley had a good mother; St. Bernard had a good mother; Samuel Budgett, a good mother; Doddridge, a good mother; Walter Scott, a good mother; Benjamin West, a good mother. In a great audience, most of whom were Christians, I asked that all those who had been blessed of Christian mothers arise, and almost the entire assembly stood up. Don't you see how important it is that all motherhood be consecrated? When you hear some one, in sermon or oration, speak in the abstract of a good, faithful, honest mother, your eyes fill up with tears, while you say to yourself, that was my mother. The first word a child utters is apt to be "Mother!" the old man, in his dying dream, calls, "Mother! mother!" It matters not whether she was brought up in the surroundings of a city, and in affluent home, and was dressed appropriately, with reference to the demands of modern life, or whether she wore the old-time cap, and great round spectacles, and apron of her own make, and knit your socks with her own needles, seated by the broad fireplace, with great back-log ablaze, on a winter night. It matters not how many wrinkles crossed and re-crossed her face, or how much her shoulders stooped with the burdens of a long life; if you painted a Madonna, hers would be the face.

What a gentle hand she had when we were sick, and what a voice to soothe pain, and was there any one who could so fill up a marry a missionary and go to Borneo, although the only recommendation she has for that position is that she will never be any temptation to the cannibals; or finding their son looking cadaverous, think he is either going to die or become a minister, considering that there is great power of consecration in liver complaint, and thinking him doubly set apart who, while Presbyterianism are laying their hands on his head, has dyspepsia laying its hands on his stomach. I do not think that heaven is so near to an illy-ventilated nursery as to a good gymnasium. If we could trade off three thousand hogsheads of fresh air and stout health, we should be the gainers, but the fellow with whom we traded would be cheated mercifully and forever.

A Restful Hint for Housewives.

There is nothing, writes Anna C. Brackett, that will give a chance for rest to overtired nerves so surely as a simple religious faith in the overruling, wise and tender providence which has us in its keeping. It is in chafing against the conditions of our lives that we tire ourselves immeasurably. It is in being anxious about things we cannot help that we often do the most of our spending. A simple faith in God which which they were not used were the changes in ribbons, puffs and flounces. I went to church with them and listened to the great "Te Deum" which has come down to us through the ages, and lifted the hearts of countless worshippers to God. They nudged each other while they sang it. We physicians now test the temperature of a patient's body, and if we find it below a certain degree, know that death is already in the heart. When I find so low a degree in the words, thoughts and actions of a human body, I begin to fear that the soul within is cold and dead beyond recall.

Do you Sing at your Work?

It was Carlisle who first wrote of the beauty of cheerfulness as exemplified in the man who sings at his labor. Be his occupation what it may, he is equal to any of those who follow the same pursuit in silent sullenness. He will do more in the same time; he will do it better; he will persevere longer. One is scarcely sensible of fatigue whilst he marches to music. The very stars are said to make harmony as they revolve in their spheres. Wondrous is the strength of cheerfulness, altogether past calculation its powers of endurance. Efforts, to be permanently useful, must be room with peace, and purity, and light? And what a sad day that was when we came home and she could not greet us, for her lips were forever still. Come back, mother, and take your old place, and as ten, or twenty years ago, come, open the old Bible you used to; read and kneel in the same place where you used to pray, and look upon us as of old when you wished us a Merry Christmas or a Happy New Year. But, no! That would not be fair to call you back. You had troubles enough, and aches enough, and bereavements enough while you were here. Tarry by the throne, mother, till we join you there, your prayers all answered, and in the eternal homestead of our God we shall again keep the old jubilee together. But speak from your thrones, all you glorified mothers, and say to all these, your sons and daughters, words of love, words of warning, words of cheer. Hail, enthroned ancestry! We are coming. Keep a place right beside you at the banquet.

CHAPTER XXV.
Working for Jesus.

A NEW FASHIONED WOMAN

Written Specially for
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
BY
MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

THE revival work continued. During revivals, when every one was near the Saviour, full of love for him, and eager to work for him, sectarianism vanished in the little city of R—, and ministers and congregations united in the glorious cause. Union meetings were held first in one church, then in another, and all denominations attended. Morning prayer-meetings were held in the most central church, so that business men might be present, and house-keepers, merchants, bankers, and people from all the avenues of life flocked to church. The college was deserted night and morning. Annie, with several from the boarding-house, had joined the churches of their several choice, and now that this duty had been performed, they were satisfied. At every meeting Annie was in her seat, her bright face full of sympathy, full of unspoken prayer.

Annie was earnestly at work among the ungodly, and her influence was great. Among the pupils was a tall, beautiful girl of rare powers of mind who had been a great favorite with Annie. She was in the most advanced class in college, and, since she united great application with uncommon talent, she stood the peer of all of her school-mates. Cornelia King had been a member of the church for years, but through neglect of duty, she had grown cold. So full was her mind of vanity, pride, and worldly ambition that prayer and reading her Bible were totally neglected. At first her conscience smote her for this remissness, but as day after day and night after night passed, and these duties were each time neglected, her conscience ceased to admonish. Her lessons in vocalization under Annie had developed her voice, and found in it rare purity of tone, compass, volume, and bird-like flexibility, so that she had determined, with her parents' full consent, to go to Europe for its further improvement as soon as she should receive her diploma from this college. Cornelia's father was not a rich man, but he had decided to spare enough from his means for this purpose, seeing a brilliant future for his gifted child. Cornelia had fully determined to make the stage her profession as soon as she was prepared, and this decision met the hearty approval of her worldly-minded, ambitious parents. These things drew her mind still further away from her Saviour. The revival was a source of trouble. She avoided the girls' prayer-meetings, using lessons as a pretext, avoided Christians, shut herself in her room and locked the door, lest the newly-converted might rush in to tell their joy.

Annie took occasion to seek her, and as she walked with her arm and arm in the veranda, she said: "Cornelia, you did not come to tell me you were glad when I was converted. Did you not rejoice with me?—but then I know you did, for Christians are obliged to be happy when souls are saved."

Cornelia answered quickly: "Miss Annie, I will not deceive you, but I am sorry to wound you by a confession of the truth. This so-called revival is a trouble to me and I shall be heartily glad when it is over, so the routine of College life can proceed as usual. I came here for an education, not to be forever going to church. You who profess to be Christians oppose balls, cards and other such like gaieties upon the ground of dissipation. If going to church every night and sitting up so late isn't dissipation, then I know nothing about such things."

"Yet you have been regularly, Cornelia."

"Only because I was unwilling to remain in this big, empty house alone. I did not wish or intend to deceive any one, and if it was thought it was interest in the cause that carried me there, I am sorry. I know I shall fall in your estimation by this avowal, but I cannot help it, much as I regret it. I want you to know my true position."

"Do you not profess to be a Christian, dear, are you not a member of the Church?"

"In a moment of weakness I did make a profession of religion. I was honest then, I thought I was a changed girl, now I know that it was all a mistake. I am no Christian, and I wish my name were wiped off the Church roll."

"Yet, Cornelia, it was only the other day, I heard one of the teachers speak of your conversion; she said if ever there was a changed girl, you were that girl, that your conversion was so bright, your happiness so great, that a Christian gentleman said, the change in you and your face were arguments that should forever silence the most incredulous."

Cornelia heaved a deep sigh as she said: "I am sorry, I am very sorry. I did not intentionally deceive, Miss Annie, believe me when I tell you, I was mistaken myself."

"No one doubts the genuineness of your conversion, Cornelia, and were you to die to-night—"

"Oh, Miss Annie," she interrupted, "don't speak of death, it appalls me. I hope and pray I may not die to-night, if I were summoned, I could have no shadow of hope of heaven. What would I not give if there were no death!"

"How long since you united with the Church?"

"Nearly three years ago."

"Have you been regular in your duties, in prayer and reading your Bible?"

"At first, Miss Annie, nothing could have tempted me to neglect my known duty, and I was very particular about my Bible and prayer, but soon my lessons pressed, my music required more time, my art every spare moment, so these duties were gradually neglected. Then I determined to go upon the stage, and I was compelled to confess that the stage and religion were hardly companions, so I drifted farther and farther, so that now I cannot tell you when my Bible was opened, or when I bowed in prayer. It is deceitful for me to remain in the Church as I am, I must get out somehow."

"Cornelia, dear Cornelia, promise me right here and now that you will not let your head press your pillow to-night until you have read a portion of God's Word and bowed in prayer."

"Miss Annie, you could hardly ask a favor of me that I would not grant."

"Then you will promise."

"I will."

Go to your Saviour, dear child, and confess all your wanderings, tell him your sins freely and beg him to show you your true condition. If your own heart rebels at this, do it as a favor to me. Will you promise?"

Cornelia bowed assent. The supper bell ringing they obeyed its summons together.

The next morning Cornelia was at prayer-meeting. Her face was disturbed, her eyes swollen. Annie's heart was deeply moved for her. Upon returning to the College, Cornelia excused herself to the president and went immediately to her room. Annie missed her, and all the morning as she was at the piano giving lessons, a prayer trembled upon her lips for the wanderer. As soon as possible, she hurried up to Cornelia's room, entered softly without knocking, found her upon her knees with face buried in her pillow, sobbing convulsively. Annie knelt by her side and prayed aloud:

"O, God, we cannot, we will not let thee go until thou bless us. O, for Jesus' sake bless this dear girl, and speak peace to her troubled heart. She mourns for her neglect of thee, forgive her for it, she mourns that she has wandered far away, forgive her for it and bring her gently back. Remember that she is but dust and pardon her frailty. O, Jesus, put thy loving arms around her and keep her near thee. Show her that thy anger is but for a moment, and that thy loving kindness is never failing. O, God, see the tears flowing from her eyes, tokens of her true repentance, and wipe them all away with thy forgiveness and thy love. Hear us, Father, hear us for Jesus' sake. Amen."

Amid tears, and prayer broken by sobs

the time was spent until the ringing of the dinner bell, and then Annie whispered:

"Come, dear, let us go down."

"No, Miss Annie," was firmly replied.

"I must end this struggle right here."

So Annie went alone with a heavy heart, and all the afternoon in the art room, tears would blind her eyes so she could scarcely see her work, and her heart was so full of prayer, she did not hear her name called when addressed. As soon as the last bell rang for dismissal, Annie hurried up to Cornelia's room. Cornelia heard her step and met her with a happy smile and said:

"It is ended, Miss Annie, thank God for me."

They sank on their knees together and Annie poured out her soul in thanksgiving, and as she said "Amen," Cornelia began another prayer of thankfulness and closed with a solemn dedication of herself to God. As they arose, Annie asked with a smile:

"What of the stage now, Cornelia?"

"No stage for me, Miss Annie. How could I ever have thought of it! There may be good people upon the stage, but it would never do for me. Henceforth I am the Lord's. If I have any talent in any line, especially any vocal powers, they shall all be used for God's glory."

"How much grander, how much nobler!" exclaimed Annie with a full heart.

Among the outside influences which had led Cornelia to be filled with unholiness, ambition, and wander from her Saviour, was a professor of foreign extraction in the College. He professed to believe in Christianity, though he was not a Christian. He had admired Cornelia's talent, and was the one who had encouraged her to make her mark in the world by a public career. Now Cornelia sought him when alone, and said in a firm, but gentle voice:

"Professor, I have come to tell you, that all my ambitious schemes are given up, and that hereafter all my powers shall be used for my Saviour's glory. I have been a wandering Christian a long time, but I am back to my loving Saviour now. God only knows what a terrible struggle I have had, but it is passed, and now all is peace and happiness within me. Another thing I came to say, my dear teacher, and it is this: I have not shown you how a Christian should walk, my light has been covered up under the bushel of pride, vanity and worldly ambition, but I come now, and ask you in the tenderest love, if you will not let my Saviour be your Saviour? You have lived long for your own self, your God-given talents have been no blessing to your Maker. Will you not lay your sins, your life, your all at the foot of the cross—will you not accept my Saviour for yours?"

The professor made no reply. At first he tried to smile in sarcasm, but when he met her tear-filled, deeply earnest eye looking steadily into his, his own dropped beneath her gaze and without a word he left his section room. As he walked rapidly down the step he muttered:

"Ridiculous infatuation! It's none of my business if she throws herself away."

Years after, when affliction brought him to the cross, he confessed that his first impressions for good were during the appeal from the gifted girl, who had consecrated her life and all her powers to her Saviour's glory.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

April, capricious April had passed, and May, tender, blooming, beautiful May had been ushered in.

The revival had ended. Every one was sorry that the meetings closed, and Annie especially regretted that this harvest of souls was at an end. Prayer and reading God's word were still the sweet food her soul craved, but the strengthening prayer-meetings were missed. It seemed words sent by the Holy Spirit, when, in the morning after the meetings closed, at Chapel prayer, the President said:

"My dear pupils and friends, we cannot always stay upon the Mount, we must come down to daily work. Impetuous Peter said, 'Lord, let us make three tabernacles' evidently meaning to stay. We feel very much like Peter, we, too, would rather stay on the Mount right close to Jesus. But there was work awaiting the Saviour below, a distressed father, with an only boy who had a dumb spirit was waiting to be cured. None ever asked in vain at Jesus' hands,—the child was restored. We must come down too, work awaits us. Take Jesus with you as you go. Invite him down with you, ask him to go with you in your recitation rooms, and be with you all you do. He is down in the valley as well as on the mount. Remember this as you pick up the burden of life again, yet do not count it a burden, a cross. Do everything for God, and rest assured it will be accepted as service rendered him."

These were words fitly spoken, like "a ples of gold in pictures of silver," so each teacher and pupil girded on the panoply of life with alacrity, and went bravely to work.

How time flies, when its wings are plum with work! The hours swept by. Day and nights passed, came and passed again. The month of birds and flowers was gone and June with still, warm, sultry air stepped in. Everything was hurry and excitement for Commencement was close at hand. Grand preparations were to be made, many visitors from a distance were expected, the Governor of the State had accepted invitation to deliver the annual address before the Alumnae.

So the days came—were gone. Commencement came—was over. Farewells were spoken—the College halls deserted.

It was a sad time, that parting with girls. Perhaps it would have been sad still for Annie, had she not herself been going. As it was, she partook of the excitement, was a girl again darting here and there, a smile to this one, kind words that one and kisses not a few. Then engine whistled, and they must hurry. So a rush for seats, such good-byes from windows and waving of handkerchiefs now they are gone. Then one girl would reach home, say good-bye all around and get out, then another and another till Annie was left alone.

The next afternoon she found herself the Depot, Roy's arms around her, phatton waiting for her.

"How grand you are looking, Annie," he exclaimed in delighted tones.

"Am I? I am so glad you think so, Roy. I am certainly in better health than when I left home."

"I expected to meet a jaded and worn looking woman, with perhaps a few very few wrinkles, but this one is so fresh and bright, I declare, Annie, you are prettier than ever."

"Oh, thank you, thank you, but lay all of a brother's partiality aside, I think myself, I am looking better than when I left. Work is a good medicine for soul and body."

"Soul?—that reminds me of a letter," and Roy turned and looked quizzically at her face.

"Was it the one in which I wrote Mamma of my conversion?"

She met his look with a smile, but without the least trace of embarrassment.

"Forget what you called it, perhaps it was the name," he replied in a teasing way.

"I am better than I once was, Roy, I hope you will find this out before long."

"I was satisfied with you as you were, Annie."

"There comes in your blind affection again, my dear brother. Well, we will all this over later, so tell me now how Mamma is and all of your family."

"All quite well and all anxiously awaiting you."

By this time the front gate was reached, and the vision of two beautiful children standing in the gateway met Annie's. Then there was a little clapping of hands and shouts of "Aunt Annie!" "Aunt Annie!"

It was a sweet welcome for her, in the warmest of welcomes was given from everyone, servants and all. Well still surrounded her, elegance glittered in silver and gold, in costly china and furniture, and was reflected in long mirrors. Ease and comfort were there, too, and every effort of Roy was to make his sister feel that she owned equally in all. Religion did not make her despise wealth, ease and luxury. It did not blind her eyes to tasty decorations, nor make her admire less, the harmony of color and artistic appointments, but now these were only side observations. There was no lolling about now with a novel, no time to indulge in idleness except when an overtaxed mind and body demanded relaxation. Her taste for the beautiful and ornate was still there, but she had lost her love for theatres, balls, cards, and frivolity, all were given up for Jesus. Her manly nature was not blotted out, grace had not obliterated it, but it was renewed. Her old self was dead, its passions, its selfish loves, now it hung on the cross, dead!

HINDUS CONVERTED.
Dominant organs of native opinion are concerned just now about the conversion to Christianity of Mr. S. R. Chetty, a Hindu gentleman of high-caste. He has made a statement of the reasons of his conversion, in which he says that he had long lost faith in the religion in which he was educated as a child, and he has been struggling between agnosticism, theism and atheism. On reading the papers read at the Parliament of Religions in Chicago, he was much made up his mind that Christianity was the only true faith. Referring to this statement, a Madras Hindu, in "The Indian Spectator," who expressly disclaims sympathy with Mr. Chetty's views, writes that "there are more than one who I think of at this moment who are on the brink of Christianity." This writer speaks of these men whom he knows as highly educated and men of excellent principles, but they have ceased to draw any pleasure or inspiration from Hinduism. All of them are chaste Hindus and conduct themselves like Hindus in every particular. The writer affirms that some of these men have been brought to the "feet of Christ" by their disgust at the "social inequities" of Hinduism.

HE DOTH COMFORT.
WHEN my heart is sad and weary
With a nameless dread and pain,
Precious Saviour, let thy Spirit
Draw me to thy side again.
Fold thy loving arms about me,
Let me feel thy presence near.
Gently saying to me, "Fear not,
I will comfort, guide and cheer."
When temptation comes upon me,
And my soul is sore oppressed,
Wilt thou take me, so sin-laden?
Wilt thou give me peace and rest?
Blessed Saviour, dear Redeemer,
All I have to thee belongs:
May my soul, removed from earth's dross,
Praise thee with eternal songs.

Oh! What a difference in the evening—when a woman has cleaned house all day with Pearline, instead of the old fashioned way. It's so much easier. There isn't a thing anywhere about the house (that you'd take water to) but Pearline can save you time and work on it. Saves that wearing rubbing on your paint and wood work, too. And what a difference to every one in the house when the cleaning is done quickly and easily and without any fuming and fretting! You men ought to get together and insist on Pearline.
Beware
Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled; if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION
MODENE
AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.
Discovered by Accident.—In Combing, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SAVES THE ELECTROLYTIC. Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement.—Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTRY IN YOUR LETTERS.) TO HELP THE POOR.

ENGLISH people are confronted with the same problem that is perplexing American philanthropists—the problem of employing men who are willing and anxious to work, but for whom no one appears to have any use. As practical experiments may prove suggestive whether they are tried on one side of the Atlantic or the other, we notice an effort just initiated near London. The scheme is to establish a great garden where such vegetables, fruits and flowers can be raised as can easily be sold in the London markets. The committee organized to carry the scheme into execution has issued a circular to solicit the contribution of friends for the purchase of implements, and the rental or purchase of the land. The following extract from the circular gives an idea of the plan:

"One or two considerations appear to indicate the present as a suitable time for the successful realization of our object. Land can at present be secured on exceptionally favorable terms, while the Guardians of the Poor in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex, and of some London Unions, are disposed to assist the work by the weekly payment of the sum it would cost to keep each man in the poor-house. Under these circumstances, it is reasonable to believe that men so employed, aided, and directed, would provide by their labor for the remaining cost of their maintenance.

"The gain of the experiment should it prove successful, would be incalculable. It would realize (more or less) the dream and hope of social reformers, who can devise no better remedy for the evils under which the State groans, than the bringing of the people back to the land. It would absorb much of the wasted life of our great pauper populations, applying it to work which, conducted under such wholesome moral conditions, could not fail to be redemptive in its character.

"A friend has consecrated a great sorrow by devoting to the relief of human suffering the money left by a beloved son who has recently died. This son was distinguished by an unselfish devotion to the poor and the sick, and his father being desirous that the work and influence of his son's life should be remembered and continued, has placed at our disposal a sum which he hopes, with the aid of his relatives, to increase to one thousand pounds. We reckon that a like sum will be necessary for a safe and satisfactory commencement of the work upon a farm of 100 acres, and we earnestly plead with those who share our convictions of the need of this effort, and who see with us the great opportunity afforded by the present condition of our rural districts, to enable us by their co-operation to go forward without delay."

The experiment deserves to be watched with interest. It is certain that in some way, by some means, the situation must be changed so that men who are willing to work shall be sure of employment. This may be one solution.

Hints for Sunday-School Workers

Every superintendent and teacher who wishes to keep in touch with the best methods of Sunday-school work, ought to have THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TIMES during 1895. The paper will contain practical hints on special phases of this work by Mr. B. F. Jacobs and other noted workers, together with descriptions of representative and pattern schools in town and country. Dr. Charles S. Robinson will write on Sunday-school hymns and music, as also Ira D. Sankey, D. B. Towner, and others. Maps and illustrations will appear frequently.

In addition to the helps to Bible study, prepared by the best writers on the International lessons, THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TIMES will publish a series of articles on "Recent Discoveries in Bible Lands," and a series on "Child Life in Many Lands."

Subscription Rates.—50 cents a year in clubs of five or more to one address. $1.00 in clubs of two or more to separate addresses. One free copy with every ten paid for in a club of either kind. $1.50 single copies. To ministers, missionaries, and theological students, $1.00. Specimen copies free.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE WAR.
A well-informed correspondent of an influential daily journal gives the following important information as to the attitude of Japanese Christians toward the war: In the enthusiasm of the many native Christians and their pastors and teachers the war against China is even greater than that of other classes. Not merely do they know that their change of religion has caused their patriotism to be suspected, but they are convinced, and they preach, that this is a righteous war. As the reserves continue to be called out, Christian preachers and Buddhist priests alike march cheerfully to the front, leaving churches, schools, and temples behind for the time. The Christians have always had a missionary zeal for Korea, and they see no hope for the future of its twelve millions of people, so long as China does nothing herself, and resents the irrit of her Japanese partner under the joint treaty. The widow of Joseph Neesima, the Japanese who learned so much in America and became a reformer among his countrymen, has gone to Hiroshima to take charge of the nursing work among the wounded, like another Florence Nightingale. The Doshisha Nurses' School offered twelve of its graduates to the Government, which, after refusing their aid, has sent several of their Christian nurses to the front. Meanwhile, all over the producing districts of Japan and at the ports prices have risen so seriously, even of the necessities of life, that the poor are suffering greatly, and the self-supporting churches find it increasingly difficult to thrive as hitherto, while contributing to the war and losing the leaders for the time if not forever. But all is hopeful, and expect a bright period for Korea and such changes as will bring China abreast of Japan in progress of all kinds.

THE GOSPEL IN ARABIC.
D. H. Jessup, the Eminent Missionary, writes: "The Arabic Bible is now published, in whole or in part, in thirty-two different editions, all of which bear the imperial authorization of the Ottoman Government. Probably not less than half a million copies have been sent out from the Beirut press. You will find them in the bazars of Constantinople and Beirut, in the shops of Mosul and Aleppo, in the houses and homes of Damascus and Jerusalem, and hawked in the streets of Cairo, Alexandria and Suez, and among the marts of Tunis, Algiers and Morocco."

One of the handsomest and most useful Christmas presents of the year is being offered by the Housekeeper of Minneapolis, Minn. Anyone sending one dollar for one yearly subscription to the paper (24 numbers) will receive a copy of their New Housekeeper Cook Book free. This book is the latest revision of the famous Buckeye Cook Books. It contains about 600 pages beautifully bound in English cloth with gold. It is an exceptionally valuable and useful present. The retail price is $3.50. Send in your subscription of one dollar, and 15 cts. for postage, and you will get this splendid work and the Housekeeper for one year. You must send before January 1st 1895, to The Housekeeper Pub. Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM

saw a sight while in the Interpreter's house which is being physically duplicated every day by the users of Electropoise. The fire of health is being continually attacked in these days of great nervous tension by the evil spirit of Disease endeavoring to extinguish it. But still it burns brightly and healthfully because it is being re-enforced by the use of the Electropoise. There are thousands of people throughout this country and Europe who are now keeping the vital flame supplied with fuel by the use of this wonderful little instrument: The science of it is all in the fact that it polarizes the body, thereby permitting it to absorb from the atmosphere the necessary amount of oxygen through every pore.

This brief explanation is of course, hardly intelligible to those who have not studied the subject. We will be glad to send our little book to any who desire to know the facts concerning this wonderful conqueror of disease.

Is it likely that such noted people as those whose names are given below could be induced to give such emphatic testimony as they have done concerning the Electropoise, if they had not thoroughly tested its efficiency?

* Christmas *

WE love to think of Bethlehem,
That little mountain town,
To which, on earth's first Christmas Day,
Our blessed Lord came down.
A lowly manger for His bed,
The cattle near in stall,
There, cradled close in Mary's arms,
He slept, the Lord of all.

If we had been in Bethlehem,
We too had hastened fain
To see the Babe whose little face
Knew neither care nor pain.
Like any little child of ours
He came unto His own,
Though Cross and shame before him stretched,
His pathway to His Throne.

If we had dwelt in Bethlehem,
We would have followed fast,
And where the Star had led our feet
Have knelt ere dawn was past.
Our gifts, our songs, our prayers had been
An offering, as He lay,
The Blessed Babe of Bethlehem,
In Mary's arms that day.

Now breaks the latest Christmas Morn!
Again the angels sing,
And far and near the children throng
Their happy hymns to bring.
All heaven is stirred! All earth is glad!
For down the shining way,
The Lord who came to Bethlehem,
Comes yet, on Christmas Day.

THE TABERNACLE PULPIT

Round-the-World Sermons, by Rev. Dr. Talmage. "BURNING OF THE DEAD."

Text: Psalm 115: 7, 8. "They have hands but they handle not, feet have they but they walk not, neither speak they through their throat. They that make them are like unto them."

THE life of the missionary is a luxurious and indolent life: Hindooism is a religion that ought not to be interfered with: Christianity is guilty of an impertinence when it invades heathendom: you must put in the same line of reverence Brahma, Buddha, Mohammed and Christ. To refute these slanders and blasphemies now so prevalent, and to spread out before the Christian world the contrast between idolatrous and Christian countries, I preach this third sermon in my "Round-the-World" series.

In this discourse I take you to the very headquarters of heathendom, to the very capital of Hindooism: for what Mecca is to the Mohammedan, and what Jerusalem is to the Christian, Benares, India, is to the Hindoo. We arrived there in the evening, and the next morning we started out early, among other things to see the burning of the dead. We saw it, cremation, not as many good people in America and England are now advocating it, namely, the burning of the dead in clean, and orderly, and refined crematory, the hot furnace soon reducing the human form to a powder to be carefully preserved in an urn: but cremation as the Hindoos practice it. We got into a boat and were rowed down the river Ganges until we came opposite to where five dead bodies lay, four of them women wrapped in red garments, and a man wrapped in white. Our boat fastened, we waited and watched. High piles of wood were on the bank, and this wood is carefully weighed according as the friends of the deceased can afford to pay for it. In many cases only a few sticks can be afforded, and the dead body is burned only a little, and then thrown into the Ganges. But where the relatives of the deceased are well-to-do, an abundance of wood in pieces four or five feet long is purchased. Two or three layers of sticks are then put on the ground to receive the dead form. Small pieces of sandalwood are inserted to produce fragrance. The deceased is lifted from the resting-place and put upon this wood. Then the cover is removed from the face of the corpse and it is bathed with water of the Ganges. Then several more layers of wood are put upon the body, and other sticks are placed on both sides of it, but the head and feet are left exposed. Then a quantity of grease sufficient to make everything inflammable is put on the wood, and into the mouth of the dead. Then one of the richest men in Benares, his fortune made in this way, furnishes the fire, and, after the priest has mumbled a few words, the eldest son walks three times around the sacred pile, and then applies the torch, and the fire blazes up, and in a short time the body has become the ashes which the relatives throw into the Ganges.

We saw floating past us on the Ganges the body of a child which had been only partly burned, because the parents could not afford enough wood. While we watched the floating form of the child a crow alighted upon it. In the meantime hundreds of Hindoos were bathing in the river, dipping their heads, filling their mouths, supplying their brass cups, muttering words of so-called prayer. Such a mingling of superstition, and loathsomeness, and inhumanity I had never before seen. The Ganges is to the Hindoo the best river of all the earth, but to me it is the vilest stream that ever malodors, and the capital of indecency. The Hindoos say they have 300,000,000 gods. Benares being the headquarters of these deities you will not be surprised to find that the making of gods is a profitable business. Here there are carpenters making wooden gods, and brass workers making brass gods, and sculptors making stone gods, and potters making clay gods. I cannot think of the abominations practiced here without a recoil of stomach and a need of cologne. Although much is said about the carving on the temples of this city, everything is so vile that there is not much room left for the æsthetic. The devotees enter the temples nineteen-twentieths unclothed, and depart begging. All that Hindooism can do for a man or woman it does here. Notwithstanding all that may have been said in its favor at the Parliament of Religions in Chicago, it makes man a brute, and woman the lowest type of slave. I would rather be a horse or a cow or a dog in India than be a woman. The greatest disaster that can happen to a Hindoo is that he was born at all.

Benares is imposing in the distance as you look at it from the other side of the Ganges. The forty-seven ghats, or flights of stone steps, reaching from the water's edge to the buildings high up on the banks, mark a place for the ascent and descent of the sublimities. The eye is lost in the bepents winding in and around the palm. The god of the Golden Temple is Siva, or the poison god. Devils wait upon him. He is the god of war, of famine, of pestilence. He is the destroyer. He has around his neck a string of skulls. Before him boys whose hair never knew a comb. They eat carrion and that which is worse. Bell and drums here set up a racket. Pilgrims come from hundreds of miles away, spending their last piece of money and exhausting their last item of strength in order to reach this Golden Temple, glad to die near it, and have the ashes of their bodies thrown into the Ganges.

We took a carriage and went still further on to see the Monkey Temple, so-called because in and around the building monkey abound and are kept as sacred. All evolutionists should visit this temple devoted to the family from which their ancestors came. These monkeys chatter, and wink, and climb, and look wise, and look silly, and have full possession of the place. We were asked at the entrance of the Monkey Temple to take off our shoes because of the sacredness of the place, but a small contribution placed in the hands of an attendant resulted in a permission to enter with our shoes on. As the Golden Temple is dedicated to Siva, the poison god, this Monkey Temple is dedicated to Siva's wife, a deity that must be propitiated, or she will disease and blast, and destroy. For centuries this spitfire has been worshipped. She is the goddess of scold, and slap, and termagancy. She is supposed to be a supernatural Xantippe; hence to her are brought flowers and rice, and here and there the flowers are spattered with the blood of goats slain in sacrifice.

As we walk to-day through this Monkey Temple we must not hit, or tease, or hurt one of them. Two Englishmen years ago lost their lives by the mistreatment of a monkey. Passing along one of these Indian streets a monkey did not soon enough get out of the way, and one of these Englishmen struck it with his cane. Immediately the people and the priests gathered around these strangers, and the public wrath increased until the two Englishmen were pounded to death for having struck a monkey. No land in all the world so reveres the monkey as India, as no other land has a temple called after it. One of the Rajahs of India spends 100,000 rupees in the marriage of two monkeys. A nuptial procession was formed in which moved camels, elephants, tigers and palanquins of richly dressed people. Bands sounded the wedding march. Dancing parties kept the night sleepless. It was twelve days before the monkey and monkey were free from their round of attentions. In no place but India could such a carnival have occurred. But, after all, while we cannot approve of the Monkey Temple, the monkey is sacred to hilarity. I defy any one to watch a monkey one minute without laughter. Why was this creature made? For the world's amusement. The mission of some animals is left doubtful and we cannot see the use of this or the quadruped, or this or that insect, but the mission of the ape is certain: all around the world it entertains. Whether seated at the top of this temple in India, or cutting up antics on the top of a hand-organ, it strikes the sense of the ludicrous; tickles the diaphragm into cackling; topples gravely into play, and accomplishes that for which it was created. The eagle, and the lion, and the gazelle, and the robin no more certainly have their mission than has the monkey. But it implies a low form of Hindooism when this embodied mimicry of the human race is lifted into worship. One of the cities for the first time in my

THE SACRED CITY OF BENARES, INDIA.

(From a recent photograph procured especially for "The Christian Herald.")

rolled its stench in horror to the sea. I looked all along the banks for the mourners for the dead. I saw in two of the cities nine cremations, but in no case a sad look or a tear. I said to friends: "How is this? Have the living no grief for the dead?" I found that the women do not come forth on such occasions, but that does not account for the absence of all signs of grief. There is another reason more potent. Men do not see the faces of their wives until after marriage. They take them on recommendation. Marriages thus formed, of course, have not much affection in them. Women are married at seven and ten years of age, and are grandmothers at thirty. Such unwisely-formed family associations do not imply much ardor of love. The family so poorly put together—who wonders that it is easily taken apart? And so I account for the absence of all signs of grief at the cremation of the Hindoos.

Benares is the capital of Hindooism and Buddhism, but Hindooism has trampled out Buddhism, the hoof of the one monster on the grizzly neck of the other monster. It is also the capital of filth, and the capital of wilderness of tombs, shrines, minarets, palaces and temples. It is the glorification of steps, the triumph of stairways. But looked at close by, the temples, though large and expensive, are anything but attractive. The seeming gold in many cases turns out to be brass. The precious stones in the wall turn out to be paint. The marble is stucco. The slippery and disgusting steps lead you to images of horrible visage, and the flowers put upon the altar have their fragrance submerged by that which is the opposite of aromatics.

After you have seen the ghats, the two great things in Benares that you must see are the Golden and Monkey Temples. About the vast Golden Temple there is not as much gold as would make an English sovereign. The air itself is asphyxiated. Here we see men making gods out of mud and then putting their hands together in worship of that which themselves have made. Sacred cows walk up and down the temple. Here stood a Fakir with a right arm uplitted, and for so long a time that he could not take it down, and the nails of the hand had grown until they looked like ser-an opportunity of talking with a Fakir, a Hindoo who has renounced the world and lives on alms. He sat under a tree covering on a platform of brick. He was covered with the ashes of the dead, and as at the time rubbing more of those upon his arms and legs. He understood and spoke English. I said to him: "How long have you been seated here?" He replied, "Fifteen years." "Have those which I see power to help or destroy?" He replied, "No; they only represent God. There is but one God."

Question: When people die where do they go to?

Answer: That depends upon what they have been doing. If they have been doing good, they go to heaven; if they have been doing evil, they go to hell.

Question: But do you not believe in the migration of souls, and that after death they go into birds or animals of some sort?

Answer: Yes; the last creature a man is living of while dying is the one into which he will go. If he is thinking of a cow, he will go into a bird; and if he is thinking of a cow he will go into a cow.

Question: I thought you said that at death the soul goes to heaven or hell?

Answer: He goes there by a gradual process. It may take him years and years.

Question: Can any one become a Hindoo? Could I become a Hindoo?

Answer: Yes, you could.

Question: How could I become a Hindoo?

Answer: By doing as the Hindoos do. As I looked upon the poor, filthy its mightiest stronghold Hindooism is being assaulted.

And now as to the industrious malignment of missionaries: It has been said by some travelers after their return to America or England that the missionaries are living a life full of indolence and luxury. That is a falsehood that I would say is as high as heaven if it did not go down in the opposite direction. When strangers come into these tropical climates, the missionaries do their best to entertain them, making sacrifices for that purpose. In the city of Benares a missionary told me that a gentleman coming from England into one of the mission stations of India, the missionaries banded together to entertain him. Among other things, they had a ham boiled, prepared and beautifully decorated, and the same ham was passed around from house to house as this stranger appeared, and in other respects a conspiracy of kindness was effected. The visitor went home to England and wrote and spoke of the luxury in which the missionaries of India were living. Americans and Englishmen come to these tropical regions and find a missionary living under palms and with different styles of fruits on his table, and forget that palms are here as cheap as hickory or pine in America, and rich fruits as cheap as plain apples. They find here missionaries sleeping under punkas, these fans swung day and night by coolies, and forget that four cents a day is good wages here, and the man finds himself. Four cents a day for a coachman: a missionary can afford to ride. There have been missionaries who have come to these hot climates resolving to live as the natives live, and one or two years have finished their work, their chief use on missionary ground being that of furnishing for a large funeral the chief object of interest.

So far from living in idleness, no men on earth work so hard as the missionaries now in the foreign field. Against fearful odds, and with three millions of Christians opposed to two hundred and fifty millions of Hindoos, Mohammedans and other false religions, these missionaries are trying to take India for God. Let the good people of America, and England, and Scotland, and of all Christendom add ninety-nine and three-quarters per cent. to their appreciation of the fidelity and consecration of foreign missionaries. Far away from home, in an exhausting climate, and compelled to send their children to England, Scotland or America so as to escape the corrupt conversation and behavior of the natives, these men and women of God toil on until they drop into their graves. But they will get their chief appreciation when their work is over and the day is won, as it will be won. No place in heaven will be too good for them. Some of the ministers at home who live on salaries of $4000 or $5000 a year, preaching the Gospel of him who had not where to lay his head, will enter heaven and be welcomed, and while looking for a place to sit down, they will be told: "Yonder in that lower line of thrones you will take your places. Not on the thrones nearest the King; they are reserved for the missionaries!"

Meanwhile let all Christendom be thrilled with gladness. About twenty-five thousand converts in India every year under the Methodist Missions, and about twenty-five thousand converts under the Baptist Missions, and about seventy-five thousand converts under all Missions every year. But more than that, Christianity is undermining heathenism, and not a city, or town, or neighborhood of India but directly, or indirectly, feels the influence; and the day speeds on when Hindooism will go down with a crash. There are whole villages which have given up their gods, and where not an idol is left. The serfdom of womanhood in many places is being unloosed, and the iron grip of caste is being relaxed. Human sacrifices have ceased, and the last spark of the funeral pyre on which the widow must leap has been extinguished, and the juggernaut, stopped, now stands as a curiosity for travelers to look at. All India will be taken for Christ.

If anyone has any disheartenments let him keep them as his own private property; he is welcome to all of them. But if any man has any encouragements to utter, let him utter them. What we want in the church and the world is less croaking owls of the night, and more morning larks with spread wing ready to meet the advancing day. Fold up Naomi and Windham, and give us Ariel or Mt. Pisgah, or Coronation. I had the joy of preaching in many of the cities of India, and seeing the dusky faces of the natives illumined with heavenly anticipations. In Calcutta while the congregation were yet seated I took my departure for a railroad train. I preached by the watch up to the last minute. A swift carriage brought me to the station not more than half a minute before starting. I came nearer to missing the train than I hope anyone of us will come to missing heaven.

My Unchanged Bible.

BY REV. T. C. READE, A.M., D.D.

President of Taylor University.

OUR dear old Bible has been roughly handled of late. Its professed friends have turned against it and their tender mercies have been cruel. They have kindled the furnace fires seven times hotter than usual and have thrown the dear old book into the flames. What has been the result? I know not what others may think, but to me the Bible remains unchanged. It has not in it a line more nor a word less than when it led my boyish feet to Jesus, where I found pardon and peace. It has withstood the flames and has not so much as the smell of fire upon it.

I was never greatly concerned about the human authorship of the different books of the Bible, because I believe God to be the real Author of them; nor have I spent much time to ascertain when and where these books were written by men, any more than I would trouble myself about the name and age of the telegraph clerk, who transcribed the message I received from my friend. I know that all times are God's times, and all places God's places; neither have I thought it a thing of great consequence to inquire whether the Bible agree with to-day's science, for science is such a variable thing that to agree with it to-day is only to be made its laughing stock to-morrow. I have believed the Bible because it has done the stupendous, miraculous work which it professes for itself; it has regenerated the human heart, human homes and human society and has made a sin-cursed wilderness to rejoice and blossom as the rose. I believe it, also, because it commends itself to my inner sense of right and truth, and is enforced by that Spirit whose guiding influence I am conscious of always.

Hear an allegory of my vineyard: I had invited a friend to eat grapes with me in my vineyard, but I presently found him busy cutting to pieces one of my choicest vines.

"What are you doing?" I inquired rather sharply. "O," said he, "only searching after truth: only trying to explode an old fable. I am a devotee of science and a worshipper of Truth. I have found Truth in the stars, in the ocean and in the rocks; in history, in fable and in art, and I think I shall discover her in this vine before I have done with it. You see, there is a venerable book, greatly revered by the common people, that says thorns cannot grow on grape vines, and I am about to expose the fallacy of the statement. You see, I have clipped off this large, healthy stock and have split it and inserted a twig of thorn, and am just wrapping and waxing it to put it into condition to grow. Do you see? And what do you think of the experiment?" "Well," I answered, "I think, first, that you are not at all likely to succeed in your undertaking. The same experiment has been tried a thousand times before, and has always failed. There seems neither to be kinship nor congeniality between the grape and the thorn; then, I think further, that, whether you succeed or not, you have destroyed many fine grapes for which many hungry people would have been devoutly thankful, and I think, finally, that should you succeed, you would only curse the world with more thorns, of which it has already far too many." Having said this, I left him to his stupid experiment, and feasted myself on grapes as luscious and sweet as those of Eschol.

Beloved by a Nation.

John of Cronstadt, the Devout Russian Ecclesiastic whom the Late Czar Honored—His Life—Work for Christ.

DURING the last weeks of the life of Emperor Alexander III. of Russia, there appeared in the cable dispatches occasional references to the fact that the dying Czar had expressed a desire to have by his bedside John of Cronstadt, a famous ecclesiastic of the Orthodox Russian Church, that he might receive through him such spiritual consolations as he craved. These dispatches, however, in their meagre reference to the ecclesiast, gave him the aspect and character of a fanatical, wonder-working priest, shaggy, uncouth, and an object equally of awe and mystery to the superstitious Russian people. Nothing could be further from the truth, for John of Cronstadt, who was brought down by special express train to pray at the bedside of the dying Emperor, is one of the gentlest and simplest, yet most refined and spiritually-minded servants of Christ to be found in Europe to-day.

From a sketch by a well-informed biographer, we learn that Ivan (John) Ilyitch Sergieff was the son of poor parents, his father being sexton of a little Orthodox Russian Church at Sursk, in the Archangel district. It should be here explained that the Russian Church is a Christian institution, and was dissociated from the Roman Church many centuries ago, although it still holds many things in common with Rome—as do other Christian Churches, including the Greek Church and the Old Catholics—but rejecting the Vatican decrees and Papal infallibility. Ivan was educated in the Theological Seminary at Archangel, and even as a youth, developed a spiritual nature of remarkable depth, often passing whole nights upon his knees. There was a point at which came a spiritual awakening that illumined his whole life, and this awakening came as a direct answer to earnest and persistent prayer. From this point Ivan really began his career, and it was the basis upon which he founded the creed of prayer that has made his life an example and a spiritual force in Russia.

Ivan's early dream was of a monastic life, and he afterward inclined to devote himself to missionary work in Asia; but a period of work in the Russian capital, among the very poor and ignorant, revealed to his spiritual nature the field for a nobler mission work nearer at hand, and he decided to take up his post at Cronstadt. "It is recalled that his first sermon was on 'Christian love,'" writes his biographer, "and the burden of his discourse was that love and prayer together conquer all things. This has been the one insistent theme of his whole ministry. He has given it practical form in the large colony of shelters, casual wards, hospitals, etc., which he founded in and about Cronstadt, and in the devotion with which he personally superintends the application of the vast sums now sent him annually by charitable people."

Before many years passed, the fame of the new spiritual teacher spread throughout the empire. Many very remarkable instances of answers to prayer are related in connection with his work and it is unquestioned that numerous sinners, including criminals, drunkards and immoral persons, have under his exhortations been divinely led to better lives. A portrait of this devoted worker for Christ appears on this page.

WORSHIPPING THE RIVER GANGES.

with, bedaubing himself with the ashes of the dead, I thought the last thing on earth I would want to become would be a Hindoo. I expressed to a missionary who overheard the conversation between the Fakir and myself my amazement at some of the doctrines the Fakir announced. The missionary said: "The Fakirs are very accommodating, and supposing you to be a friend of Christianity, he announced the unity of one God, and that of rewards and punishments."

There are, however, alleviations for Benares. I attended worship in one of the Christian missions. The sermon, though delivered in Hindoostanee, of which I could not understand a word, thrilled me with its earnestness and tenderness of tone, especially when the missionary told me at the close of the service that he recently baptized a man who was converted through reading one of my sermons among the hills of India. I listened to the two Christian assemblages I visited in this city, although the tunes were new, and the sentiments not unusual, were uplifting and inspiring to the last degree.

There was also a school of 600 native girls, an institution established by a Rajah of generosity and wealth, a graduate of Madras University. But more than all, the missionaries are busy, some of them preaching on the ghats, some of them in churches, in chapels, and bazaars. The London Missionary Society has here its college for young men, and its schools for children, and its houses of worship for all. The Church Missionary Society has its eight schools, all filled with learners. The evangelizing work of the Wesleyans and the Baptists are felt in all parts of Benares. In

A NEW YEAR.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 30.* II. Cor. 5: 14-19.
Golden Text Rev. 21: 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"HAPPY new year," is the universal complimentary wish of man to man, as 1894 fades away, to return no more except in judgment to the wicked, but in quite another way to those who "die in the Lord," for their works do follow them." But the wish is a powerless and useless thing; it arises from mere sentiment; and no breath of eternity, no element of power, is in it. The wish can create nothing, maintain nothing, avert nothing: it is something merely between finite man and finite man. But it touches a reality. There is such a thing as a new year. There is a power which can produce it, maintain it, and avert all which can hinder it: but this is a creative power, Jehovah has the monopoly of it: "Behold

I Make all Things New."

As the wish sounds in our ears from one and another, does it mean anything to us? If the old year had fulfilled all our expectations, and, far more, the expectations of our God, why wish that the next should be a new one? That which is absolutely perfect cannot be improved: Is not the very wish for a new year, in itself, an admission that the old year was not all that we expected, hoped, and even purposed? Is it to us something more than a wish that 1895 shall be a new year? While those who live in hopes and wishes, desires and sentiments, intentions and resolutions, a life of unrealities, are expressing and forgetting their new year's wishes—are there those amongst us who are waiting before our God that he may go with us into the past year? Are we waiting that he should show us in his light, all its blemishes, its lost opportunities, its many failures, and the causes of them all, so that we may begin the New Year in a far more utter dependence upon him than ever before, a more real confidence in, and therefore obedience to him than previously, so that he may be able to carry on his holy workmanship in us, and make all things new in our lives?

Let us go back to the foundation. A New Year can only be new as the main-spring of every motive is new. The apostle Paul says, "If any man is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old things have passed away; behold, they are become new." But this most startling declaration is based on that which precedes it in the same chapter, without which no man can be in Christ, no man can be a new creation, and therefore no man can have a really new year. "The love of Christ constraineth us because we thus judge, that if one died for all, than all died." On his side he identified himself with every sinner; he became, in the sight of the holy law of God, the Man, in whom all sin was centred and could be dealt with. "He hath for us" or (R. V.): "Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf." "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us;" the heading up, the concentration, so to speak, of all the curse which sin merited, was on our beloved Lord when "he died for all." But in thus identifying himself with us, he made it incumbent upon us to identify ourselves with him. It he "died for all, therefore all died," and died in his death, were crucified with him, under the same condemnation, the same curse.

Made Him to be Sin

But he died for all with the purpose "that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again." Just as really as he took our place, our condemnation, just as really as he was made sin for us and made a curse for us, so really is it incumbent upon us, by his dying for us, that we should identify ourselves with him. He became a new creation—God manifest in the flesh—when he took upon him the likeness of sinful flesh, that we might become a new creation in living no longer unto ourselves, but unto him. Sin and curse were strangers to him. He bore them for love of us, and the life of suffering and temptation and shame was new to him. As he was indeed a new creation for our sake, so really he calls us to be in him, a new creation for his sake, by first taking our place as one with him in his death, his humiliation and shame, that it may be possible for us to be one with him in the glory of a life which lives, not unto itself, but unto him which died for us, and rose again. Unselfishness is as foreign to our human nature as sin and curse were foreign to his divine nature. We can only have a New Year which is really new as we enter fully into identification with our Lord. Efforts, resolutions, plans, imitation self-discipline can never make us new. "Behold, I,"—I only—"make all things new."

"Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh." How has it been in the past year? How have we known those around us? Has it been after the things in which we were pleased or displeased, honored or despised, appreciated or neglected,—or was it only as God and his cause were affected by them?

But if we mean it when we do not only wish, but pray and wait for a new year, a year of knowing no man after the flesh, not even Christ himself, a year of making him the Centre and Circumference of all to us, the Alpha and Omega of our lives, then the Almighty of the blessed Trinity is on our side to make us new. It was from the Cross that the words came which spoke our pardon: "It is finished," and self and sin, and death received a deathblow outside of us; it is from the throne that the power of renewal comes.

He that Sat upon the Throne, said: "Behold I make all things new." Christ was "crucified through weakness, but he liveth through the power of God" and that might of his power, which raised Christ from the dead, worketh in us (Eph. 1: 10, 20) to deliver us from self-life, and to create us anew in Christ Jesus. And his power is working, whether we respond to it or not, but it may work in others and pass us by; we, personally, can be transformed only as we do respond to him, and decide once for all, by deliberate and continuous yielding to him in all circumstances, to "live not unto ourselves, but unto him which died for us and rose again."

"To serve the living and the true God, and to look for his Son from heaven" (1. Thes. 1: 9, 10), is the divine order of things among workers, who are ensamples of them which believe (verse 7). A worker, whose equilibrium is disturbed by the disarrangement of his plans, knows Christ after the flesh, he is the head of his own work, he is somebody in his own eyes, his self-importance has not died at the feet of the Crucified. He would be equally disturbed and put out of his way, if the Son of man were to come at such an hour as he thinks not. Oh, that such an one would deal closely with God for a new year, that he may be "renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. A worker who looks with a jealous eye upon a fellow-worker, and envies him the results which God gives him, or the popularity which God permits him, one who judges his fellow-worker by himself, in all on the old lines, he knows Christ and his fellow-workers after the flesh, and he needs indeed that 1895 should be a new year to him, that he may become a new creation, that then old things may pass away and all things become new.

But there are in all parts of the vineyard of the Lord those who are really looking for him; the Daystar has arisen in their hearts (II. Peter 1: 19); with such the first thought in connection with a new year is: "Will he come first?" The second: "If not, will he come during the coming year?" This expectation more than anything else, leads to a life and work which is "not after the flesh" not after human ideas, or according to human plans, which does not depend on any advantages of talent or education, but on the will and power of God, as made known in his Word and by his Spirit, whether understood by man or not. To such the new year does not mean new principles of action, a new starting point and centre of life, but new knowledge of God in his Word, new entering into his purposes, new light on the coming of the Son of Man, new purification in the light of his coming. What may this new year bring forth? For those of us who are looking for him, one thing is absolutely sure: "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed." And according to another Scripture, first meant for the Jew, and then for us; "our redemption draweth nigh."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

LEVEN lessons from the life of our Lord fall within the range of review this week. Teachers will be wise in devoting the session to a survey of the entire group, instead of taking some other lesson. A child will be much more likely to remember the lessons if they are set before him in their natural place and their proper chronological order in the life of Christ, than if they were left as mere isolated incidents. The incidents on which the lessons were based occurred during the second year of our Lord's ministry. The first year, beginning with his baptism and temptation, was spent chiefly in Judea. It had proved that the people of Southern Palestine, especially the people of the metropolis, were not prepared to receive him. They were intensely conservative, and their leaders were interested in maintaining the existing order. Corruption was extensive, and there was very little vital religion. But, as is usual in such circumstances, they were very punctilious about observances and rites and ceremonies. John the Baptist's preaching had stirred the stagnant waters, but having been baptized by him, they were content. The radical change of life and character, the laying of "the axe to the root of the tree," which Jesus demanded, was more than they could bear. Had Jesus remained there, his ministry would probably have been much shorter than it was. He left them and journeyed northward to Galilee, a district about the size of the State of Delaware, with rather less than three million inhabitants. The people there were less cultured, but were a simple, honest class, less exclusive and less prejudiced. They came more in contact with foreigners than the people of the south, as the country lay on the highway of travel and commerce. It is with Christ's arrival there that Matthew, Mark, and Luke begin their story of his public work. It is from John that we hear of his earlier work in Jerusalem. A careful calculation from the meagre material afforded, results in the opinion that Jesus began his preaching about April of the year 28, and that he remained in Galilee, with one brief hurried trip to Jerusalem, until the end of March in the following year. It is with this year's work that the lessons of the past quarter are concerned. The chief events were the calling of the Disciples and their commission to preach, the Sermon on the Mount, many miracles, of which thirteen are described, and the beginning of his new system of teaching by parable. Three, if not four, tours Jesus made through the country, returning to Capernaum between them for rest and recuperation. That he was disappointed with the results of his work is obvious from several remarks he let fall. The people treated him as a mere miracle-worker, and failed to apprehend the meaning of his teaching. He was, besides, harassed continually by the captious criticisms and frivolous questionings of men from Jerusalem who were the agents of the priests and were trying to entrap him into some expression for which they could prosecute him. He lingered in Galilee six months longer and then left it forever.

He passing through the midst of them, went his way. (Luke 4: 30). With that merciful crowd of the people of Nazareth and him hurrying him to the brow of the precipice to cast him down, Jesus was very near death. But God delivered him as he has done many of Christ's followers in moments of danger. Dr. Paton says: "One day, while toiling away at my house in a small island, the war chief and his brother, and a large party of armed men, surrounded the plot where I was working. They all had muskets besides their own revolvers and weapons. They watched me for some time in silence, and then every man levelled a musket at my head. Escape was impossible. Speech would only have increased danger. My eyesight came and went in a few minutes. I prayed to my Lord, 'Either himself to protect me, or to take me home to his glory.' I tried to keep working on at my task as if no one was near me. Retiring a little from their first position, word having been spoken, they took the same attitude farther off, and seemed to be urging one another to fire the first shot. But my dear Lord restrained them more, and they withdrew, leaving me with a new reason for trusting him with all that concerned me for time and eternity."

He took her by the hand . . . and immediately the fever left her. The Divine power was sufficient. During the war a nurse received a dispatch that her son was severely wounded. She immediately went to the front and found the hospital which he had been carried. She begged that she might be permitted to nurse him. The surgeon objected, but finally yielded her importunity. "He will not know you," he said, "he has been delirious all day." The mother went to the cot and looked at the boy tossing in delirious fever and kept in bed by the strength of the nurse. She laid her hand tenderly on his forehead, and instantly he became calm and sank into a doze. She bathed his face gently and smoothed his pillow, and when he awoke, restless she laid her hand again on his forehead. Without opening his eyes, he said in his natural voice so different from his former raving tone, "O, mother, have you come?" and from that hour he began to mend. The touch of love had saved him.

When Jesus saw their faith. (Mark 5.) It was the condition Christ require for healing. All spiritual blessings come through faith. It is the connection between earth and heaven which raises men heavenward. Some years ago, two men, a bargeman and a collier, were in a boat and found themselves unable to manage it. It was overturned and they were carried swiftly down the current toward the abyss. The boat dashed to pieces. At last, however, the man was saved by floating a rope to him, which he grasped. The same instant that the rope came into his hand, the boat floated by the other man. The thoughtless and confused bargeman, instead of saving the rope, laid hold on the log. It was a fatal mistake, they were both in imminent peril, but the one was drawn to shore because he had a connection with the people on the land, whilst the other, clinging to the loose, floating log, was borne irresistibly along, and never heard of afterwards.

Blessed are ye when men . . . shall reproach you. (Luke 6: 22.) To be silent and patient under undeserved abuse shows a mind of unusual strength. Socrates, when assailed by a blatant enemy with a torrent of opprobrious epithets merely responded in a pitying voice, "Poor fellow, he has not been taught to speak respectfully." He used to say that the abuse of Xantippe's wife, affected him no more than the use of the carriages on the street. Mr. Kim, a venerable minister, was attacked in a meeting by a member of his church who not only denounced him but, when in prayer-meeting he was leading in prayer, used insulting language about him and prayed for his conversion. Kilpin's folly consoled with him, afterward, but Kim was quite untroubled. "On my own account," he said, "I care nothing. His abuse does not hurt me, for my conscience does not accuse me of wrong-doing and as for his prayers, they go no higher than the ceiling." M'Cheyne used to say it was weak to be distressed and resentful after persecution. "When," said he, "a blind man jostles you in the street, you are not angry at him. You say, 'He is blind, poor fellow, or he would not have hurt me.' So you may say of your persecutors, in pity and without anger, 'They are blind.'"

STARVING IN TWO STATES.

Letters that Disclose a Terrible Condition of Affairs in Nebraska and Kansas—Thousands Suffering for lack of Clothing, Food and Fuel—Relief Urgently Needed—Appeals to "The Christian Herald" that must claim Sympathy from all Readers.

DURING the past week, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received, in response to its inquiries, an avalanche of letters, describing the frightful suffering and destitution in Kansas and Nebraska, that has made us still with astonishment.

These letters, written by pastors of every Christian denomination, by postmasters, by officials of large acquaintance, by business men and by honest farmers and farmwives, furnish conclusive evidence of the fact that almost the entire population, in a large portion of the agricultural districts of Kansas and Nebraska, are experiencing the horrors of famine in a Christian land—Thousands—and it may not be an exaggeration to say tens of thousands—owing to the failure of crops for two years in succession, find themselves at the beginning of winter with bare larders, empty barns, cold houses, and a lack of garments that suggest freezing as an alternative of starving to death.

A Cry for Help.

From these darkened homes of the West, from one of our fairest states in prosperous days, but now, alas, blighted by drought and disaster, comes the cry for help to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Shall it pass unheard! Or will not the same Christian generosity that has prompted our friends throughout the Union to noble deeds of rescue and relief "In His Name" in the past, carry them to reach out the succoring hand to our brothers and sisters in Kansas and Nebraska now? We believe it will, and we are content to leave it in their hands, with the prayer that their hearts may be filled with zeal for the service of that Master whom the poor were never forgotten.

Money Sent for Urgent Cases.

In answer to our call, nearly one hundred responsible persons have already consented to act as distributors of any contributions that may be forwarded. Some of the cases of suffering presented are of so urgent a nature that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as a measure of temporary relief, has appropriated and forwarded to the thirty distributors named below, $150, to be applied where most needed:

- 1. D. D. Dodge, Alma, Kan. $5
- 2. Lizzie M. Corke, Winona, Logan Co., Kan. $5
- 3. O. A. Buzzell, Juniata, Neb. $5
- 4. Dewey, Oakdale, Neb. $5
- 5. E. Gilbert, Macon, Kan. $5
- 6. George Rogers, Imperial, Neb. $5
- 7. O. J. Siegert, Logan, Kan. $5
- 8. Minnie Matthews, Stockton, Rooker Co., Kan. $5
- 9. McCracken, Hoxie, Kan. $5
- 10. H. H. Gane, Wilson, Kan. $5
- 11. V. Scott, Imperial, Neb. $5
- 12. John McKnight, Culberson, Neb. $5
- 13. J. Wagner, Eustes, Frontier Co., Neb. $5

- 28. S. H. Day, Pearl, Neb. $5
- 29. Hughes, Cozad, Neb. $5
- 30. Mary C. Taylor, Bird City, Kan. $5

Every contribution sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the relief of the Kansas and Nebraska sufferers will be duly acknowledged in these columns, and all moneys so received will be promptly applied, through trustworthy distributors, to the greatest advantage.

Letters that Tell the Story.

Far more eloquently than others could we tell the story of starvation and misery. We give a few extracts below:

Rev. C. H. Bromillette, Oxford, Nebraska, writes: "Anything in the line of clothing or any other assistance would be thankfully received and appreciated. Such destitution as already exists here, and which will be greatly increased before spring, is almost impossible to describe. I do not know how from one-fourth to one-half of the farmers in this locality will be able to farm next year. We must have aid from abroad where there will be untold suffering, if not actual starvation in many a case."

Rev. H. K. Bushnell, Hastings, Neb., writes: "I travel all over the southwest portion of Nebraska, and have distributed a great deal of clothing, and am willing to do more of it. There is widespread destitution and children are staying home from Sunday School and day school, too, for the lack of clothing. In many places crops have been a failure for two years."

"I have been gathering and giving to those in this vicinity," writes Mrs. Sophia A. Hutchinson, of Mascot, Harlan Co., Neb., "but there is such general destitution that it is only a drop in the bucket, so far. Such things as you can send will bring blessing to many a down-hearted one."

Face to Face with Starvation.

S. A. Underhill, Cornell, Neb., writes: "The condition of the people in general is pitiable in the extreme, on account of the prolonged drought. There is no work which they can get, by reason of the hard times. The merchants have refused credit on account of their having no prospect of raising the money to repay them. Starvation is staring them in the face."

"There have been no crops of any kind raised here in two years," writes A. W. Copehart,

A TYPICAL SOD DWELLING ON THE BLEAK NEBRASKA PRAIRIES.

From a photograph of a group of Farmers and their Children, furnished by Missionary Geo. R. G. Fisher, Am. S. S. Union.

Logan, Kan. "Many families are in destitute circumstances and the winter coming on will cause the most intense suffering, because the poorer class of people are very poorly clad and have no means to secure clothes. About nine out of every ten families are compelled to burn cow manure for fuel, they having no other, and it is only a choice between burning it or freezing to death. Clothing, fuel, flour, etc., are what are most needed."

"Many families are unable to go to Sunday School or divine service on account of not having clothing," writes Miss Pearl McCracken, of Hoxie, Kan. "It is a question with many where the next sack of flour is coming from."

Still Trusting in God.

Mrs. S. J. MacFarlane, Norton, Kan., writes: "We have had an entire failure here this year, and almost last year; all the difference being that last year, we had a little rough feed for stock, and this year nearly everyone, except the well-to-do, has had to dispose of their stock at almost nothing."

"Good work-horses have been selling for ten and twelve dollars. Many who planted the second time this year in hopes of getting something, lost all their seed time and labor. Were it not that we believe a merciful God overrules all things for our good, we would have despaired long ago. I think of the many who have been blessed with an abundance and who, I believe, would be happy in lending a helping hand at this time of need."

"The needy ones are plenty all around us," writes a lady from Meadow Grove, Neb. "If they do not get help, it is starve or steal, unless they throw themselves on the County. May God bless all who help them now!"

Postmaster L. Beardslee, Trenton, Hitchcock Co., Neb., writes: "The people out here are very badly in need. We have had scarcely any crops for two years in Western Nebraska."

Relief must come Soon.

Rev. J. S. McPherson, M. E. Church, Alston, Neb., writing from wide personal observation of the suffering in his district, says: "The country surrounding (Hiawatha, Wauneta and Alston), has many destitute people and relief cannot come too soon."

"If you have any underclothing, flannel or woollen, or stockings, dresses, cloaks, hoods, skirts, shawls, mitts or anything in wearing apparel, it would be very thankfully received," is the plain language of Mrs. Lizzie M. Corke, Winona, Kan. "There are a great many destitute families around here, who have had no crops for two seasons, and the suffering, especially among the women and children, is great."

A Sympathetic Neighbor.

Writing from Ord, Valley Co., Neb., Mrs. J. B. Miller says: "Not even corn stalks nor hay to burn, and with winter coming on, what will they do? The outlook is so desolate it seems to bewilder them. My husband has a severe climate. Many whom I know must be helped, or starve and freeze."

Texas Afflicted Also.

Mrs. L. C. Boyce, Beeville, Tex., is in a district of great destitution. She writes: "We do not need any very heavy clothing, and everything in that line you may send to Nebraska and Kansas. Some bolts of bleached and unbleached domestic calico, cotton checks, gingham or cheap worsteds, cotton hose and good plain shoes are what are needed most."

Rev. J. B. Currens, a Sunday School missionary with an intimate knowledge of the field, writes as follows from Omaha, Neb.: "The people in the north and west of Nebraska are of that class whose poverty and destitution make a loud call to their more fortunate brethren in the East. These sections of the State are threatened with a genuine famine. The drought has been the most severe and widespread ever known. Hundreds of families have been driven from the State to procure subsistence, while others too poor to move have had to remain here and will suffer great want this winter, if they are not helped. These are not tramps, unworthy of our help, but honest, hard-working farmers struggling to make homes for their families. They have not come to want by extravagance or dissipation, but by the Providence of God—the frequent loss of crops by repeated droughts—many of these are excellent Christian people connected with our churches and Sunday Schools, and are in every way worthy of the sympathy and help of their more prosperous brethren. They need provisions and clothing."

Stale Crusts a Luxury!

E. A. Gilbert, writing from Macon, Wallace Co., Kan., gives this truly startling description of the condition of the destitute there: "At one time we had nothing in the house to eat! My daughter Rose came across an old flour sack, containing some stale bread and crusts, which had been in the house eighteen months, hard and dry as a bone. By pounding with a hammer and soaking in warm water, we were able to eat them, while son was away in search of work. We have lived the past year almost exclusively on bread, and flour-and-water gravy. Milk and butter, meat and potatoes, are luxuries, the taste of which we have nearly forgotten. There are many in this vicinity nearly as destitute as we are. I would gladly exchange rations with the inmates of our state prisons. Food and fuel, are what we are the most in need of. We can burrow in the ground to hide our nudity and keep from freezing, but it will not satisfy hunger."

band was around some yesterday, and it made him heart-sick. We were glad to read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last night, that perhaps the generous readers of your good paper would be willing to help the sufferers out here."

Mr. J. S. Dewey, a merchant of Oakdale, Neb., writes: "On account of the excessive drought, there was not raised here this season on an average of one bushel to the acre of small grain, corn or potatoes, and not one ton in fifty of the usual amount of hay."

"There is very much destitution and will be more as the winter proceeds. There is no work for the laboring classes and a large number of farmers have no money to buy food, clothing, fuel, groceries, etc. Eatables and fuel are most needed."

How the Children Suffer.

Mrs. Peter Burmood, Wood River, Neb., in her letter touchingly says: "If we could get old clothes that we could make over for little folks, it would be received as coming from God. Oh, to think of the little children that must suffer!"

Dora Seick, Huntley, Neb., writes: "The 'half has not been told.' We in this country did not raise anything either in field or garden, not even feed for cattle. No hay or corn stalks. All the horses and cattle that could be shipped out have been sent out. The needs of the people are very great."

Mrs. Wm. Heath, Johnstown, Neb., gives this realistic picture of the suffering in her district: "There is great need of clothing or food, or money to buy them. It is heart-rending to see the condition that many of my acquaintances are in to begin winter in

THE LESSON OF CHRISTMAS.

TWO plain people centuries ago hoteled in a village barn after a walk of eighty miles, too long a trudge for one in poor health. No lords of state awaiting in antechamber as when other kings are born. No messengers mounted at the doorway ready to herald the advent from city to city. No medical skill in attendance. No satin-lined cradle to receive the infantile guest. But a monarch born in the hostelry called the house of Chim Ham; the night with diamonded finger pointing down to the place; the door of heaven set wide open to look out; from orchestral batons of light dripping the oratorios of the Messiah; on lowest doorstep of heaven the minstrels of God discoursing of glory and good-will.

Soon after the white-bearded astrologists kneel and from leathern pouch chink the shekels and from open sacks exhale the frankincense and rustle out the bundles of myrrh. The loosened star; the escaped doxology of celestials; the chill December night aflush with May morn; our world a lost star, and another star rushing down the sky that night to beckon the wanderer home again, shall yet make all nations keep Christmas.

Not a black cloud of threat, but a gleaming star of hope is our glorious Christianity. One glimpse of that stellar appearance kindled up the soul of the sick and dying college student until the words flashed from his pale fingers and the star seemed to pour its light from his white lips, as Kirk White wrote these immortal words:

When marshalled on the nightly plain
The glittering hosts bestud the sky,
One star alone o' all the train
Can fix the sinner's wandering eye.
Hark, hark to God, the chorus breaks,
From every host, from every gem,
But one alone, the Saviour speaks,
It is the star of Bethlehem.

We have two censers to-day, of Christmas frankincense. Here is the one censor of earthly frankincense. On that we put our thanks for the mercies of the past year, the mercies of all our past lives, individual mercies, family mercies, social mercies, national mercies, and our hearts burning with gratitude, send aloft the incense of praise toward the throne of Christ. Bring on more incense, and higher and higher let the columns of praise ascend. Let them wreath all these pillars and hover amid all these arches and then soar to the throne.

But here is the other censor of heavenly thanksgiving and worship. Let them bring all their frankincense—the cherubim bring theirs and the seraphim theirs and the one hundred and forty and four thousand theirs, and all the eternities theirs, and let them smoke with perfume on this heavenly censor until the cloud canopies the throne of God. Then I take these two censers—the censor of earthly frankincense and the censer of heavenly frankincense—and I swing them before the throne and then I clash them together in one great Hallelujah unto Him to whom the wise men of the East brought the gold, and the myrrh and the frankincense when “the star which they saw in the East went before them.”

THE WORLD'S NEED.

NOTHING is more certain than that Jehovah reigns among the nations.

He can govern an empire as easily as he can govern an individual. It may be the Divine purpose to let the nations put their particular forms of government to full experiment, and then, when they have all failed in their experiment, that Christ in person will descend to rule the nations. It would not take him long to set up a perfect government, one suited to all lands and all people. In some morning or evening cloud he may descend. If so, blessed is that land which shall first greet him, and blessed that place where shall be set up the throne of his dominion. As he honored the Eastern hemisphere with his first coming, nineteen centuries ago, I wish that he might honor the Western hemisphere with his latter day coming. I do expect the Lord will come by the power of the Holy Ghost to transform, emancipate and save all nations. Our world needs a radical fixing up.

What a hard time it has had with earthquake and storm and conflagration and pestilence and war and iniquity of all sorts. It has suffered 6000 years of bombardment. The number of those who tried to make it worse has been larger than the number of those who tried to make it better, but the tides of better influence are coming in, the physical and moral disorders of the world are giving way, the men and women now coming on to take possession of the world are healthier as to their bodies and more ingenious as to their minds and mightier as to their souls. The twentieth century will be as far ahead of the nineteenth as the nineteenth is superior to the eighteenth. The universities yet to be builded will be as far ahead of our present colleges as our colleges are ahead of our common schools. Our professions will have more skillful physicians, more recondite lawyers, abler editors, and more consecrated ministers. The machinery for improving the world's brain and strengthening the world's muscles and developing the world's heart is only now being put into motion. The greatest pictures are yet to be painted, the greatest inventions yet to be wrought out, the greatest sermons yet to be preached, the greatest oratorios yet to be composed, and the greatest strides forward yet to be taken. God did not build this world for a failure. From its capacity for improvement I conclude that it was constructed for some higher mission than it has yet executed. The sea must surrender till it has yielded its last pearl. The mines must surrender till they have given up their last flash of gold. The air must surrender till it has given over for use its last secret of illumination. The human race must advance until there are no higher reaches of attainment. “After us the deluge,” was the boast of an oppressor. “After us the redemption of all nations,” be the motto of all Christian workers. And when the work is all done, as it will be, surely as God is strong enough to fulfil his promise, may it be found out that we have done something toward the consummation, if it be no more than to have spoken a cheering word to the disconsolate, or given a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple, or commended some sinful soul to the Christ who came to save sinners, even the chief.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS.

By a Wife, F. A., Philadelphia. That she and her husband may have their burdens lightened, and may have increase of faith to enable them to bear them.

By a Sister, H. G. B.—For a brother now advanced in years and unconverted; also for a truly nearly eighty years old, who seems weary out of the way of salvation; and for a family of four—father, mother, and two daughters—all unconverted.

By a Friend, C. B.—For one who is a slave of his temper, and who has alienated some of his dearest friends by his quarrelsome nature; that he may be converted and made a blessing to others.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

SUCH a deluge of letters has poured in to THE MAIL-BAG from the drought-stricken districts in Nebraska and Kansas, that we have deemed it necessary to lay the whole story of suffering and privation in those States before our readers, in another part of this issue. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will receive and acknowledge all moneys contributed for relief work in those States, and we have already forwarded a small amount to each of the thirty districts where the suffering seems to be most severe. All gifts of clothing and other supplies should be sent direct to the distributors whose names are given. Our friends should not hesitate to let their hearts and hands act in sympathy at this golden Christmas-time. Such widespread suffering in our own land should call forth the warmest cooperation of all who love Christ and humanity.

Mrs. S. E. J., Rome, N. Y. Is it a wife's duty to work and be the main support of the family, or for the husband to try to secure work as long as possible or to sit around four or five months in the year and read?

See 1. Tim. 5: 8.

Bella Cooke writes: “I would, thank through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, those kind people who have helped me by their prayers and means, and I ask of him who is the giver of every good and perfect gift to bless and reward them.”

Mrs. Lozar, Humansville, Mo. If the people before Christ were saved by faith, what necessity was there for his death?

The sacrifices and ordinances of the Mosaic dispensation were types of the coming deliverer. Even before there was some revelation of a Saviour. Jesus said that Abraham rejoiced to see his day. (John 8: 56.) The death of Christ was consequently justification of their faith, and had he not died their faith would have been vain.

M. Luscombe, Rockton, N. Y. Was John the Baptist converted? Jesus speaks of him (Luke 7: 28) as if he were not in the kingdom of God?

John was not in the kingdom of God which Jesus came to set up because his work was before Jesus, in point of time. He belonged to the old dispensation, or rather, was the link between it and the new. As a servant of God specially prepared and commissioned, as Moses, Isaiah, and others were, he would not be a subject for conversion as we understand the word.

Mary Carter, Pittsburgh, Pa. When were pews first used in churches?

In the early days, according to English records, it was customary for worshippers to bring their own stools or benches. Up to the year 1300 the people are represented as either sitting on the ground or floor in church, or standing. It was not until the latter part of the fourteenth century that wooden seats, or “forms,” were introduced. The first regular pews appeared about half a century later, and the first gallery in England about the year 1600.

Rev. C. L. Hewitt, Moorhead, Minn. I never believed, nor do I now, that wine formed any part of the celebration of the Passover, as stated by you in answer to “Constant Reader,” in your issue of Nov. 28. Nowhere in the Old Testament is the use of wine at the Passover mentioned. Are you not wrong?

If you are acquainted with an orthodox Jewish Rabbi and will ask him to read to you in the Mishna (Pesach 10: 1), the instructions for the keeping of the Passover, you will find that four cups of wine are to be used at stated intervals of the feast. Nothing is said of using wine at the Passover in the Old Testament, but as you will see in Matthew 15: 1-9, the Jews of our Lord's day were guided in many observances by traditions and man-made ordinances more than by Scripture.

“Truth-seeker,” Paducah, Ky. 1. Ought a Christian to vote at elections? 2. Is a follower of Christ under human law? 3. Should the hand of fellowship be withdrawn from a brother who is a moderate drinker?

1. Yes, he should perform all his duties as a citizen. If Christian people exerted their influence more than they do, our offices might be filled by a better class of men. The party conventions would not dare nominate a notoriously wicked man for office if they knew that every Christian man would register and vote against him. 2. Yes. (see 1. Peter 2: 13.) 3. No, it would be better to expostulate with him and try to persuade him to deny himself for the sake of others. To withdraw the hand of fellowship, that is practically to excommunicate, is an extreme penalty reserved for persistent wrongdoers.

“Unfaithful Christian.” For the past few years I have been a so-called Christian. I have no real feeling and I seem to be simply drifting, drifting with the tide. Oh I want to awake and have that peace “which passeth all understanding!” What shall I do to obtain it and rouse my sleeping soul?

This condition of spiritual lethargy is one in which many find themselves. The only remedy is persistent, believing prayer (James 1: 6) for increased faith and spiritual zeal (Luke 11: 9 and 13), and activity in Christian work. The active worker is never jaded nor lukewarm. Love for Christ grows with service, and in being helpful to others we find the best alleviation for our own spiritual troubles. Many Christians brood over their own condition and shortcomings who, by throwing themselves into real, unselfish service, would be made the happiest men and women in the world (see James 1: 27 and James 2: 20 and 26). Opportunity for such service lie all around us, and the life of the Christian with a happiness they cannot give.

B. V. O. Spring Lake, N. Y. What is meant in 1. Th. 8: 14 by both houses of Israel?

Until the death of Solomon the twelve tribes formed one kingdom, but on the accession of his son, Rehoboam, ten tribes revolted and formed the northern kingdom under Jeroboam and were called Israel, while the southern kingdom was known as Judah (see 1. Kings 12).

D. W. Snow, New Bedford, Mass. Why do we send money to the Turkish Fund, which is to-day killing and persecuting Christian Christians. It is terrible to think of massacres of our brethren in Christ, and must know that it is so bad that England has interfered. Why do you help them?

As there are many Christians among the sufferers, we continue the appeals, sending the money for distribution through the American Minister in Constantinople. Besides, it tells us to bless them that curse you, a good to them that despitefully use you.

A. W. B., Charles City, Ia. 1. Am I justified in refusing to lead able-bodied tramps, when hard for my own support and for that of dependent on me? 2. Is it imperative that band and wife belong to one Church? 3. We right for a man belonging to one denomination to marry a lady belonging to another, love each other?

1. You have a perfect right to discriminate in the objects of your charity. If, as you imply, you have little money to devote to the purpose, you act wisely in giving it to those who, through sickness or misfortune, are unable to work. We would not, however, advise you to invariably refuse a man because of his being “able-bodied” have so mismanaged our social condition an “able-bodied man cannot be sure of employment, however anxious he may be to obtain it. Many a deserving man is hungry to-day has done his utmost to get work; and it is a real charity to give him a meal. 2. There is no doubt that the prospects of happiness are greater where the husband and wife belong to the same church. In the case of different circumstances might arise in which a serious disagreement might come from religious difference. It seems to us, however, that there is no difference of doctrine between churches, one of the parties might, before marriage, magnanimously yield and join the church to which the other belongs. In this particular case, the lady would suffer more and make a greater sacrifice in yielding, than her husband would, because to her the difference is more important than it is to him. If, therefore, he cannot bring her to his way of thinking, he would without wrong join her church. He would there as many opportunities of working for Christ as in his own.

who were ruined by his recklessness, no one believes. He was confident of ultimate success and acted on the false principle that "the end justifies the means." Many act on that principle in business and private life, unaware how dangerous it is and how severely God condemns it. (Rom. 3:8.)

Darkness Caused by a Rat.

One whole section of the city of Baltimore, Md., was thrown into darkness on Nov. 29, by the misadventure of a rat. The employees at the Brush Electric Light Works was startled about midnight by a sudden disturbance and the outbreak of flames on the switchboard. In a few moments all the connecting wires were melted and the switchboard was a wreck. Every light in that part of the city went out and darkness reigned there for the remainder of the night. The cause was soon discovered. A rat covered with water had crawled from a COUNT FERDINAND DE LESSEPS, CONSTRUCTOR OF SUEZ CANAL.

the extremes of disappointment, mortification and success. He was eighty-nine years old and to the last exercised on all with whom he came in contact the fascination which had enabled him to win his triumphs. He commenced his career as a diplomatist, in which profession his father had distinguished himself. The young man was attached to the French Embassy first at Lisbon and afterward at Tunis. Thence he was transferred to Egypt, where he served his country for seven years. There he made the friendship of Mohammed Said, who subsequently became Viceroy of Egypt. During his stay he studied the project of cutting the Isthmus of Suez. The imagination of De Lesseps was fired by this hope. The idea remained with him after he was transferred to the courts of other lands and when the government sent him into retirement, it was this Suez Canal scheme which occupied his thoughts. He perceived that so long as English guns commanded the straits of Gibraltar, the Mediterranean was as much under the control of England as one of her own lakes. The man who could make another outlet to the sea, would render an inestimable service to France and all Southern Europe. De Lesseps determined to be that man. He worked day and night over the scheme, and when in 1854, his friend, Mohammed Said became ruler of Egypt, his opportunity came. He promptly set out for Egypt and laid his plans before the new Viceroy. The Viceroy entered heartily into the project, and after innumerable delays and many diplomatic conflicts with England, the canal was constructed and formally opened in November 17, 1869. The cost was ninety-three million dollars, but the shareholders have reaped a rich harvest of dividends on the enormous outlay. Dazzled by the honors showered upon him and the wide fame he had achieved, De Lesseps conceived the project of severing the Isthmus of Panama, and dividing the Americas as he had divided Asia from Africa. He was seventy-four years old when this project was finally started, and much of the management fell into the hands of others, but De Lesseps' was the name that secured the confidence of the public and gave it its financial strength. Sixty million dollars were immediately placed in his hands by confiding investors and one hundred millions were raised in loans in addition. The money came easily and was squandered profusely. De Lesseps was neither an engineer nor a financier. He was a clever diplomatist and was easily persuaded that Panama would be the duplicate of Suez. The money went at first in foolish contracts and afterward in bribes to legislators and journalists, to prevent their exposing the failure. At last the bubble burst. It was discovered that all the money was gone and the canal little more than begun; nearly one half of the total sum contributed to construct the canal had been spent in bribes. The company went into the hands of receivers and some of the most prominent men in France were tried for their part in the swindle. De Lesseps was spared, though his son was put on trial and convicted. The old man was ill physically and mentally, and was suffered to end his days in peace. He survived the collapse about two years and has now passed away in happy ignorance of the extent of the stain on his name. That he intended to swindle out of their little fortunes the thousands of investors pipe into the basement and had jumped from one of the brass terminals to another near to it and for an instant the two terminals were connected by its body. In that moment it received 2,700 volts of electricity through it and the connection caused the burning out of the wires and switchboard. The animal was of course killed instantaneously, but its body remained on the terminals rigid, but life-like, where it was found by the workmen. That a creature so mean and contemptible as a rat should have the power to undo the work of the mighty engines in the Light Works and should be able to plunge the streets and avenues of a great city in darkness is a suggestive fact. It teaches a lesson of circumspection. A light word, a trivial jest uttered in the hearing of a child, or an inquiring soul may turn aside the good and foil an earnest preacher who is laboring to enlighten spiritual darkness. (Eccles. 9:18.)

An Indelible Stain.

An act of malicious mischief has caused a house-owner in New York a great deal of annoyance. He was very proud of his house which is a new one in the upper part of the city. The front is of beautiful marble, exquisitely sculptured. One morning last week, on leaving his home to go to business, he turned as he often did to cast an admiring look on the noble edifice. To his intense horror he saw that during the night some one had splashed it with black to the height of over six feet through the entire length. He set his servants at once to wash off the stains, but they were unable to get them off. He applied to a druggist, who, on examining the marks, said they were made with a mixture of lamp-black and turpentine and were indelible. There was no way to remove them but to cut them out with a chisel. Evidently some one who knew the effect of the mixture had deliberately done the mischief. The opinion proved correct. Lime, acids, turpentine and many other agents have been employed, but the stains remain. The owner is reluctant to spoil the delicate carving by cutting them out but in no other way can they be removed. He is naturally indignant at the wanton outrage, as any one would be. That was the work of an enemy, but how many there are who themselves commit a similar outrage on the house they must inhabit all their lives, the body in which the soul dwells. That may be stained by sin and when it is so defaced, though God may and will forgive, if he is besought to do so through Christ, the marks remain and are often not obliterated even by severe affliction. (Rom. 6:12, 13.)

Must not Deceive.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts rendered a decision a few days ago, which deserves the attention of the young people of that State and of any other in which the courts are liable to take the same view. The question before the court arose out of an action tried some time before for breach of promise of marriage. A lady sued a citizen of Boston, who had been engaged to her, but had refused to fulfil his engagement. She claimed sixty thousand dollars and the jury gave her forty thousand. On the appeal, it was shown that she had been previously married and divorced. She had duly informed her lover of the fact, but had not told him that it was her husband who had secured the divorce and that his plea, on which the divorce was granted, was that she was a woman of violent and ungovernable temper, and of jealous, revengeful and malicious disposition. The court held that in not disclosing the fact to her lover, the lady had suppressed material information and in allowing him to suppose that it was she who had obtained the divorce, had been guilty of fraudulent misrepresentation. A new trial was therefore ordered. Probably the lady was not aware of her legal duty in the matter and she naturally shrank from making the humiliating confession. She may have feared that it would scare the man who wanted to make her his wife. No one need have such fear in entering into union with Christ. He rejects none on account of past sin who come to him; but he, too, requires confession, giving the assurance that "if we confess our sins he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." (1. John 1:9.)

A Milk-Tester's Plea.

A significant excuse was made recently to the reproach of a clergyman. He was arguing with a young man who neglected church and attended to his business on Sunday as on other days. The young man was employed by a firm engaged in the cheese trade, and it was part of his duty to test the milk supplied to the firm by neighboring farmers. The young man in answer to the clergyman's appeal, to abstain from work on Sundays, said that he considered he was engaged in a work that was morally beneficial to the community, and he knew of one case in which his work was more effectual in the reformation of conduct, than had been the preaching of the clergyman. A farmer, whom he named, was a member of the clergyman's congregation and was never absent from his pew on a Sunday. The milk he supplied to the firm was however of so poor a quality that there was ground for suspicion that it was watered. In spite of his regular listening to faithful preaching the practice was continued; but when the farmer learned that the Babcock test had been introduced into the cheese factory and that he would inevitably be detected, the quality of the milk suddenly improved. There was no doubt that the farmer was now living a better life, inasmuch as he was not cheating his customers in one way, and the young man contended that the reformation was due to his operations. His plea was plausible, but illogical and certainly was no valid defence for his own disregard of the Lord's Day. But how sad a light it cast on the condition of the farmer referred to. He must have been in a deplorable moral condition, when the fear of detection was more potent with him than the preaching of the Gospel. There is reason to fear that many are in a similar condition, forgetting the injunction of the Apostle, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." (11. Tim. 2:19.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Presidents of Seventeen Banks in New York are Presbyterians. Thirty of the most important city institutions have chosen presidents of the same denomination.

Rev. B. Fay Mills Received over Two Thousand cards at his meetings at Manchester, N. H., from persons who had been led at the meetings to desire a change of heart and a new life.

Mr. Moody's Meetings at Lowell, Mass., have been crowded from the beginning. The great Moxie factory would not hold near all who sought admission, and overflow meetings have been held.

Dr. H. M. McCracken of the University of New York has been elected President of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy. The Rev. Amory H. Bradford who succeeded Dr. Deen's in the office, found that his other engagements left him no time for its duties.

There Appears to be an Epidemic of Exposures of municipal corruption. Even Toronto, the best governed city on the continent, has not escaped. Two aldermen have resigned under charges of dealings with contractors by which, for a consideration, they injured the interests of the city.

Evangelists Elliott and Butts have been much cheered by the results of their labors at Johnstown, Pa. Besides the regular services, in which several churches united, cottage prayer meetings were held and in the iron mills, by the courtesy of the proprietors, there were several preaching services.

A Proposal to Erect a Fireproof Library is being considered by the Presbyterian Church. Records and manuscripts of priceless value are in the possession of the Presbyterian Historical Society which ought to be put beyond the possibility of destruction. More room is also needed for their proper arrangement and classification.

Dr. Harris Presbyterian Missionary in Syria, was recently gratified by a testimony given spontaneously by a party of Syrians who have returned to their own country from a tour in South America. They said that they had found by experience in Brazil that the Protestant Christians were much more honest in their dealings than any other people.

The President of the Board of Health of New York says that the record of 1893 shows that the number of persons who live in the tenement houses of the city, exclusive of those living in apartment houses of the better class, was 1,332,773. This is an increase in five years of 239,072. The proportion to population is 70 per cent, in 1888 it was 68 per cent. The density of the population is 143 to the acre, in Paris it is 125 to the acre.

The New Czar of Russia Before his Accession to the Throne, while walking with an attendant one evening through St. Petersburg, heard the sound of singing in a private house. He stayed to listen and was much pleased. On his return to the palace he sent a servant to request the attendance of the merchant who lived in the house. He informed the merchant that he had overheard the singing, and asked where he could procure a copy of the book containing the music and words. The merchant presented the Czar with the book, which was a translation in Russian of one of the Moody and Sankey hymn books.

The Federation of Churches and Benevolent societies in the East side of lower New York, is now regularly organized. Each church and society is to be represented on the Board by its Pastor or President and by one accredited member. Associate members are to be admitted on payment of an annual subscription of $2. Committees have been formed to see that the laws of sanitation are enforced in the Tenement Houses, and to suggest reforms in the building of new homes. Lectures will be given on topics cognate to the work of the federation such as The Training of Children, The Care of the Home, Temperance etc. The general object of the Federation is the improvement of the condition of the half million persons massed in this district. All information may be obtained from Rev. John B. Devins, 339 East Fourth Street, New York.

Christmas in Bethlehem.

Our Traveler Mingles with the Worshipers in "The City of David" on Christmas Eve—Imposing and Crowded Ceremonies in the Church of the Nativity.

BETHLEHEM is approached by a succession of hills terraced to afford foothold for olive, fig and mulberry trees and vineyards. In David's youth it was a prosperous region and the successors of Boaz and Jesse maintain a tolerable reputation as good farmers. By contrast with the shiftless husbandry between Jerusalem and Jericho, it is like a garden for order and fertility.

The appearance of the town is imposing when we behold it from the plains below. The group of churches about which the white stone houses are clustered, have some architectural pretensions, and rise finely from the summit of the ridge, sloping away from them on two sides. When surrounded by walls the site must have been picturesque, and, as a fortification, strong. At a distance the houses look higher than they really are, being built on the sides of the ridge. After reaching the town, we perceive that it is not an exception to other Syrian "settlements" of whatever size, in point of commodiousness and cleanliness.

The steep streets are the only sewers, and are so narrow that two carriages cannot pass in many of them. They are also so crooked that as our vehicle rattles around a corner, the driver gives a warning yell to pedestrians lest they should be surprised and hurt. He dashes through one and whirls into another in great style, cracking his whip and shrieking out his cautions to the occupants of doorways and the middle of the thoroughfare, while the foul mud flies in every direction. The people take him quietly, with true Oriental indifference, flattening themselves against the walls and retiring into open doors and arches until the danger is over. In one very strait passage we met two camels, the nose of the second tied by a rope to the saddle of the first. We graze the mire-encrusted side of one and nearly upset the other, without lessening our speed, until we draw up with a mighty clatter and jerk at the door of the "Hotel Bethlehem."

The great square between the hotel and the Church of the Nativity is filled with people, most of them in holiday attire, and after a hasty luncheon brought with us, but eaten in a big, bare room of the caravanserai, we go up to the roof for a better view of the striking scene. A parapet, three feet high, runs all around our look-out. There are a few chairs for infirm or distinguished guests, and plenty of standing-room for a party little less varied in character than the greater assembly below. Five nationalities are represented among the spectators upon our house-top, a hotel being beneath us. As far as we can see them, every roof is crowded with spectators, the white veils and gay jackets of the women giving a festive air to the multitude. The aspect of the open square—as I reflect with a thrill of emotion—probably does not differ materially from what might have been seen there almost nineteen hundred years ago on Christmas-Eve. "All the world" was to be taxed, and Bethlehem-Ephratah was little among the thousands of Judah; too strait to accommodate the return of those of the house and lineage of natives of the town, who must be enrolled there.

There will be no room in this or any other Inn of Bethlehem to-night for one-fourth of the visitors drawn hither by the prospective celebration out-of-doors and in the church. In the shadow of the barracks opposite a company of gypsies have pitched their tents and are cooking their dinner in the open street, an operation gravely superintended by an ass in harness. A bearded shepherd and his wife have lambs in their arms for sale. A string of kneeling camels occupy one corner of the market-place, their gowned and turbaned owners chatting, or more likely, chaffering, near by. An old man and a girl who pulls one end of her izzar over her mouth as a man in European cut-away coat and derby hat turns to look at her in passing, sit upon the ground with half-a-dozen hopped hens at their feet awaiting purchasers. While the clamor and bustling activity of an American gala-day are absent, the subdued hum of many voices arises to our ears like the swarming of a thousand bees.

Mary had come up from Nazareth with her husband, and would be weary of nerve collected a lot of men sumptuously appareled to whom an officer evidently reports now and then.

"The Patriarch of Syria and Palestine is too infirm to come in person, and has sent a Bishop who will be here presently. All these people are awaiting to see his arrival. The Pacha could not come, and has sent his dragoman. It is a case of substitution all the way through," somebody says in English, and sneeringly.

The Bishop is lunching somewhere, we are told vaguely, and apparently in no hurry to quit the table. Until he comes we may not enter the church or the grotto of the Nativity. But for the novelty of the scene and the liberty to sit silent if we choose, and think out our own thoughts, we should be intensely weary before a blare of trumpets sounds down the steep street and is answered by the bugler in front of the barracks. A mounted officer gallops into the square, striking with the flat of his sword at trespassing groups. Two foot-soldiers, armed with whips of hippopotamus hide take, each, one side of the way, and literally lash the crowd back into place, respecting neither sex nor age. We can hear the hiss and thud of the heavy whip, and are amazed that no outcry, much less resistance, follows the blows. The populace are used to the summary methods of their masters, and take it all as a matter of course. Into the area thus rid of the lower orders of humanity, rides a small body of horsemen; several carriages come next; the military train; the white-robed attendants sway in the slow march like banks of lilies in a gentle breeze; the air is vibrant with bells and voices. It is all imposing and beautiful, and the pulses keep time to the throbbing of chant and chime.

The Church of the Nativity was built by Constantine 306-337 A.D., and restored in the eleventh century by the Crusaders. The pillars upholding the roof are of reddish stone, and scratched all over with the names and crests of these valiant knights. Eight centuries have, in passing, rubbed into illegibility what each man wrote of himself and his deeds in this high and holy place. More distinct, and easy to be read by a Greek scholar, is the inscription upon the octagon baptismal font:

"A MEMORIAL BEFORE GOD AND FOR THE PEACE AND FORGIVENESS OF THE SINNERS WHOSE NAMES THE LORD KNOWS."

One wall bears in (now) shattered mosaics rude pictures of the churches of Sardis and of Antioch. There were many other churches represented here, and the mosaics date back to the twelfth century. Besides the immense columns of dusky red, the shell of the church with huge rafters richly embrowned by time, and the mutilated mosaics, little remains of the temple reared by Constantine and piously remodelled by the Crusaders. Modern ecclesiastical art has crowded the interior with costly decorations, most of which are in good taste, although some are tawdry.

The service of Christmas-eve begins at half-past ten at night. After a very poor dinner served in the Hotel Bethlehem, and eaten in the good company of half-a-dozen Americans, an Englishman, a German officer, and an Italian gentleman, we disperse to our several bed-rooms and try to sleep until the hour of service. With myself the attempt is utterly vain. It is not only that the stone floors and walls of the small chamber create a chill that pierces to bone and marrow, and that an unclosable window opens upon the staircase down which boots are clattering incessantly. My head is hot and my brain a-whirl. In all the day I have had but one still hour in which to pull myself together and appreciate in heart and soul where I really am and why I have come. At sunset, I go away from the crowd of people and press of distractions and found my way to the roof alone.

The great square was no longer a restless mass of human life, but was dotted with groups of quiet figures; the area about the gypsy camp was faintly illumined by the wavering flame of thorns crackling under the supper-pot; here and there a dull glow revealed a brazier over which the owner warmed his hands or boiled his coffee. Beyond the massed houses with the twinkling windows, the outer darkness was rolling up from the valleys. The hill lay hushed and low against the cold yellow of the horizon, and the stars were kindling in the zenith. The air was breezeless, but frosty, and I paced the wide area until the sky was full of stars, keeping watch over Bethlehem and the surrounding lands, as upon the gentle slope over there still bearing the name of the Field of the Shepherd.

It is of that lonely, rapt hour, never-to-be-forgotten, and not to be described by pen, that my mind is full to the exclusion of thought of slumber. In all the meditations of the day the Galilean peasant maiden has moved, a presence that may be felt almost seen. Her Magnificat is read again and for the third time to-day, before we set out for the Church.

It is thronged to suffocation, David had a man on the spot, holding chairs for us ever since sunset. He lies half-asleep across them when we appear to claim them. The aisle upon our right is filled with kneeling women, the long white linen veils worn alike by maid and wife, giving a wondrously picturesque appearance to the throng. Men stand, shoulder to shoulder, in the aisle upon our left; the Europeans bareheaded. Turkish residents of towns wearing the red taboosh, the shaven skulls of the fellahs bound with turbans, general white. A liberal sprinkling of soldiers on police-duty, enlivens the more sober garments. The music is fine from choir and organ; at least forty gorgeous ecclesiastics in gowns stiff and glittering with gold embroidery, are within the chancel-pale. The Bishop sits in the tall patriarchal chair the extreme left of the high altar as we face it, the brilliant array of churchly millinery and of limb, diffident in the presence of the motley crowd, anxious to get into shelter, and disappointed with the heart-sickening chagrin of a modest peasant-girl, when she found that there was not a vacant nook in the khan where she could lie down and rest. We make it all so real to ourselves that we resent the complacent well-being of the loungers below, the greater comfort of the watchers upon the secluded house-top. We visited the oldest khan in Jerusalem last week, and it helped us to understand into what sort of quarters she was compelled to retire at last. The little light came through openings in the grained roof; the stone floor was littered with bundles of straw and hay along the four walls, which had fastened to them mangers raised but a foot above the ground. We have likewise seen several stables in caves, and learned that these natural grottoes are in some parts of Syria preferred to buildings above ground.

Our minds are preoccupied with the Jewish maiden while the panorama of shifting figures and colors passes before the field of vision. The crowd grows more dense; from the barracks issues a company of Turkish soldiery in brilliant uniform, and marches down the middle of the square, throwing the masses of people right and left until a broad track is left clear from the end of the street to the entrance of the church. Upon the roof of a low wing of the barracks is band bursts into triumphal music; the distinguished party leave the roof and a majestic figure descends from a coach upon a carpet spread for his feet. At the sound of the trumpet a procession of priests and choir-boys emerge from the church, and advancing slowly, singing as they go, have reached the carpeted space as the bishop steps from the carriage.

"Now ensues a ceremony inexplicable to us, and perhaps on that account fantastic to ludicrousness. The black robe with scarlet hood worn by the prelate is dexterously whisked off, and a purple robe with a train several yards in length substituted. Gloves of the same color are drawn upon his hands which are then folded upon his breast and kept there, fingers extended stiffly like those of an automaton. Thus dressed, the bishop moves toward the church attended by scores of ecclesiastics and acolytes, all wearing black gowns, and above these the garments we style, for the lack of the technical terms, white dressing-sacks, trimmed with lace that looks cheap, and is dear. Censers swing clouds of perfume into the air, and sustained chant of mens' voices mingles with the chimes from the belfry; women drop upon their knees as the gorgeous pageant passes them. The bishop's pace is inconceivably deliberate; his steps cannot be over an inch long. Four choir-boys bear the purple is half-past eleven o'clock, and the or. n still rolls; priest has relieved priest in this al sing-song reading of the "First or second Gospel" in Latin; anthem has succeeded chant, the Bishop had been undressed and re-dressed twice, as to slippers, and headgear. The lofty, steeped hat glistening with gold and precious stones, has been placed over his white hair and taken off again so many times that we have stopped counting.

en minutes of twelve! Many men have set down upon the marble floor, crossing their legs under them and gone to sleep; among the white-veiled ranks of kneeling women, I see some who have had the wisdom of good-luck, to get close to the great pillars, and now rest tired heads against the cool side, eyes fast shut—perhaps in devotion. A significant pause in the peal of the organ as responses from the two lines of choirs causes a stir in the crowd. Indifference and drowsiness are exchanged for interest. Raised heads are turned toward the high altar, above which I observe for the first time, a curtain hung before what may be a niche or a painting, perhaps two feet long and half as high. After a prelude, the organ glides into a lull, sweet and tender and tuneful, that h in it the very swing of the cradle, and brooding love in mother-heart and the mother's voice. It is still sighing through the now strangely-quiet church when the curtain hiding the niche above the altar is drawn back by an unseen cord or hand, and we see—a cradle with a doll lying in it!

To those about me, what is to me an climax belittling the august preliminaries, and unconceivably unworthy of the occasion that has collected the vast audience, is apparently impressive and affecting. Men stand on tiptoe to gaze; many bow their heads and some kneel as if overcome by emotion; women are convulsed by sobs, or smile lovingly through tears. As the curtain and the pealing Gloria proclaim the Event of the evening, the packed aisles are agitated by an arrival. Two amazingly appareled kervasses bearing gilded staves, force a passage for a man, natty little gentleman, military in bearing, and in the white "imperial" tuft on his chin; keen-eyed and suave, who is conducted to a chair immediately in front of us.

"The French Consul!" whispers Mrs. Mal. The Roman Catholic Church in Palestine is under the immediate protection of France, and the homage paid to the handsome little man may savor of gratitude. Standing erect and courteously attentive, a gorgeous kervasse upon each side, he is the most distinguished personage present, even before two priests part themselves from the crowd of ecclesiastics and approach him while the choir-boys chant melodiously. One of the priests bears what looks like a gold plate about six inches in diameter, and bending respectfully, offers it to the lips of the Consul, who arises at his approach, and kisses the gold disk—whatever it may be. Somebody explains that it is the "Seal," but what Seal and why thus presented and saluted, I am unable to learn.

equal ignorance as to the meaning of the marching and counter-marching; the feelings and uprisings, and especially the bings and unrobings of the Majestic Chief of the hour, I sit for two-and-a-half mortal hours longer, a miserable fixture in my uncomfortable chair. The Third and Fourth Gospels are intoned in Latin by a third and a fourth glittering priest; all read and chant through their noses, and it is thin bounds to assert that not fifty out of the hundreds assembled in this, the oldest church in the Holy Land, comprehend one syllable of what is uttered. And still the white-veiled women continue to kneel in the aisle, their faces turned al-ward, and the motley-hued garments of the men are pressed close together in the body of the church.

"They will not stir until the Baby is cried around," says my interpreter when I wonder the crowd does not thin.

At half-past two "the Baby" is borne in solemn procession of all the priests, amid rattling and organ-thunder and the adoration of the now wide-awake and excited people,—down one aisle and across the end of the church, then up another aisle and back to its resting-place near the high-altar. It is a large wax doll, gowned in lawn and lace, not a particularly pretty, but a very

In the crush of the retiring spectators at the door I am hustled against Mrs. Sharpe, and she seizes my hand in both of hers, speechless with emotion.

I remark in a voice that must sound jaded, that I had seen Dr. Sharpe across the church, but without her, and supposed her absent.

"I have passed the whole evening upon my knees in the Grotto," she sighs, hysterically. I was never so blissfully happy before in my life." At intervals between the hour that elapses between bidding her "Good-night" and falling asleep, I hear the measured fall of footsteps upon the roof overhead, sounds that recall with soothing efficacy, my twilight promenade and reverie.

PROPHETIC CHRONOLOGY.

A Divine Purpose in the Dates and Periods Mentioned in the Prophecies.

BY THE REV. RICHARD CHESTER.

WE come now to the question of the mode of interpretation. How are we to understand the dates and periods given us? As to the true mode of interpreting the chronological prophecies, we have, I apprehend, without traveling for information outside of this same book of Daniel, all the instruction that we need. We have, in the first place, proof plain and positive that chronological prophecy is to be interpreted literally. Daniel so interpreted, and, as the result proved, rightly interpreted (chap. 9:2), the prophecy of Jeremiah concerning the seventy years of the captivity in Babylon. The seven predicted "times" of Nebuchadnezzar's insanity (chap. 4: 25), were likewise seven literal years. It is therefore most assuredly assuming too much to affirm that the "time, times, and the dividing of time" of chap. 7: 25, are exclusively figurative or symbolical—each time denoting only a year of years, and not at all denoting, as in the former instance, a literal year.

But we have only to pass on to verses 20-27 of chapter 9 of this same prophecy, and to study the wonderful further revelation made by the angel Gabriel to the "greatly beloved Daniel," in order to satisfy ourselves that chronological prophecy forms no exception to the rule which, with very few exceptions, holds good with regard to all prophecy—namely, that it has a double signification, and therefore a double fulfillment.

We learn hence that the seventy predicted years of captivity determined upon Judah and Jerusalem, while they have a literal meaning, and have received a literal fulfillment in the restoration from Babylon, have also a far more extended signification. We learn that they also apply to a period of seventy sevens (or weeks) of years—a period of four hundred and ninety years in all—during the whole of which the people and the city were to be, and have been, in captivity—although not, as during the seventy literal years, to the king and the nation of Babylon—and at, but not until, the full and final close of which period they should be everlastingly emancipated and restored.

When we take all this fairly, and without prejudice, into consideration, we have, I believe, quite sufficient evidence of the correctness of what is called the year-day system of interpretation. This, be it remembered, not in the least degree as subversive of, or as a substitute for, the literal or day-day system, but only as supplemental thereto.

We must be careful to observe that the chronological prediction of the seventy years' captivity did not fully inform Daniel as to the exact date of its fulfillment. Neither are we to expect that the similar predictions in his prophecy or in the book of Revelation will enable us accurately to determine "the time of the end," to which they refer, and at which they are to receive their complete and exhaustive fulfillment, Jeremiah's prophecy of the seventy years' captivity left unrevealed, and therefore undeterminable, the exact date of their commencement; whether in "the third year of Jehoia-kim, when Nebuchadnezzar came up against Jerusalem and besieged it" (Daniel 1: 1); or in the subsequent reign of Zedekiah, whom Nebuchadnezzar made king, who reigned for eleven years in Jerusalem, and whose rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar led to the full destruction of the Temple and the city, and the final captivity of the residue of the people (II. Chron. 36: 5-21).

All, therefore, that Daniel could have ascertained concerning the termination of the Babylonian captivity by the study of the prophecy of Jeremiah was that it was limited to seventy years; and that there was—as the comparing of this prophecy with the history of the commencement of the captivity would satisfy him—a period of about eleven years, either at the beginning or at the end of which these seventy years should terminate and the prophecy would be undoubtedly fulfilled.

Even so there is a designed uncertainty in the chronological predictions concerning the duration of the power of the Antichrist. We are not told the point from which the prophetic measurement of the power, either of its existence or its exercise, commences, and we can therefore only speak of probability, not of certainty, with respect to the exact period of its close.

(To be Concluded.)

PRAY FOR THOSE THOU LOVEST.

YES, pray for those thou lovest, thou may'st vainly, idly seek,
The force of fervid tenderness by feeble words to speak;
Go kneel before thy Father's throne and meekly, humbly there,
Ask blessings for the loved one in the silent hour of prayer.

Yes, pray for those thou lovest, if uncouthed wealth were thine,
The treasures of the boundless deep, the riches of the mine;
Thou could'st not to thy cherished friend, so dear a gift impart,
As the earnest benediction of a deeply loving heart.

Seek not the worldling's friendship, it shall droop and wane ere long,
In the cold and heartless glitter of the pleasure loving throng;
But seek the friend who when thy prayer for him shall murmured be,
Breathes forth in faithful sympathy a fervent prayer for thee.

And should thy flowery path in life, become a path of pain,
The friendship formed in paths like these, thy spirit shall sustain;
Years may not chill, nor change invade, nor poverty impair
The love that grew and flourished at the holy time of prayer.

LOOKING BACKWARD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Dec. 30. Psalm 145.

ONE important difference must exist between the retrospection of a Christian and that of a man who has no faith in God. However similar may be the circumstances recalled, however much there may be that the two men will equally rejoice over or deplore, the outcome must be radically changed by the standpoint each occupies. To the man who recognizes no divine guidance or government, the course of events must necessarily be a horribly mixed, capricious conglomeration of good and evil. Death takes away the man whose life is full of love and kindness, who is doing benevolent work, and on whose exertions many are depending for daily bread. It takes away the mother whose growing family needs her supervision and the daughter whose loving ministrations in the home are the comfort and joy of the parents. It closes the career of a young man just as he is equipped for service in the cause of humanity and whose prospects are full of promise. It passes over men and women whose lives are injurious to others, who are corrupt and corrupting and suffers them to live on multiplying their evil deeds to old age. Fortune is equally capricious. Those who toil the hardest have the least remuneration and some who desire to work and live honestly find no one willing to employ them. One man sees his wife and children sicken and die, because he cannot get the means to provide them with proper food or to pay the rent of decent rooms away from the fetid atmosphere of the slums; while another no more worthy, no more intelligent or affectionate, has hundreds of thousands of dollars which he can never spend or use, but which he hoards with no benefit to himself. Retrospection must bring up many of these phenomena. Either personal experience or association must have familiarized every one with them.

Without the aid of faith, what light can come on this gloomy situation? The Psalmist said that when he tried to understand it, it was too painful for him, until he went into the sanctuary of God. That has been the experience of many. The conviction that God rules the world, that he is not afar off or indifferent, that he is not only wise, but loving, is the one consolatory reflection that can sustain the mind. The Psalmist saw it and expresses it with an outburst of joy in the grand song selected as the basis for the topic. We are asked to believe in God, to trust him and to wait. All things, we are assured, will work together for good to them that love God. With this we should surely be content. We cannot understand his ways, any more than the child at school can understand why hard tasks are set for him, when play would be so much more pleasant. But we expect the child to have confidence in his father, and it is the same confidence that God requires of us. We await the clue to the mystery, in the firm conviction that there is a clue; in the end, even we shall praise the goodness of God. In the meantime all love and sympathy and helpfulness within our power should be given to every sufferer within our reach. Some burden we may lighten every day and into some darkened heart we may send a ray of light. With unwavering faith in the heart and with a hand ready to help, the past need not depress us and we may go forward to meet the future with a cheerful mind.

AN URGENT MATTER.

Do our readers in the Christian Endeavor Society, the Epworth League, and the Baptist Young People's Unions know anything of the condition of the people in Nebraska and Kansas? If not, they will be surprised to hear that there are thousands of men, women and children who, on the edge of winter, are without food, fuel, and clothes. Letters received at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD give descriptions of the destitution which are heart-rending, and they are corroborated by the statement of Mr. Fisher, a missionary of the American Sunday School Union, now in New York, whose field of labor lies in the famine districts. He says that our correspondents have not exaggerated. He has seen people eating the most repulsive refuse to keep themselves alive. In some places they are burrowing in the ground for warmth. One family was delighted at finding a sack containing crusts, several months old, which they beat to powder with a hammer, and, having soaked it, devoured it greedily. These people have been brought into this dreadful condition by the failure of their crops for two successive seasons through prolonged drought. Their savings are gone, their stock has been sold, and they are starving. Food is needed, but especially clothing—cottons, flannels, blankets, anything that will cover the shivering bodies. On another page of this journal will be found the names of reliable persons who will gladly distribute any goods that may be sent to them. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is sending money, and will be pleased to receive and forward any sums that may be given. In the name of Christian charity, in the name of common humanity let every society do something for our starving brethren in their extremity.

TWO B. Y. P. U. LEADERS.

Our readers of the Baptist Young People's Union will be glad to have the portraits we give on this page of two officers of the national organization. Mr. Frank Moody is the newly-elected Treasurer of the Union. He is a young business man of great promise, a native of Wisconsin and an ardent friend of the young people's movement. His early years were spent in Washington County, but he was initiated into business life as a boy in Milwaukee. His energy and attention to business won him rapid promotion and he is now a partner in the firm that he once served as office boy. At the age of eighteen he was brought to Christ, and united with the South Baptist Church of Milwaukee. He brought into the church the same energy that characterized him in business, became church clerk, Sunday School Superintendent and, when the Baptist Young People's Union was organized, was chosen President of the local society. He also organized a Boys' Brigade, of which he is still President. At the recent Toronto Convention he was elected to the responsible position of Treasurer of the National Union.

At the same Convention, Mr. Joseph N. Shenstone was elected second vice-President of the Union. He comes of English stock, but he is a native of Brantford, Canada. On the completion of his education he settled in Chicago, obtaining work in a printing office in that city. It was in Chicago, that, after a period of wandering, he was converted in answer to the prayers of his godly parents. He returned to them doubly endeared by the change. For some time he was associated with his father in public office, but latterly he removed to Toronto and joined a manufacturing firm having large connections in the United States as well as in Canada. The arrangements for the recent Convention in Toronto involved arduous labor on the part of many of the local leaders, and Mr. Shenstone, who was connected with the Union at the Walmer Road Church, threw himself energetically into the work. He was elected Chairman of the Finance Committee, which in all such enterprises is the most laborious of the departments. The work Mr. Shenstone did in that capacity was conspicuous, and the Union showed its appreciation by electing him to the Vice-Presidency, a well merited tribute to his abilities and the services he has rendered to the Union.

A GOOD SAMARITAN CHAPTER.

The following interesting record published by "The Silver Cross" of a Chapter of King's Daughters which was organized at Hartford, Conn., May 22, 1891, may serve as a model to some correspondents who have inquired about the organization of Circles. The Good Samaritan Chapter started with a membership of sixteen, which has gradually increased to two hundred, including the members of the branches. In describing the work, the Secretary Mrs. W. P. Williams, says: Our aim, first, to endeavor, by individual effort, to help the sick and those in trouble. Second, To strive by precept and example, to repress

MR. JOSEPH N. SHENSTONE.

(Second vice-President of the B. Y. P. U. A.)

the idle talk and the evil speaking. The membership: All ages, all denominations, in town and out of town; number unlimited. Besides our seven regular officers, we have a Finance Committee to which is left the expenditure of the funds. The Chapter is composed of four Circles—Visiting, Dorcas, Circle of Young Samaritans, and Whatsoever Circle.

The Visiting Circle comprises those who call on the blind. Our interest is chiefly confined to the older women and to those of the young who have finished their education. Most of these receive from two to five visits a month from our members, and they look forward with pleasant anticipation to the call of the visitor. They are cheered and comforted in their deprivation and loneliness by this assurance—that they are loved and remembered. The Dorcas Circle is composed of those who contribute each year two new articles of clothing for distribution.

The Circle of Young Samaritans—boys and girls under sixteen—"scatter seeds of kindness" "In His name," as they have opportunity. They distributed fifteen hundred credit cards last year for the store connected with the Institute for the Blind, besides carrying flowers, and assisting in many other ways in the Chapter's line of work. The Whatsoever Circle comprises all members of the Chapter not in active connection with the other Circles. The "watch for opportunities" to pass the "c of loving service." The Sons belong to this Circle, and have proved themselves loyal to the King by their willing and helpful endeavors. We have two branches—one in New York city, the other in Durham, Conn., working as far as possible in the same lines. The Chapter and branches exchange records of their meetings.

Our meetings are held monthly, except in July and August. The voluntary mailbox contributions at these meetings are used to help those in need. We strive to keep our out-of-town members in touch with the plans of the Chapter through circular letters. They, in return, send greetings which are read at our meetings.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Christian Endeavors of Auckland, New Zealand, are supporting a missionary among the Chinese in that city, and the Endeavors in Wellington have sent Melbourne for a missionary to labor in the city.

Seven languages are regularly heard at the meetings of Christian Endeavor Societies in Chicago: Welsh, Norwegian, Swedish, Dutch, German, Bohemian, and Chinese.

The Madrid Young Men's Christian Association "Juventud Evangelica," desire to enter into relations with foreign Associations to claim their sympathy in efforts to about to put forth to develop its work. Madrid and other towns in Spain.

Mr. Frederick B. Pratt, of New York has been elected President of the International Young Men's Christian Association Committee in succession to Mr. Elbert Monroe, who died a short time ago while discharging the functions he had only just recently accepted.

Dr. Schell announces in "The Epworth Herald" that the first Indian chapter of the Epworth League has just been organized Oneida, Wis. The chapter begins with membership of forty. At the first meeting after they were regularly enrolled, two were converted, and one poor backslider was reclaimed.

The London "Christian" says: All Endeavors will be delighted to know that Dr. F. E. and Mrs. Clark are paying a other visit to this country. They will be entertained at a breakfast on the morning of Dec. 4, and on the evening of that day will address a public meeting in the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

Forty subscriptions of $1,000 each have been secured toward the Endowment Building for the Y. M. C. A.'s of Massachusetts and Rhode Island. The building which will be erected will be located on one of Boston's prominent streets, and be a grand center for Christian work for young men.

The difference between the Young Men's Christian Associations of England and the United States was curiously defined lately by Mr. J. S. Virgo, Secretary of the Adelaide, Australia, Association on his return from the Jubilee Conference. The Associations in England he describes as "very spiritual in their work, aggressive in their Gospel efforts, and enterprising in their endeavors to win young men to Christ. Those in America, many of which he has also visited, he says are "less aggressive in evangelistic meeting, but exceedingly active in regard to personal effort among young men," reaching "a class which scarcely touched in any part of the world."

WHEN WRITING TO THIS OFFICE. In order to secure the promptest attention for your communications, please bear in mind that the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is divided into the following three departments, and that communications intended for anyone of these departments should not contain matters of interest to any other department. Subscription Department in which only subscriptions or renewals are handled. Address Department where all changes or corrections of name, address or date are made. Complaint Department in which only complaints of irregular delivery receive attention. Communications to two or three departments can be written on a separate sheet, may be enclosed in one envelope, but each separate sheet should be referred only to one of these departments. They are Coming to the Front Among the Women of the East—How a Japanese Lady Pays Her Holiday Visits.

JAPANESE women are among the handsomest types of femininity to be found in the far East. With delicate, light olive complexions, soft oval faces, high foreheads, eyes but slightly oblique, heavy, arching eye-brows and an abundance of glossy black hair, they present a most pleasing contrast to their neighbors, the Chinese. Unfortunately, the women, even some of the ladies of highest rank, have a mania for painting and powdering their faces. Their social position is far more favorable than that of their sex in most Eastern countries; for, although they lead secluded lives, their education is not neglected, as is the case with their unhappy sisters in China.

In holiday seasons, such as we ourselves are now celebrating, social rigors are greatly relaxed, and the ladies do a great deal of visiting among each other's families, the favorite conveyance being the "cango," a sort of palanquin shown in the illustration on this page. Very light and graceful, composed entirely of bamboo, and padded with soft, silken cushions, it makes a most comfortable and picturesque seat—an Oriental modification of the "Sedan chair" of our forefathers' days, and, like it, carried by poles borne on the sturdy shoulders of a pair of serving-men. My lady sits cosily on the cushions, fan in hand, her visiting satchel and the inseparable bamboo parasol, covered with rice paper or painted silk, lying on the top of the palanquin, ready for use when she alights. In this fashion she does her shopping among the gay bazaars, pays her ceremonial calls, or visits the bath, the "jinriksha" being preferred for longer distances. In Japan, the bath is indeed a great social institution, and affords frequent opportunities for friends meeting together and discussing family matters, much as ladies in our own land love to linger and gossip over a cup of tea. There is a finer and more expensive sort of "cango," used by ladies of the highest rank. It is called a "norimon," and is generally made of lacquered wood, beautifully ornamented and perfumed.

Towards women, the Japanese are uniformly polite and courteous. This national trait is noticeable even in the rural districts, and a feature of the training of children in a majority of Japanese homes is respect to womanhood, although this is unfortunately too frequently lost sight of in the complex life of the great cities. The nation, however, does not forget that nine of its rulers have been women, and that one of its empresses was the conqueror of Korea.

Extremely courteous in their bearing, yet decidedly independent, the Japanese have within the last quarter of a century come into much more intimate and pleasant relations with the western world than any other Asiatic nation has done. Fifty years ago, we regarded them as an almost savage people, and our treaties with them were framed on that basis; but we now know them to be industrious, cultured and patriotic, with of our diplomatic representatives and not a few of our missionaries have helped materially in this direction by taking their wives to the scene of their duties, and mingling freely among the better classes in social matters. Their example has not been without its result for the daughters of the "Land of the Rising Sun" are imitative and ambitious.

Just now, all Japan is bustling with excitement over the war, and the women, high and low, are taking advantage of the opportunity to display their patriotism by making up vast consignments of bandages and delicacies for the sick and wounded troops at the front, being roused to a fever of emulation by the personal example of the Empress, who is untiring in her devotion to the needs of the Mikado's brave soldiers.

How Hindu Boys Tell the Time.

There are no public schools in Nepal, India. The sons of princes and nobles—even a young king, while he is yet only a boy—are taught at home by the "guru," or household priest, who is supposed to be also a pundit, or very learned man. Later, the young men of rank are sent to Patna, Benares, or Calcutta, where they learn to

CHRISTMAS-TIDE.

DOWN through the ages comes to us
The song the angels told,
As they sang it there on the midnight air
To those watching shepherds of old.
A marvelous sight, on that starry night,
Was that band of angels fair;
What wonder then, if those humble men
Bowed down in the midnight air.
And listened with faces full of awe.
As far as their voices rang
O'er the stillness deep and a world asleep,
As "Glory to God," they sang.
"Peace upon earth," O, tidings sweet,
Brought by those angels fair,
As clear and long that beautiful song
Broke over the stillness there.
"Glory to God," through the changes of time,
As of old, on that midnight clear,
Each Christmas-tide, both far and wide,
It falls on the listening ear.

WHAT A PAIR OF SLIPPERS DID.

AT this holiday season, when innumerable pairs of slippers are doubtless in contemplation as gifts to dear friends, it may interest the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to know how one pair of slippers made by a missionary's wife in India, were used as a means to accomplish much spiritual good.

Nearly thirty-four years ago, a missionary's wife, Mrs. Mullens, sat in her parlor in Calcutta, India, embroidering a pair of slippers for her husband. A Brahman gentleman came in, saw, and admired them. Mrs. Mullens, quick to avail herself of an opportunity, asked him if he would like to have his wife taught to make a pair of slippers for him. He replied in the affirmative. Other invitations followed, and, in the glowing words of Miss Britton, a pair of slippers became the means of opening to the lady missionaries thousands of homes, over which the dark pall of an idolatrous superstition had hung for generations.

The year following this opening, in 1861, the wife of the Rev. Francis Mason, Baptist missionary to Burmah, visited Calcutta, and became thoroughly interested in the new movement, viz., the Christian education of the women and girls in the zenanas, and, upon her return to the United States a few months later, she made an earnest appeal in its behalf to the Christian women of her own land. The formation of the Woman's Union Missionary Society of America for Heathen Lands, the pioneer Woman's Society of this continent, was the result of that appeal. This Society is still full of life and vigor, supporting missionaries in China, India, Japan and other parts of the East.

The Woman's Congregational Board of Missions was organized for work in the Asiatic field. Since that time many other Christian organizations have labored successfully in the same parts of the world among the heathen, and every year shows increase in the work and the number of workers.

This little incident shows that humble instrumentalities are not to be despised.

a noble history, and the desire for a still nobler future. Japan has learned much from the west and has applied the lesson to such excellent purpose that the "dwarf people," as they are contemptuously termed by the Chinese, have become the leading factor in Asiatic politics, commerce and civilization. Moreover, the ancient edict forbidding Christians to come to Japan is now not only inoperative but wholly forgotten, for missionaries representing every Christian denomination have made most encouraging progress there. It is estimated that the Protestant Episcopal Church has over 2,000 native converts, the Church of England, 4,000; the Russian Church, 20,000; the "Holy Church of Japan," a native Christian organization, about 5,000, while the Methodists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Friends and other denominations are all well represented, the aggregate total of Christian converts being probably about 50,000. Naturally, in a land where women have for centuries been accustomed to seclusion, the feminine converts are in the minority; yet Christianity has already accomplished much for woman in Japan, and is steadily aiding in her emancipation from her former degraded condition. Some speaking English, and to wear English clothes, and to tell the time of day by an English clock; for in Nepal time is measured by means of a copper vessel, with a small hole in the bottom, set afloat on a tank or pool. Sixty times a day this kettle fills and sinks, and every time it sinks a gong is struck; so that the day is divided into sixty "gongs" or "bells," as sailors reckon time aboard ship. The poor Bhootiya shepherds, or the Newar women who make pottery in the fields, say that the day is begun when they can count the tiles on the roof of a house, or when they can see the hairs on the back of a man's hand by holding it to the light.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

A Christian Friend.

IT was touching to see Annie in the same home, that home which had once been the scene of so much festivity, where she had spent days in idle vanity, wearing herself down doing nothing. At first, after debt had deprived her of her wealth, and fashionable friends looked cold and bowed distantly, than her pride was sorely wounded. Some who were mere parasites, who fawned upon her, reaped of her bounty, these, too, were simply passing acquaintances, certainly not the warm, demonstrative, flattering friends of yore. Now, she cared not for indifference. Hers was now a different world, with different aims and aspirations. She had risen above society, its fashion and conventionalities.

With her dear mother, Roy and his family, she was happy. She was a mystery to her mother, but she forbore to remark upon the change, yet it troubled her greatly. "Better this than the asylum," she would repeat to herself by way of comfort, but it would have pleased her better had she been different. Annie felt that here was missionary ground, still she did not intrude religion disagreeably, though she had talked to her mother, and once made an earnest appeal to Roy. She was an enigma to him. He watched her, and the more he watched, the more he wondered. She was the living epistle he was reading, morning noon and night. Here was the woman he had sent away, had paid her salary in a different place among new scenes and people, to prevent melancholia, and now she was the happy spirit, the bright sunshine of his home. He could not understand the transformation.

One day as they were all in the sitting-room, she said:

"Mamma, did you ever hear of a widow in the city by the name of Somers? She lives on Cherry Street."

"No, dear, I have never had an acquaintance on Cherry Street. Did you wish some work done?"

"No, mamma. One of our teachers was once a pupil of hers, and gave me a letter of introduction to her. I would be glad to find out her residence and whether she is in the city."

"She is a mere nobody, Annie," said Roy, looking up from his paper. "I would let her alone. Still if you really wish, I will start Jack around among the 'vidders' and perhaps he may be able to find the one you are looking for."

So Jack's services were accepted, and he was sent with the letter, and with the message that she would call late that afternoon. So, after the sun was far down in the west, Annie started for "Sub Rosa," Mrs. Somers' residence, at the extreme end of Cherry Street. She was prepared to love Mrs. Somers from the description Miss Wyman had given of her, and she looked forward with great pleasure to this friendship.

There was a sweet breeze from the honeysuckle and jasmine vines as Annie approached the house, and the rose bushes seemed one big bouquet of flowers; indeed, the whole yard was full. Before Annie could ring the bell, a lady came out to meet her, and greeted her with the pleasant words:

"You are not a stranger, my dear. Come in, I am glad indeed to meet you."

They entered Mrs. Somers' bed-room, and a cushioned rocker was given Annie, with the remark:

"You see I brought you right into my room, so we should have no interruptions, and besides, I didn't feel like making a stranger of you by carrying you into the parlor."

Annie thanked her for making her feel so much at home. Mrs. Somers was very attractive to her, for her face seemed beautiful in its calm repose. Her complexion was white and clear, and her white hair came creeping from beneath her white cap, giving a peculiar softness to her face. Everything in this house seemed to be white; her bed-spread, the curtains, the wall, the tidies, the stocking the old lady was knitting, her cap, hair, and apron. The white wing of peace, Annie thought.

"You have lived on the hill many years I think, my dear?"

"Yes, Mrs. Somers, ever since I can remember. Did you know papa?"

"No, I do not remember ever to have met him. I have seen your mother pass often riding out, for I know your carriage by the fine bays. Your mother and I did not belong to the same church, so I have never met her. Miss Wyman writes me that you have recently put on Christ. I am truly rejoiced. It is a great thing to be a child of the King of heaven."

"Indeed I feel it so, Mrs. Somers. I lived a long, long time without my Saviour, and I shudder when I think how I lived, so careless, so thoughtless, so independent of God. I loved the beautiful, so I worshipped nature, but I saw no loving hand in its creation. Oh, I have been very, very wicked."

"So we all have been very, very wicked."

"But I have been peculiarly wicked, Mrs. Somers."

"Have it so then," replied Mrs. Somers with a smile, "but you have found a peculiarly good Saviour, fitted for peculiarly wicked people, have you not?"

"Indeed I have. In seeking your acquaintance, Mrs. Somers, I hope to be benefited by your experience, aided by your counsel, and so my work for the Saviour will be better directed, more efficient. He has done so much for me I am impatient to begin work for him, impatient to show him that I do feel truly grateful to him for what he has done for me, do love him just a little."

"I know you do, dear child, and he knows it too. Most gladly will I aid you in any and every possible way. Already I love you for your own sake, but most of all because I see in your face the image of my Father, and I know in truth that we are sisters by a nearer, dearer tie than that which binds earthly sisters."

"I shall be at home three months, Mrs. Somers, and I am going to give myself up to you during this vacation. Please put me to work. I promise not to trouble you after you have started me in the right channel. I understand that the poor of the city is your special charge—will you let me help you in this field?"

"I gladly accept your services, my dear. Yes, I have devoted a great deal of my time to the poor. I am not a woman of wealth, so I cannot give much money, but I try to benefit their souls, and this is better than giving them silver and gold. There are many afflicted, suffering creatures in this city that the rich never think of."

"There my life comes in again. It meets me at every turning point."

"I did not intend to make a home thrust, my dear child, but truth is truth. I shall be only too glad to have you go with me to visit some of my poor. It will give me pleasure to go with you any time you feel disposed to call."

"To-morrow?"

"Yes, to-morrow if it suits you. I intended going to see two families to-morrow afternoon, so if you choose we will go together."

"I will accompany you very gladly, Mrs. Somers. I thank you for allowing me so much of your valuable time, but I fear I have interfered with your own work."

Mrs. Somers' Scripture was ready, and she replied: "Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price," and then she added: "Come often to see me, just as often as you can. You think I will benefit you, but I, in my turn, feel that you will do me good. Communing of absent friends, rehearsing their good qualities and deeds of love, always makes us love these friends more ardently. So, I feel in talking of our dear Saviour, we will each love him more."

"Good-bye, Mrs. Somers. I hope my frequent visits will not make you regret your kind invitation."

"Good-bye, my child, no fear of that. Come often. I shall look for you to-morrow afternoon about four o'clock."

"I shall be here, Mrs. Somers, unless something unforeseen prevents."

It was late when Annie reached home. The streets were already ablaze with gas, and on entering the house she soon discovered that the family had gathered in the dining-room for supper. Before she had stepped across the doorway, little Roy slid down from his chair and running up in front of her, with both hands behind, said with a mischievous twinkle:

"Dess what I'm dot 'hind me for you, Aunt Annie."

"For me? Let me see—why, it's a big sugar plum."

"No, t'aint a sugar plum—dess agin."

"Oh, a pretty, little white kittle."

"No, taint a kittle, you fink I'd hold a kittle 'hind here? She'd scratch awful. Dess agin—it's free sump fins."

"Three somethings? What can it be—three somethings and for me! Let me see—it's three beautiful red roses."

Ha! Ha! Ha! and the little fellow laughed so heartily everybody joined in, and then he held up three letters. Annie snatched the child up in her arms and kissed him, as she said:

"You darling! How could I ever have guessed these letters!"

Glancing at the addresses, she laid them before her plate, as her mother said:

"I was getting uneasy about you, dear, you were out so late and I did not know in what quarter of the city you were going."

"Do not fear for me, Mamma. I am somewhat late. Next time I will come faster by taking the street car. The evening was so delightful, I wanted to enjoy it!"

"Did you find your widow?" asked Roy.

"Oh, yes, thanks to faithful Jack. I spent a pleasant afternoon with Mrs. Somers. She is a rare woman."

"How 'rare,' Annie," asked her brother quizzically. "In what respect is she 'rare'?"

"In the first place, Roy, she has a singularly attractive face, and her face is the mirror of her beautiful soul."

"A 'rara avis in terris,'" said Roy with a smile, but Annie, not heeding, went on:

"The self that rules the world and is usually the divinity that presides at every hearthstone, is not in Mrs. Somers' little domicile. She may be its mistress, but she moves about it as though she were only the steward for another, and her mind, her time, her talents were all another's, and her housekeeping, even in its minutest detail, is performed exactly and punctually as service to her Lord and Master. She opens up her big heart and sweeps in the universe. She is a worthy child of her Father."

There was silence at the table, only the rattling of knives, forks and spoons was audible. No one knew what to say, and Roy was intent upon his plate. Annie felt the embarrassment of the circle, and to relieve it, said:

"One of my letters is from Val, Mamma. I have heard nothing from her for about eight months. She wrote me immediately upon my arrival at the cottage, and though I replied at once, she has not deigned to notice my letter. I thought, perhaps, her ladyship had cut me off of her list of correspondents. If you will excuse me, since I have finished my supper, I will go out and enjoy my letters."

Upstairs she went, and, taking a rocker under the gas, opened the two letters from college friends and read them, then, tearing open the other envelope, said:

"Now, Val dear, for you—the best for last."

"DEAR, DEAR ANNIE:—The interim between your letter and mine is long, but I could not prevent this, much as I deplored it. Had you been by my side during the last few months, you would readily excuse this seeming neglect. You do not know, dear Annie, that about six weeks ago we buried our baby boy. It was a great grief to us; how could we keep from weeping bitterly! We did indeed weep and mourn, but I trust we did not murmur. At our baby's birth we gave him unreservedly to Jesus, and if he chose to accept our gift thus early, what right had we to complain? Does one murmur when his gift is accepted on earth? Surely not. We had hoped our darling might be spared us for a noble, useful life, but God saw fit to will it otherwise, so we can only bow and kiss the rod he holds. For months my baby had been drooping, so pale, so thin. I was longing for the cool weather of fall to brace him up, to strengthen him for the trying period of dentition, through which he was passing. As warm weather advanced, he began to fade before my eyes like a pine lily, and no medical skill, no careful nursing, not all the kisses and epithets of love could keep him. One night my heart was buoyant with hope, for I thought him better, but before morning dawned a terrible convulsion seized him, and the quiverings of his little body were only stilled by death. It seemed so hard to shut my beautiful baby up in a casket, to lay him in the cruel grave, and the first sod that fell upon the coffin's lid sounded so dismally hollow, so merciless, that my heart seemed ready to break, so full of woe it was. Then I went to my Saviour, begged him to remember my frailty, remember I am but dust, and pity me, for the mother love in my heart was deeper and stronger than death itself. Sweetly the words recurred to me, 'what I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.' My sorrow was stilled; the floodgates of my grief were closed. Jesus seemed so near me. Since then I have been comforted. I miss my darling, my arms are painfully empty; I miss the music of his voice, his smiling eye, his dimpled hands, his laughing lips—my beautiful, noble, angel boy!—but he was not too sweet, too beautiful for Jesus. I gave him to my Saviour. Ah, Annie, you and I are honored mothers to have little ones at the court of heaven."

"My dear cousin, do not think I am so drowned in my own sorrow that I cannot rejoice with you in your conversion. I wish you could look into my heart and only see how glad and thankful I am. As soon as I received your letter telling me of the glorious change, I wanted to sit down immediately and tell you how rejoiced we all were, but my baby's feebleness demanded my whole time. I had so recently passed through the same change myself that the rehearsal of the stages through which you had passed brought back so vividly my own experience that I felt as though I were passing again through my own conversion. In you, Annie, and in myself, the change was a perfect transformation. In some, it is as the rising of the sun, gradual and slow, tipping the earth with gold and revivifying all nature. It was thus with Mr. Carlisle, and thus with my dear mother. I cannot help being glad that it was different with me. I am thankful that I can put my finger upon the exact moment when I gave my heart an life to my Saviour. This does not make me any the better Christian. Oh, no! but God knew that for such a weak creature as I, so trembling and fearful, so stumbling and short-sighted, it would help me to know the exact moment, so, in great mercy he gave the knowledge to me and I bless him for it. I do not believe in forever digging up your sins and looking at them as a means to produce contrition. If Jesus has forgotten them, why shouldn't I, let them remain buried? Neither do I believe in living in the past, in running back and searching for old fossil hopes and showing them as a proof of conversion. No; I want to live in the present and to be always able to give an answer to those who ask of the hope that is now in my heart. I want to live in the present and for the future. I often recall the lines I once wrote in front of one of my school books. 'Look not mournfully into the past, it comes not back again; wisely improve the present, it thine; go forth to meet the shadowy future without fear and with a brave, manly heart.' The quotation does not please me now, should read: 'Go forth to meet the shadowy future without fear, trusting ever in Jesus.'"

"You are now enjoying your vacation your first vacation since you have entered the ranks of teacher. I know the labor was a pleasure to you, and I feel sure that the rest of these three months will be sweet. Can you not come up and spend a part, at least, of your vacation with us? We will be truly overjoyed to see you, and I feel sure our mountain scenery will be a delight to you, and you can bring canvas and brush and transfuse as many of our surpassing scenes as you will. Then, too, our mountain breezes are so exhilarating—come and bring dear auntie with you. Write soon and say you are both coming. Don't sit down and pen a quick refusal, but consider seriously, weigh both sides, and may the balance be in my favor. With love and warm wishes to every member of your family, I am lovingly, VAL."

2 O sooner had the news of Sir Henry Layard's arrival become known than the castle (of Kali Tul, on the Persian frontier) was besieged by men and women who were eager to be treated by the European physician, as they called him. The chief's principal wife also sent for him to see her son, who was lying dangerously ill in a large booth built of boughs of trees and read with the finest carpets. Layard sent the mother several doses of opium. Before giving her son this medicine she consulted the doctors, who declared that it would be dangerous to make use of a stranger's remedies. Then a mulla was consulted. He opened the Koran at random, and after reading its pages, said that the oracle was unfavorable. The anxious mother was afraid to administer the quinine because of such determined opposition, and therefore she laid it aside, and gave the boy "water with which the inside of a porcelain coffee-cup, on which a text from the Koran was written in ink, had been washed."

Mehemet Taki Khan, who was absent when Layard arrived, returned home soon afterwards. Directly after he had retired to his wife's apartments, he sent for Layard, and found him in great distress. His son was in such an alarming condition that his death was momentarily expected. The two physicians had declared that they could do nothing else for the child, and all hope was gone. In his despair the heart-broken father promised to give Layard anything that he might desire if he would only exert his skill to save the life of his son.

The traveler now felt that he was placed in a very serious position. The child was in a most dangerous condition, and while Layard knew that he was sure of the father's gratitude if he effected a cure, he was so aware that if he failed, the boy's death would be laid at his door. This time the two doctors were not allowed to interfere, and the mulla declared that the omen was favorable, but he insisted on the stranger's medicine being administered in water which had washed off from a cup a text of the Koran.

This was done, and then Layard anxiously watched the effect of the dose which he had given the lad. At midnight the fever ended in the treatment, and on the following day the child was much better. His recovery was rapid, and as a consequence the attitude of the chief and his wife knew no bounds. After that they assigned him a room in the inner court of the castle, and he ate and drank as a member of the family. The chief gave him a horse, and the woman gave him some new clothing, of which he was in great need.

GIVING UP SELF.

If grace comes into a Christian and begins to work in his heart and the seed of life is planted amidst the mass of surrounding corruption, how the Christian strives and fights and prays and wrestles to conquer, but in vain! It is self that is the only cause of his failure. He tries to pluck a fruit here and a bud there; he cuts off a branch after another of this terrible foe of love. He vows and strives and perhaps grows a little in love, yet at the bottom is not got rest, and why? There is that something there that will not love. Oh! say God discover to us that terrible something! Self! self! self! We shall then understand that nothing less than death, the path to self, is what must come, if the love of God is to live in us. Thus to come to God, in the confession that there is that in us which must die, and which we cannot live, is the first step we have to take.

There is a great difference between surrendering yourselves or surrendering yourself, as we use the word self; giving up your whole self as you are; that root out of which all the evil comes. Many a man says, "Oh! yes, I want to give myself up to God, just as I am, that he may save me," and he has never yet understood what the self is that has to be given up, and what the meaning is of giving it up to God. But God teaches the upright; he teaches him through deep humiliation, and then a man finds out "I did indeed turn to God, and yet I never turned away from myself. I took myself with my old will and temper, as I was, and gave myself to God; but that was not what God wanted. God wanted me to turn away from self." That is the surrender we must ask God to teach us—to give up that accursed self. Dear friends, do you want to realize perfect love to God in this world? Does that self-will hinder? You must find out some way of dealing with that self, and you cannot deal with it yourself. It is only the love of God coming in that will cast out self; and before God will do that, self must be brought like a criminal, must be laid at his feet.

We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

SAPOLIO

Called to His Reward.

Dr. W. J. Hall's Labors as a Medical Missionary in Korea Closed by a Summons from His Lord.

OUR readers will regret to hear of the death of Dr. W. J. Hall, the consecrated medical missionary, whose heroism and devotion on the battle-fields of Korea were described in this journal on November 28. A brief cable dispatch from Seoul, the capital of Korea, on Dec. 4 announces his death from typhus fever. Further particulars will doubtless be received by mail, but it is not difficult to surmise what they will be. The young physician was in earnest in his work. The cable dispatches from Korea describe him as one of the first white men on the field of Pyong Yang after the battle. We can imagine how he would labor day and night among the wounded and the dying, doing his utmost to save life, and telling the way of salvation to poor benighted souls. Neither among the Koreans nor the Chinese is there any knowledge of surgery, so that it would depend on Dr. Hall and his colleagues whether thousands of wounded men died of their wounds or recovered. As he realized that fact, he would forget himself and care nothing for his own weariness and fatigue, until at last, his frame weakened and his nervous strength impaired, the fatal miasma would find in him an easy victim. Dr. Hall had the martyr spirit, and we have no doubt he died the martyr's death, making his life a sacrifice for others. Dr. Hall was a man of a most lovable disposition. He was often in the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD while he was laboring among the sick and the poor of New York, before he went to Korea. After completing his studies under Dr. Dowkontt and receiving his physician's diploma, he went to the poorest district on the east side of the city, where he used to preach in a little mission church on Sundays and week evenings. In the earlier hours of the day he was to be found in one of the dispensaries that he had opened, prescribing for all comers, or in some of the close tenement houses, beside the bed of some afflicted person, ministering to body and soul. Many a sad and sorrowful story would he tell in those days of poverty and suffering, and one could see how his sympathetic heart had gone out to the miserable people among whom he lived. He could not have torn himself away from that work, if he had not been assured that it would be easier to fill his place there than to find a man for the outpost of danger and difficulty in Korea. It is three years since he went out, and he has corresponded regularly with us during that time. His letters, many of which have been published in this journal, breathed the true missionary spirit. They said little of his hardships, which were severe, but they said much of faith and hope. In one of the later ones, in which he acknowledged the receipt of money contributed by some of our readers, he said he was elaborating a scheme to build a hospital in Korea, which he proposed to name "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Hospital," and to ask our readers to take an interest in it. But God had other plans for him. We cannot understand why so useful a life should end so soon; we can but acquiesce, assured that what he does is right. Dr. Hall was not quite thirty-five years old, having been born Jan. 16, 1860; but he had compressed into those three years in Korea and the three previous years in New York a work greater than many men do in a long life. To him surely a glorious welcome would be accorded on the other shore, for in ministering to the souls and bodies of men he had followed closely in the footsteps of his Lord. This is the consolation of his many friends, as it must be to his bereaved widow, who is one like-minded with himself, and who is doing for Korean women, in the Woman's Hospital at Seoul, a work like that her husband did for men.

THE LATE DR. W. J. HALL.

SPEAK A WORD FOR JESUS.

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

SPEAK a word for Jesus, brother,
While the days are passing by;
Just one word—the angels list'ning,
Will record that word on high.

Tell the weary, way-worn wanderer,
Who a friend has seldom known,
How the Saviour pities, loves him,
Died to make him all His own.

Point the mourner, worn with sorrow,
To a home beyond the sky;
Where the Friend with love undying
Wipes the tears from every eye.

Guard with tenderest care the darlings
God may place within thy care;
Tell them God loves little children,
Teach them loving faith and prayer.

Seek to raise earth's fallen children,
Such the Saviour came to bless;
He can change the vilest raiment
To a robe of righteousness.

Scatter all along life's pathway
Seeds of kindness, deeds of love;
Live for God, and reap the harvest
In the heavenly fields above.

GENNESARET.

H anxious souls and full of fear
Why are ye vainly toiling here?
Hand of man this night can steer
Across the lake Gennesaret.
Have ye ventured on the wave,
Hear the wind and waters rave,
None can say ye are not brave,
In deep is lake Gennesaret!
Gathering clouds more darkly low'r,
D shriller is the tempest's roar,
D weary ye, and weak each oar
Cope with lake Gennesaret.
Are bitter now the fierce turmoil,
Are angry waters seethe and boil
D mutter threats and mock your toil
On the lake Gennesaret.
Look to heaven, the lightnings glare
D deafening thunders mock you there;
Our hearts seem pulseless with despair,
Death hides in lake Gennesaret.
Think, 'twas Jesus bid you go!
Never will desert you so—
Hold he cometh now and, lo,
Walks on lake Gennesaret.
Speaks and soon the tempest shrill
Hushed, the waves sink at his will,
At ye, "why are ye fearful" still N, rescued on Gennesaret?
Have ye forgotten, every one,
The wondrous works that he has done?
Do ye not know he is the Son
Him who made Gennesaret?
We to-day, on sea and land,
Exclaiming toil nor understand
The voice divine that close at hand
Calming our Gennesaret. —JEAN BROADIE

RECLAIMING NEGRO CHILDREN.

AN excellent work is being carried on in Charleston, S. C., by Rev. D. J. Jenkins, among the neglected negro children of the city and surrounding districts. Two years ago, Mr. Jenkins, who is himself a colored man, secured the privilege of using an old barn on the outskirts of the city and into this somewhat dilapidated structure he gathered some fifty or sixty haled and poorly clad little ebony-skinned ills, whom he had picked up in the streets of the city, and most of whom were no less orphans. There he fed and sheltered them as best he could, and through the sympathy of a number of kind-hearted citizens, was enabled to support them until a better shelter could be afforded. After two years of devoted labor in the interest of these waifs, their protector now has the satisfaction of seeing them housed in a substantial brick orphanage, which, though simple in its interior appointments, is a veritable paradise to the little ones, who have been accustomed to the hard life of the streets. In this building, which was formerly used as a hospital, the warm-hearted preacher has assembled a family that now numbers nearly five hundred. He has divided the building into school-rooms and a score or more classes of pickaninnies squatting on benches and boards, are now striving to master the intricacies of the spelling-book and the meaning of the Christian catechism. There are eight women teachers, all colored, and the order, decorum and attention to studies that mark the school sessions would do credit to any white educational establishment. The majority of the children are wretchedly clad, but few are dirty or unkempt. There is hardly any furniture, and desks are a luxury yet to be considered in the far future; but the founder who has the warmest sympathy and approval of the people of Charleston is energetically working to make the orphanage more comfortable and homelike. A philanthropic gentleman connected with the Greenwood Baptist Church, of Brooklyn, N. Y., has presented to the orphanage one hundred acres of land, and Dr. Jenkins proposes to convert the gift into a training-school and farm. His work thus far has been one of faith, and he believes the Christian people of his own city and of the country will not permit the orphanage to suffer for lack of support.

Lifting Up the Fallen.

The Day-Star Home and its Excellent
Missionary Work Among Unfortunate
Girls—Many Led to Christ.

SOMETHING over a year has passed since the Day-Star Industrial Home, a refuge for Homeless and Fallen Girls, was opened by "Sister Charlotte," at No. 214 W. Twenty-fourth Street, New York. Its work among the unfortunates during that time has been a most remarkable one and through the efforts of its missionaries a number of girls have been persuaded to abandon a career of sin and enter on the Christian life. Sister Charlotte (Mrs. E. G. Draper), relates some striking incidents of the work which will be full of interest to many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who were instrumental in helping to establish the Home.

"Our plans have considerably changed since we first started," she explained. "We determined at first to help only middle-aged women, but we found, as the months went by, that we had just to help those who needed help. No one who was willing to work and make an effort to lead a better life was refused admission.

"One woman of twenty-two came late one wet, cold night in December last. She had a sad face and a sadder story. Her husband had deserted her. The day previous she had come in from the country, and was left penniless in the great city. She did not know where to go. Home after Home refused to take her because she was not a fallen woman. We took her in, and speedily obtained a situation for her. Some few weeks after she paid us a visit. It had been a year of many sorrows for this girl; her children had been taken from her, but each trial had drawn her closer to the Savior, and to-day she is at my right hand, as the Matron of this Home, having given her life to this work.

"Another case was that of a young woman sent to me by a city pastor. She had started life with good prospects, good friends and good education, but had been deceived and led astray. The life that she was leading was a bondage to her and she despised herself every day, but saw no way of escape until she heard the invitation to those wishing to leave lives of sin to come to Christ. She was sent to us and in a few days went out to work at general housework. Her whole heart seemed to be in missionary work and so I got her to visit the hospitals with me. After a short time she joined the Twenty-fourth Street Methodist Church, and, as she was fully determined to give her life to this work, I recommended her to take a training course and some friends have been able to get her admitted into Mr. Moody's school at Northfield.

"Another girl had been brought up in her youth to work, but had for several years lived a vicious life in this city. We sent her to work with some friends of mine and she has been with them now over six months. They say they never had a more faithful servant.

"Still another girl was a very little body, far too small and weak to ever earn her living by hard work. She had a fair education, so we concluded that we would have her taught typewriting and stenography. A good clergyman offered to pay for her tuition and a teacher was obtained. She was very persevering and in a short time became an excellent typewriter. She is now in a good position and doing well in every way.

"Last January there came to us a young girl with terrible sorrow written upon her face. She told me of her childhood in a comfortable home; how she had been a member of the church and a sister in the home; of her father and mother's death, and then how she and her sister came to the city to fight the battle of life. She had been deceived—had made this one mistake, but, unlike many girls, she was not willing to go from bad to worse. They took rooms, bought sewing machines, and took in work, making jumpers, overalls, &c. Her baby was born, her sister became very sick, and work fell off, and for three months these poor girls lived on thirty cents a day and paid their rent. For two months they lived on rice and milk. At the end of that time her sister's mind gave way, and she had to be removed to an asylum; the baby was put in one of the city institutions, and the mother came to us, broken in spirit and in health. She stayed for a while in the Home, when I obtained a position for her. There she worked until the people went into the country, and gave entire satisfaction. Her little child soon after died. She is a thoroughly Christian girl, and has given her heart to the Saviour."

During the year 285 girls have been helped to a greater or less extent by the Day-Star Home. It costs about $350 a month to carry on the work. Two hundred and thirty-five have been sent out to situations. It is the desire of the managers that each woman leaving this Home should do so fully trusting in the Saviour, and with a way provided for her to earn an honest living. All the needs of the Home in the past have been provided by voluntary contribution, and its conductors trust to the same means for the future, believing that the spiritual results already obtained will commend the Day-Star Mission to Christian people generally.

THY DEAR DISCIPLE.

THY dear disciple leaned once long ago
Upon thy breast,
And mine the hope that one day I shall know
As perfect rest.
Yet not such joy I ask—for me too high
Repose so sweet—
I only crave the grace, dear Lord, to lie
Low at thy feet.
His still, the place upon thy bosom be:
Yet mine the place
Whence, looking up, my ravished eyes shall see Always thy face.

MISSIONARIES SAFE IN JAPAN.

A letter from Hiroshima, the present seat of the Japanese government, Rev. J. W. Doughty, an American missionary, gives this picture of the excitement now prevailing there in consequence of the war with China: "The soldiers who leave Japan come here to Hiroshima, and are sent from here by ship to the seat of the actual conflict. Two my corps have already gone to Korea, and a third is now in town and is quartered largely on the people. The government pays well for everything, however, and the people are suffering only the inconvenience connected with the matter. The city is a sight to behold these days with its multitude of flags, its busy people hurrying to and fro and the crowds of soldiers who meet at every turn. They are all well and good-natured, however. I have never heard of them a good deal, and have never seen one show any rudeness. They are all obedient under a strict discipline. Their evolutions are beautifully done and they make a most accurate and thorough soldier. As to ourselves, please feel no anxiety, as I think we are safe here as anywhere. This city has been placed under military law by proclamation of the Emperor, being considered within the field of operations, but that has in no way interfered with us as yet, and we move about as freely as ever. One of these stopped Mrs. Bryan the other day, but as soon as she told him that she was Bryan San from Kokutajinura, he had more to say, so I judge the guards have been ordered not to interfere with us. Any foreigner so far can move about, if he has a passport, the only difference being that they are much more careful to know where he is. We have lost two helpers who have been required to join the army—they were members of the Reserves. Besides these many Christians have gone into the army for the same reason, while those that remain on the grounds are very much occupied with duties devolving on them on account of the war. Our church here is occupied as a hospital, and will be so occupied probably throughout the war. This in spite of the fact that they are building two other immense hospitals—one just back of our compound—large enough to accommodate two thousand each. The Christians generally, the pastors and the helpers here have soldiered at their houses a good part of the time."

THE STOLEN COAT.

The spirit which Christ rebuked in his parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18: 3-5) still survives. There are even now among us people so tenacious of their right and so exasperated when they are wronged, that they pursue the wrong-doer with a ferocity almost brutal, unmindful of their own need of the forbearance of their fellow-men, and their need of mercy at God's hand. Sometimes, too, in their haste to avenge themselves, they do injustice to innocent people. A case in point is related by a correspondent of an English journal:

A man was very ill, dying, they said; but he did not die, for a poor woman did her best, and nursed him back to life. The man was not poor, but he was without God. His heart was very small, and perhaps it may have been hard. He gave nothing to the one who had nursed him, and, being very poor—it was winter—took in old coat she found in a cupboard, and, being fearful of discovery, hid herself from the man whose life she had saved, and from whom she had stolen the coat.

One night—it was still winter—it came to her that she was dying. She put a little candle in her window, and then lay down in a corner on the old coat. She said to herself, "Perhaps one going by the window will notice me through that light, and I shall not die quite alone."

She did not notice her. He entered and found her very near death, so near that she was deaf to his words of hope, but not so near that she was past feeling. He stayed with her through the night, and as the grey morning dawned the black shadows gathered about the dying woman. She touched the coat, and put the watchmaker's hand upon it. "Yours!" she said, and died.

She was buried, and the coat came into the hands of the man who had comforted her last hours with his presence. He worked among the poor, and he gave the coat to his wife to clean and to repair. "For," said he, "it will take the place of the coat I gave to poor Peter last week. I miss it these cold nights." The woman ripped it to pieces, and as she did so there fell from out the breast padding six bank notes for fifty pounds apiece. "There are three hundred pounds ($1500) here," said her husband when she showed them to him. "I must find the owner." They were very poor, and there was no clue, but the man hunted everywhere to find the owner of the notes. He told the story of the coat to everyone he met. One day he came home and told his wife he felt ill. He had caught cold, and he felt full of pain and fever. As he grew worse he said to his wife, "If this is good-bye, dear, you must put all your trust in God. He has been very good to me. I wish I could have found the owner of the bank notes; but he will turn up."

He did. The next day he said he had called for a coat, and the money which he had placed in its lining; and having satisfied the poor woman and her dying husband that he was really the rightful owner, he went to the door and called a man in. "Take this person into custody," said he, "for unlawful possession. This kind of thing must be stopped."

"I think it is stopped already," said the policeman. And it was. A beautiful smile was on the face of the dying city missionary, who "was not, for God took him."

WHY SHOULD I MOURN.

WHY should I mourn the dread decree,
That mortal dust ere long should be
To kindred dust consigned?
Why should I dread that peaceful rest,
Where pains and griefs no more molest,
Or fears distract the mind?
A captive exile here I roam,
Far from my Father's happy home,
Where heavenly spirits dwell;
Where streams of pleasure ever flow,
And bliss alone that saints can know,
Or tongues of seraphs tell.
Teach me, O Lord, whilst here I stay,
To keep in view that awful day,
Which sets my Spirit free;
So may I number all my days,
Apply my heart to wisdom's ways,
And ever live to Thee.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Benlah Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

RIVAL CHAMPIONS.

WIDESPREAD interest was aroused in India recently by a debate at Amritsar between Abdullah Athim, a Christian native and Mirza Ghulam Ahmed, a Mohammedan priest. The debate lasted fifteen days and at its close both sides claimed the victory. The fact, however, that the Mirza became violently angry and uttered a bitter denunciation of his Christian opponent appears to indicate that the Mirza was defeated. Usually it is not the conqueror who devotes himself to malediction. The Mirza went so far as to predict that Athim would die within fifteen months and subsequently he included in the curse H. Martyn Clark, M.D., of the Church Missionary Society. Dr. Clark says that it is impossible for those who live in the homeland to form any adequate conception of the impression produced upon the superstitious people by the solemn denunciations uttered by the Mirza connected with the announcement of the impending doom of his Christian opponents. He made the appeal to heaven: "Yea, God himself shall decide this controversy." The matter became a theme of conversation among the people. In the Mirza's mosque, prayer was offered all day long and far into the night, with crying and tears. "O God, save Islam. It is the hour of darkness. Let not thy faith be put to shame; let the sign [the death of the two Christians] be given!" But results have followed, which are most striking; namely, the conversion to Christianity of several of those who were, at the first, bold supporters of Mirza. Among these was a prominent Mohammedan gentleman of education, and another, the Mirza's own brother-in-law. A fine young Afghan, who had been a devoted Mohammedan, when in the midst of conversation he was told that it was the teaching of our Saviour to "Love your enemies," exclaimed, "Stop! This faith is certainly from God. Our religion teaches us to give hate for hate and blow for blow; and that is just what is in the heart of man, and the religion which teaches it is clearly evolved by man. But 'love your enemies' is a thing that never could enter the heart of man, and the religion which teaches that is clearly not of man, but from outside man. It is divine." Dr. Clark says that the situation has its anxieties. There was the possibility of the Mohammedans taking measure to make the prophecy come true. Mr. Athim, against whom death was denounced, was old and feeble and the prophecy of Mirza covered two sickly seasons in India. Moreover it was said among the Mohammedans: "It is better that one man should be hanged than that Islam should perish." The Mirza had added that to his earlier "revelation" that Mr. Athim should die from a snakebite, and a few days afterward an earthen pot was found deposited at the door of a gentleman who bore the same name as Mr. Athim containing a very lively cobra.

Would Rather Die Than Starve.

Terrible Suffering and Privation in the Drought stricken Districts of Nebraska and Kansas—Praying for Death to Avoid the Horrors of Starvation—Volunteers Ready to Distribute Relief Contributions—Appeals Through "The Christian Herald."

EACH day adds to the story of suffering and distress, details of which come to us, by every mail, from Kansas and Nebraska. It is the sad story of an affliction, unforeseen and almost unprecedented in our own land; such a recital as may have heard formerly, of events opening far beyond our borders, yet in the reach of our sympathy. But the burden of woe lies at our very doors; it is our own brothers and sister who are suffering, because, for two years, the fruits supplies to the points of distribution. A generous effort now may be the means not only of bringing a gleam of comfort into some poor, cold and desolate prairie home, but even of saving precious human lives. It is impossible to imagine anything more pathetic, yet patient and trustful, than the experiences of suffering and privation revealed in the letters received at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices during the week. Everything indicates a condition verging on absolute famine in many counties of both States mentioned; yet amid all, there is an air of quiet confidence in an overruling Providence, and a supreme conviction willing response from all who take pleasure in Christian work, and especially in the exercise of that divine charity and love which every follower of the Master holds as one of his dearest and most precious privileges.

Briefly told, the story of the letters is that in a score or more counties in Nebraska and almost as many in Kansas, besides certain sections of Texas, Colorado, and Oklahoma, the double failure of crops has brought thousands of families to the verge of starvation. No taxes have been collected, consequently the county boards are unable to and promptly forwarded to those distributors in whose districts it is most needed. We are in direct communication with over one hundred distributors, and, knowing the special needs of their respective district, through their letters, can thus apply the funds impartially, and with the best results.

We give below some of the latest letters received from districts where the need of help is most imperative:

A Battle for life.

Mrs. M. E. Howard, Palisade, Neb., writes: "Some families are needing almost everything, while others only need clothing and feed to keep a few stock alive, to be able to put in a crop the coming season. Unless something is done, people and stock will not survive the winter. The greatest need is among the farming class, as nearly every farmer has denied himself and family to try to take at least a team and cow or two through the winter."

Mr. C. L. Karnes, Anselmo, Neb., writes: "I cannot see how the majority of the people of this neighborhood are to get through this winter, with starvation staring them in the face. This is to be their fate unless there is aid sent from some source."

Mr. J. W. Book, Shelton, Neb., writes: "Our District is in need of some aid, as we had no crops this year and but a very small one last year. It is very humiliating to ask aid; it is the first time this section of country has been compelled to do anything of the kind. Clothing is a secondary matter; the destitute are in need of provisions and fuel; but some clothing can be used and do a great deal of good."

"Our people are in need of almost everything," writes Mr. S. L. Burson, President of the Bank of Maywood, Neb., "having lost the two last crops entire."

Mr. B. Price, Holdrege, Neb., writes: "A great many families west of us are destitute. We may be able to secure free transportation over the railroads leading this way by applying to Rev. L. P. Ludden, Secretary of the State Aid and Benevolent Society. If any of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD desire to contribute anything to those who evidently must suffer tion that He will so touch the hearts of His people that they will come to the rescue, as to a glad service. The thousands of suffering ones, old and young, are looking eastward for help. Their prayerful expectation should meet with a generous and

Round-the-World Sermons, by Rev. Dr. Talmage. "THE FIRE WORSHIPPERS."

Text: Matt. 2: 1: "There came wise men from the East to Jerusalem."

THESE wise men were the Parsees, or the so-called Fire-worshippers, and I found their descendants in India last October. Their heathenism is more tolerable than any of the other false religions, and has more alleviations, and while in this "Round-the-World" series I have already shown you the worst forms of heathenism, to-day I show you the least offensive.

The prophet of the Parsees was Zoroaster of Persia. He was poet, and philosopher, and reformer, as well as religionist. His disciples thrived at first in Persia, but under Mohammedan persecution they retreated to India where I met them, and in addition to what I saw of them at their head-quarters in Bombay, India, I had two weeks of association with one of the most learned and genial of their people on ship-board from Bombay to Brindisi.

The Bible of the Parsees, or fire-worshippers as they are inaccurately called, is the Zend-Avesta, a collection of the strangest books that ever came into my hands. There were originally twenty-one volumes, but Alexander the Great, in a drunken fit set fire to a palace which contained some of them, and they went into ashes and forgetfulness. But there are more of their sacred volumes left than most people would have patience to read. There are many things in the religion of the Parsees that suggest Christianity, and some of its doctrines are in accord with our own religion. Zoroaster, who lived about 1400 years before Christ, was a good man, suffered persecution for his faith, and was assassinated while worshipping at an altar. He announced the theory "He is best who is pure of heart!" and that there are two great spirits in the world, Ormuzd, the good Spirit, and Ahriman the bad Spirit, and that all who do right are under the influence of Ormuzd, and all who do wrong are under Ahriman: that the Parsee must be born on the ground floor of the house, and must be buried from the ground floor; that the dying man must have prayers said over him and a sacred juice given him to drink; that the good at their decease go into eternal light, and the bad into eternal darkness; that having passed out of this life the soul lingers near the corpse three days in a Paradisaic state, enjoying more than all the nations of earth put together could enjoy or in a Pandemoniac state suffering more than all the nations put together could possibly suffer, but at the end of three days departing for its final destiny; and that there will be a resurrection of the body. They are more careful than any other people about their ablutions, and they wash and wash and wash. They pay great attention to physical health and it is a rare thing to see a sick Parsee. They do not smoke tobacco for they consider that a misuse of fire. At the close of mortal life the soul appears at the Bridge Chinvat where an angel presides, and questions the soul about the thoughts, and words, and deeds of its earthly state. Nothing, however, is more intense in the Parsee faith than the theory that the dead body is impure. A devil is supposed to take possession of the dead body. All who touch it are unclean and hence the strange style of obsequies. But here I must give three or four questions and answers from one of the Parsee catechisms:

Question.—Who is the most fortunate man in the world?

Answer.—He who is the most innocent.

Question.—Who is the most innocent man in the world?

Answer.—He who walks in the path of God and shuns that of the devil.

Question.—Which is the path of God, and which that of the devil?

Answer.—Virtue is the path of God, and vice that of the devil.

A PARSEE "TOWER OF SILENCE"

Question.—What constitutes virtue, and what vice?

Answer. Good thoughts, good words, and good deeds constitute virtue, and evil thoughts, evil words, and evil deeds constitute vice.

Question.—What constitute good thoughts, good words, and good deeds, and evil thoughts, evil words, and evil deeds?

Answer.—Honesty, charity, and truthfulness constitute the former; and dishonesty, want of charity, and falsehood constitute the latter.

And now the better to show you these Parsees, I tell you of two things I saw within a short time in Bombay, India. It was an afternoon of contrast.

We started for Malabar Hill, on which the wealthy classes have their embowered homes, and the Parsees their strange Temple of the Dead. As we rode along the water's edge the sun was descending the sky, and a disciple of Zoroaster, a Parsee, was in lowly posture and with reverential gaze looking into the sky. He would have been said to have been worshipping the sun, as all Parsees are said to worship the fire. But the intelligent Parsee does not worship the fire. He looks upon the sun as the emblem of the warmth and light of the Creator. Looking at a blaze of light, whether on hearth, on mountain height, or in the sky, he can more easily bring to mind the glory of God; at least, so the Parsees tell me. Indeed, they are the pleasantest heathens I have met. They treat their wives as equals, while the Hindoos and Buddhists treat them as cattle; although the cattle, and sheep, and swine are better off than most of the women of India.

This Parsee on the roadside on our way to Malabar Hill was the only one of that religion I had ever seen engaged in worship. Who knows but that beyond the light of the sun on which he gazes he may catch a glimpse of the God who is Light, and "in whom there is no darkness at all?"

We passed on up through gates into the garden that surrounds the place where the Parsees dispose of their dead. This garden was given by Jamshidji Jijibhai, and is beautiful with flowers of all hue, and foliage of all styles of vein, and notch and stature. There is on all sides great opulence of fern and cypress. The garden is one hundred feet above the level of the sea. Not far from the entrance is a building where the mourners of the funeral procession go in to pray. A light is here kept burning year in and year out. We ascend the garden by some eight stone steps. The body of a deceased aged woman was being carried in toward the chief "Tower of Silence." There are five of these towers. Several of them have not been used for a long while. Four persons, whose business it is to do this, carry in the corpse. They are followed by two men with long beards. The Tower of Silence, to which they come, cost $150,000, and is twenty-five feet high, and 276 feet around, and without a roof. The four carriers of the dead and the two bearded men come to the door of the

We reverence the fire, and therefore will not ask it to burn our dead. We reverence the water, and do not ask it to submerge our dead. We reverence the earth, and will not ask it to bury our dead. And so let the vultures take them away." He confirmed me in the theory that the Parsees act on the principle that the dead are unclean. No one must touch such a body. The carriers of this "Tower of Silence" must not put their hands on the form of the departed. They wear gloves lest somehow they should be contaminated. When the bones are to be removed from the sides of the tower and put in the well at the center they are touched carefully by tongs. These people beside have very decided theories about the democracy of the tomb, such things as caste among the dead. Philosopher and boor, the affluent and the destitute must go through the same "Tower of Silence," lie down side by side with occupants, have their bodies dropped into the same abyss, and be carried out through the same canal and float away on the same sea. No splendor of Necropolis, no sculpturing of mausoleum. No pyramid, dome or obelisk. Zoroaster's teaching resulted in these "Towers of Silence." He wrote: "Naked you came into the world, and naked you must go out."

As I stood at the close of day in this garden on Malabar Hill and heard the flap of the vultures' wings coming from their past, the funeral custom of the Parsees seemed horrible beyond compare, and yet the dissolution of the human body by any means is awful, and the beaks of the fowl are probably no more repulsive than the worms of the body devouring the sacred human form in cemeteries. Nothing but the resurrection day can undo the awful work of death, whether it now be put off or sight by cutting spade or flying wing.

Starting homeward, we were in the heart of the city, and saw a building all aflame with lights and resounding with merry voices. It was a Parsee wedding, in a building erected especially for the marriage ceremony. We came to the door and proposed to go in, but first were not permitted. I saw we were not Parsees, and that we were not even natives.

Tower, enter and leave the dead. There are three rows of places for the dead: the outer row for the men; the middle row for the women; the inside row for the children. The lifeless bodies are left exposed as far down as the waist. As soon as the employees retire from the Tower of Silence, the vultures, now one, now two, now many, swoop upon the lifeless form. These vultures fill the air with their discordant voices. We saw them in long rows on the top of the white washed wall of the Tower of Silence. In a few minutes they have taken the last particle of flesh from the bones. There had evidently been other opportunities for them that day, and some flew away as though surfeited. They sometimes carry away with them parts of a body, and it is no unusual thing for the gentlemen in their country-seats to have dropped into their dooryards a bone from the Tower of Silence.

In the centre of this tower is a well, into which the bones are thrown after they are bleached. The hot sun, and the rainy season, and charcoal do their work of disintegration and disinfection, and then there are sluices that carry into the sea what remains of the dead. The wealthy people of Malabar Hill have made strenuous efforts to have these strange towers removed as a nuisance, but they remain, and will no doubt for ages remain.

I talked with a learned Parsee about these mortuary customs. He said, "I suppose you consider them very peculiar, but the fact is we Parsees reverence the elements of nature, and cannot consent to defile them.

So very politely they halted us on the steps. This temple of nuptials was chiefly occupied by women, their ears, and noses, and hands a-flame with jewels, or imitations of jewels. By pantomime and gesture, as we had no use of their vocabulary, we told them we were strangers and were anxious to see by what process Parsees were married. Gradually we worked our way inside the door. The building and the surroundings were illumined by hundreds of candles in glasses and lanterns, in queer and grotesque holdings. Conversation was high, and laughter bubbled over, and all was gay. Then there was a sound of an advancing band of music, but the instruments for the most part were strange to our ears and eyes. Louder and louder were the outside voices, and the wind and strident instruments, until the procession halted at the door of the temple and the bridegroom mounted the steps. Then the music ceased, and all the voices were still. The music of the bridegroom, with a platter loaded with aromatics and articles of food, confronted her son and began to address him. Then she took from the platter a bottle of perfume and sprinkled his face with the odour. All the while speaking in a droning tone, she took from the platter a hand of rice, throwing some of it on his head, and some of it on his shoulder, pouring the rest of it on his hands. She took from the platter a coconut and waved it about his head. She lifted a garland of flowers and thrust it over his neck, and a bouquet of flowers and put it in his hand. Her part of the ceremony completed, the band resumed its music and through another door the bridegroom was conducted into the centre of the building. The bride was in the room, but there was no designate her. "Where is the bride?" "Where is the bride?" After a while she was made evident. The bride and groom were seated on chairs opposite each other. A white curtain was dropped between them so that they could not see each other. Then the attendants put their arms under this curtain, took a long rope of linen and wound it around the neck of the bride and groom, in token that they were to be bound together for life. Then some silk ribbons were wound around the couple, now around this one, and now around that. The groom threw a handful of rice across the curtain on the head of the bride, and the bride responded by throwing a handful of rice across the curtain on the head of the groom. Thereupon the curtain was raised and the bride's chair was removed out beside that of the groom. Then a Parsee religion arose and faced the couple. Before the priest was placed a platter of rice. He began to address the young man and woman. We could not hear a word, but we understood just as well as we had heard. Ever and anon he punctuated his ceremony by a handful of rice, which he picked up from the platter and now toward the groom and now toward the bride. The ceremony went on interminably. We wanted to hear the conclusion, but were told that the ceremony would go on for a long while; indeed, that it would not conclude until two o'clock in the morning, and this was only between seven and eight o'clock in the evening. This would be a recess after awhile in the ceremony, but it would be taken up again in a moment at half-past twelve. We enjoyed what we had seen, but felt incapacitated for more hours of wedding ceremony. Silently wishing the couple a happy life in each other's companionship, we pressed our way through the throng of congratulatory Parsees. All of them seemed bright and appreciative of the occasion. The streets outside sympathized with the transactions inside.

We rode on toward our hotel wishing that marriage in all India might be as much honored as in the ceremony we had that evening witnessed at the Parsee wedding. The Hindoo women are not so married. They are simply cursed into the conjugal relation. Many of the girls are married at seven and ten years of age, and some of them are grandmothers at thirty. They can never go forth into the sunlight with their faces uncovered. They must stay at home. All styles of maltreatment are theirs. If they become Christians they become outcasts. A missionary told me in India of a Hindoo woman who became a Christian. She had nine children. Her husband was over seventy years of age. And yet at her Christian baptism he told her to go, and she went out, homeless. As long as woman is in India will be down. No nation ever elevated except through the elevation of woman. Parsee marriage is an improvement on Hindoo marriage; but Christian marriage is an improvement on Parsee marriage.

A fellow-traveller in India told me he had been writing to his home in England trying to get a law passed that no white woman could be legally married in India, until she had been there six months. Admirable! He would that be! If a white woman saw a married life with a Hindoo is she would never undertake it. Off with the thick and ugly veil from woman's face! Cut with the crushing burdens from her shoulders! Nothing but the Gospel of Jesus Christ will ever make life in India what it ought to be.

What an afternoon of contrast in Bombay we experienced! From the Temple of Silence to the Temple of Hilarity! From the vultures to the doves! From turning to laughter! From gathering shadows to gleaming lights! From obscurity to wedding! But how much of all this lives is made up of such opposites. I have carried in the same pocket, and read from them in the same hour, the liturgy of the dead and the ceremony of espousals. And so the tear meets the smile, and the dove meets the vulture.

Thus I have set before you the best of all the religions of the heathen world, and I have done so in order that you might come to higher appreciation of the glorious religion which has put its benediction over us and over Christendom.

Compare the absurdities and mummeries of heathen marriage with the plain, "I will," of Christian marriage, the hands joined in pledge "till death do you part." Compare the doctrine that the dead may not be touched, with as sacred, and tender, and loving a kiss as is ever given, the last kiss of lips that never again will speak to us. Compare the narrow Bridge Chinvat over which the departing Parsee soul must tremblingly cross, to the wide open gate of heaven through which the departing Christian soul may triumphantly enter. Compare the twenty-one books of the Zend-Avesta of the Parsee which even the scholars of the earth despair of understanding, with our Bible, so much of it as is necessary for our salvation in language so plain that "a wayfaring man, though a fool need not err therein." Compare the "Tower of Silence" with its vultures at Bombay with the "Greenwood of Brooklyn" with its sculptured angels of resurrection. And bow yourselves in thanksgiving and prayer as you realize that if at the battles of Marathon and Salamis, Persia had triumphed panion, and whom he regarded with friendship. The man just stood by, looking at him as he hammered away.

Now, nobody likes to be silently gazed upon. It becomes uncomfortable; and the blacksmith soon became restless. "Well," he said, "what are you looking at? What do you want?" "Ah," was the reply, "I was looking at you because I love you, and I would like to do something to save your soul." At once down went the hammer, the furnace was left alone; and the smith went into his house, soon to return dressed. Then he said to his friend, "Lead me to the house of God;" and that day his soul was saved. There is a way into the hardest heart. It may seem impregnable, but it has its weak point; or, perhaps, by touching some secret spring, the heart's door will fly open, and leave an entrance for God."

A DAY WITH A DEACONESS.

IN and out among the narrow streets of one of the poorest quarters of London two women went one morning in the first week of December. One of the women was a deaconess connected with Mildmay Park, the other was a friend who wanted to see how the poor live. This is the latter's story of what she saw and heard as she told it in the London "Christian":

"A clean, tidy, happy-looking little woman whom we visit (in her seventy-eighth year) has supported herself entirely since her husband's death, some years now, by selling toys in the street. If the weather is wet she cannot sell her goods—there are no purchasers for such things as hers. On one such day quite recently, when she had spent her last penny, not being able to go out to sell her goods, she had not a coin in the world where-with to buy food for that day."

She said to a woman, who is also a Christian, and whose room is near hers, "I've got a little tea for to-day, and that is all." The other said, "I haven't any tea, but I have a few cold potatoes." So these two sisters in adversity shared their tea and potatoes, and were content and thankful to Him. "who," she says, "has fed me all these years;" sometimes it is only dry bread, but she adds, "when I have paid the rent of my little room [a rear room under the roof] and have paid for my toys, I am happy and thankful." After leaving the happy old woman we visited another with a sick baby. "Oh, she's very ill, Miss; the doctor says I ought to be thankful it didn't kill her, taking her out," and the mother's eyes filled with tears as she looked down at the little wan face of the two-year-old baby in her lap. "Acute bronchitis and pneumonia," he says, "but I hadn't the money to pay him for coming to see her, and so I wrapped her up and brought her to the surgery." This is the youngest of seven children, the eldest of whom is not yet thirteen. The father suffers much from asthma, and is scarcely able to earn sufficient for the rent. The mother works hard at washing and odd bits of work, though often ill herself, in order to provide even bread for the seven hungry mouths. What wonder, then, that one after another has been ill? And the verdict at the Medical Mission has been: "Needs nourishment, not medicine." Such white faces and large eyes—"I can't get enough for them," says the mother.

She Vowed to the Lord.

How a Devout Woman Redeemed her Pledge by Building a Church to Draw Souls to Christ.

ALTHOUGH in these days of zealous evangelism, there is probably no part of the United States where the Gospel of Jesus has not been preached, either by voice or pen, there are still many settlements where church privileges are a rarity. And this is true even in some localities in the East. An instance in point is the little village of King's Park on Long Island, N. Y. For many years the only religious services in the neighborhood were held in the district school-house, when a Presbyterian clergyman from the neighboring village of Smithtown came and preached to the lonely villagers. Those who attended seemed to be like sheep without a shepherd.

This condition of affairs in King's Park was observed several years ago by an earnest Christian lady, Mrs. Caroline Platt, who took a deep interest in the spiritual welfare of the villagers. Her husband and son had both passed away a short time before, and in her great thankfulness to God for the convincing assurance she had received of their eternal welfare, she had vowed that, if spared, she would build a church to commemorate this token of divine love and mercy which she had received in answer to her prayers. Accordingly, she undertook the work with zeal and energy and soon a commodious and comfortable structure was erected, which was dedicated in June, 1893, in memory of her eldest son, Lucien. It was turned over to the Methodist Society.

Mrs. Platt's gift is a most generous one and includes the land upon which the church now stands, a site for a parsonage and a tract of land for cemetery purposes. There is already a Sunday School of fifty scholars and members are being constantly added to the church. Rev. Alonzo C. Morehouse is the present pastor of Lucien Church. He comes of pioneer stock, his grandfather, Alonzo Church, having been a commissioned officer in revolutionary days and one of the patriots who obeyed Stark's famous order, directing that the red coats must be "whipped before sundown or Mollie Stark's a widow." Dr. Morehouse has other duties, too, in addition to the little church at King's Park, for he is really the shepherd of three distinct flocks. Every Sunday morning he drives six miles to Lucien Church, preaches and assists at the Sunday School; in the afternoon he officiates in a church at "the Landing," and in the evening at still another church, in Smithtown, where he resides. His service in all three communities is a cheerful one and is rendered in the true missionary spirit.

King's Bridge and neighborhood have been greatly blessed since the opening of this little pioneer church among them, and already the consecrated gift and the efforts of the zealous workers have been rewarded by an inbringing of precious souls. The field was ripe for harvest, and when the time came, the means were not wanting, another illustration of the truth that when the Lord has a work to be done he has the workers ready.

A portrait of Mrs. Platt and an illustration showing the church founded in fulfillment of her vow are given on this page.

over Greece, instead of Greece triumphing over Persia, Parseeism, which was the national religion of Persia, might have covered the earth, and you and I instead of sitting in the noonday light of our glorious Christianity might have been groping in the depressing shadows of Parseeism, a religion as inferior to that which is our inspiration in life, and our hope in death, as Zoroaster of Persia was inferior to our radiant and superhuman Christ, to whom be honor and glory and dominion and victory and song, world without end. Amen.

CHANGED BY A KIND WORD.

Mr. Mitchell, an English evangelist, relates the following incident: "There was a very hard man in more ways than one—hard-working, heart-headed, and, alas! hard-hearted. It seemed as if no one was able to influence him. Students, ministers and professors came and spoke to him, and tried with reason and logic, and by appealing to his better nature, to bring him to Christ; but it was all of no use. His heart seemed of adamant. It could not be pierced. One Sunday, as he was at his anvil and furnace busy working away (for he disregarded God's day of rest), there came into the smithy a man who had been his com-

JOHN THE BAPTIST BEHEADED.

S. L. Lesson for Jan. 6. Mark 6: 14-29.
Golden Text Matt. 10: 28. By Mrs. Baxter.

It was no accident which brought Herod the king and John the Baptist into juxtaposition. The sin of Herod went to perfect the education of John. The faithfulness of John went to perfect the education of Herod. When first the tidings of the widespread awakening which took place under John's preaching reached the king, he determined to hear him himself. But Herod did not take in, at first, that it is impossible to hear a message from God, and take neutral ground with regard to it. He could not take the place of a critic, hearing from the outside; the message was addressed to him as well as to others. And it took effect: "He did many things (or R.V., 'was made perplexed'), and heard him gladly." He was amongst those who recognized John as "a burning and a shining light," and who were "willing for a season to rejoice in his light." (John 5: 35.) But, alas, it was "for a season" only. There came a time of crisis. John was a man sent from God" (John 1: 6), and he was as much "sent from God" to King Herod as to anyone else. He brought the king a clear, personal message, from which he could not turn aside. He must accept it or reject it. "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife." It was the messenger took his life in his hand, but "sent from God," it could not fail to be the deciding moment for king Herod's soul, and it was the first signal of coming martyrdom to the faithful prophet. The story is soon told. "Herod the tetrarch, being reproved by him for Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, and for all the evils which Herod had done, added yet this above all, that he shut up John in prison." (Luke 3: 19, 20.) "Added yet this above all." It was the crowning sin, which, so to speak, crystallized all his former life of sin into conscious, wilful rebellion against God. He might have been saved had he been willing to bear the shame of a distinct acknowledgment of his sin; had he separated from Herodias, though it might have cost him much for the time, and the humiliation might have been very galling, yet he could have glorified God and have been a free man. But he would not enter into the kingdom of heaven himself, and by imprisoning God's messenger, he hindered those that were entering in, and thus he took up arms against the God of Israel. Seeking to be free from the Baptist's condemnation, he became a closer prisoner than he: Shut up in the narrow walls of a constantly accusing conscience, he bought his fancied liberty at a terrible price. And John? He had followed his God at the cost of his liberty, but neither God nor heaven were shut out of his prison, and the very power of God with him, which stung the guilty king, sustained his prisoner in the dungeon.

A Bold Message,

Herod Still Feared John,

knowing that he was a just man and holy. John's life had left an indelible mark upon his life; but he feared still more to displease the wicked Herodias, who had gained, through the power of Satan, yielded to by the king, a great ascendancy over his mind. Thus, as the days passed by, with no apparent change, things were nevertheless ripening. Yes, Herod feared John; but having once begun to tread on a descending incline he could not stop, he must go farther. He had resisted, till now, the solicitations of Herodias who thirsted for the blood of the faithful prophet. Herod had never again been to her what he was before this man of God had reproved him for his sin; he was uneasy and preoccupied, and she wanted, she planned for the death of the man of God in the vain hope that she and the wicked king might live on undisturbed in their sin. She laid her plans deep, and made sure of victory. Watching for a convenient day, she arranged an entertainment in which her daughter should take a prominent part, and which should completely, for the time, distract the king from the gloomy thoughts which now so constantly possessed him. It was on his birthday that this entertainment should take place, and Herodias watched with eagerness for the success of her plan.

A large company was assembled, the elite of the kingdom gathered together to do honor to the king. Everything was on a grand scale, and the entertainment surpassed all anticipation. Herod was caught in the snare, and in a moment of excitement, "said to the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee. And he swore unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom." Miserable Herod! He little ble if he should break his oath, prevailed over his other fear—he gave the fatal order, and the unmaidenly maiden carried the bleeding head of the prophet to her mother.

The deed of sin was done; but the dearly bought peace was of short continuance. A conscience not at rest, sees a reference to itself in everything that happens. Such a one will think that every allusion is meant for him. He will be always on thorns, everything and every person will condemn him.

But John? Is he to be regarded simply as an instrument for Herod's greater condemnation? Far from it. John was a "burning and a shining light," and his light did not go out in his martyr-death: it goes on burning still. He had the privilege of living and dying only for him whose way he came to prepare. Filled with the Holy Ghost, he died as he had lived—in the Spirit. His ministry was a preparation for his Master's, but he knew, as none of the twelve knew while Jesus was on earth, that he was the coming Bridegroom, and he knew himself to be "the friend of the Bridegroom which standeth and heareth him."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

As no less than ten members of the house of Herod—eight men and two women—came into New Testament history, it may save confusion if they are distinguished from each other. There was, first, Herod the Great who slaughtered the infants at the birth of Christ and who rebuilt the Temple. He had successively ten wives and fifteen children. Two of his sons are danger would be increased, for in the religious fervor which John's preaching aroused, the people might feel it to be their duty to overthrow so wicked a ruler. Herod, at any rate, thought it prudent to silence him and shut him up in prison. Joseph says he was confined at Machærus, a strong fortress on the border of Arabia. Its modern name is M'khaur. The ruins of the fortress have recently been identified. The dungeons, dug deep in the earth, have been found intact. In their walls are the marks where staples were driven, to which chains that fastened the prisoners were cured. It was doubtless in one of these that John the Baptist spent the last ten months of his life. We infer from the narrative that at times he was taken out and brought before Herod, who with the singular inconsistency which is often seen in the lives of wicked men, listened to his preaching and did many things that John recommended. Herodias, however, could not forgive a preacher for denouncing her marriage; and she may have feared that, as Herod obeyed him in some things, he might eventually be led by John to separate from her. Her plot to get him out of her way. It was the plot of a shrewd woman. She calculated the effect that would be produced on the half-drunken man of a princess of the blood dancing before him. Such entertainment was usually given by common women for their work. It was a degrading thing for Salome to do, but all the more would piquancy of it please Herod. The unequalled her expectation. Herod gave loose, unlimited offer of reward to the girl, and then the mother sprung the trap. He perceived that he had been outwitted. He was in the dilemma that often comes to a man with wicked associates of being compelled to do one of two things both of which were unpalatable. He must either sacrifice the prisoner or break his oath. His choice was of perjury or murder. He chose the latter. John was killed. His disciples took the headless trunk and buried it, probably near the fortress. It was in this gloomy prison that Moses was confined and was buried. It was a singular coincidence that the graves of the first and last prophets of the dispensation should be so near together, though the actual places are unknown. Once more Herod crosses the stage of Gospel history. He was in Jerusalem when Christ was arrested, and Pilate eager to himself of responsibility, tried to have the case transferred to Herod's court (Luke 23: 7). But Herod would accept it. The evil influence of Herodias thought of the snare laid for him. Herodias understood the situation, she knew Herod, and his sudden impulses, and she calculated well that what he could refuse when asked privately he would be ashamed to refuse in the presence of his lords. "What shall I ask?" said the young girl to her mother. Herodias was already prepared. Half the kingdom, and the man of God living to reproach Herod, was, she reckoned a gift not worth having; she would have all the kingdom in peace, if only her enemy were dead. Without a moment's hesitation she said, "the head of John the Baptist."

Herod was in a Dilemma:

This was the last thing he would have expected at such a moment. But a sinner cannot play with edge tools, and escape unhurt, he had trifled with God, and with his own conscience; he had sinned against light more and more, and now he must go farther or make one desperate stand and break loose from sin once for all. "The king was exceedingly sorry," but regrets could avail nothing, he must act. His will to do right had been sinned against until it was paralyzed. He had rejected God and become a slave of men, and he could not break his chains. Sorry, ill at ease, afraid of John, and afraid of God,—yet the fear of losing ground with those who sat with him at table mentioned by Luke (3: 1). These were Antipas, whom Luke calls "Herod," and Philip. Another son, also named Philip, was disinherited by his father. He was the Philip referred to in the lesson (Mark 6: 17) as the first husband of Herodias. A fourth son was Archelaus, mentioned by Matthew (2: 22). Herod had a fifth son named Aristobulus, whom he put to death. He is not mentioned in the New Testament but two of his children appear in the record. One of these was Herodias, who is mentioned in the lesson as Herod's wife, and the other, Agrippa, who, as is stated in Acts 12: 1, killed James and imprisoned Peter. He is the Herod whose awful death is described in Acts 12: 23. It was his son Agrippa II., a great grandson of Herod the Great before whom Paul pleaded (Acts 26: 1). The Herod of the lesson is Antipas before mentioned, before whom Christ was subsequently arraigned (Luke 23: 8). Salome was the daughter of Herodias and Philip, born before her mother deserted her husband for his brother, Antipas.

Herod Antipas had probably been uneasy about John the Baptist for some time. The influence he exerted over the people was so great that Herod was aware it would be easy for John to stir up a rebellion, if he should ever feel so disposed; and, when John openly denounced him for his corrupt life, the lowered her husband afterwards. She persuaded him to go to Rome to ask Caesar to make him a king. He was only a tetrarch or governor, and the ambitious woman wanted him to be a king that she might be a queen. He went, but never returned. His application aroused the hostility of his enemies, who induced Caesar to banish him, and he and Herodias died in exile.

That thou give me . . . the head of John the Baptist. That a woman should choose such an awful reward seems incredible, yet history records an incident almost parallel. About seventy years before the tragedy of Machærus occurred, three men—Octavius, Antony and Lepidus—were closeted together in Rome. They had made a compact to govern the empire in partnership. One personal sacrifice Antony demanded and it is supposed he did so at the suggestion of his wife. He wanted the life of the great orator Cicero. Octavius was indebted to Cicero and by all the principles of honor should have protected him, but he yielded to please Antony and the edict was issued. The aged orator was found beheaded. It is recorded of Fulvia, Antony's wife, that she obtained possession of the head and, drawing out the tongue which had thrilled the city by its eloquence for more than forty years, she thrust a hair-pin through it.

ter during the winter, the same will be promptly forwarded to those that are in need of this vicinity," writes Mrs. J. E. Hartley, Bartley, Neb., "there are many in need of clothing and bedding, especially among the old soldiers, and we would be glad to distribute any clothing sent to us." Mrs. J. E. Whitesel, Keneshaw, Neb., writes: "We live in that part of Nebraska where the crops have failed for the last two years, and the people here are very much distressed."

"Send Something to Eat!" "Send clothing or something to eat," writes Z. T. French, of Creighton, Neb., "I will place it where it will do the most good." "There are many needy ones," explains Mrs. Jane L. Goff, President of the Hazard, Neb., W. C. T. U., "and our contributions you are kind enough to see will be faithfully distributed." Mrs. Allie Rubottom, of Alliance, Neb., writes: "I have been a teacher in the Sabbath School for years, and when we had crops we had a large attendance; but when winter is coming on, we do not have any, for the people cannot clothe themselves to go—many children have no clothes to go to day-school. The little ones are going barefoot, and will have to, at winter, or stay indoors."

A Veritable Famine. Mrs. W. T. Delong, Hayes Centre, Neb., writes: "Men, women and children are destitute of shoes and clothing. Many are living on bread and water. These people are why, and in no manner paupers, and in no way responsible for their condition." See in THE MAIL BAG, writes Mrs. F. H. Hurley of Bird City, Neb., "a reference to Kansas, Nebraska, and Texas. People of the East have no idea how people get along, having scarcely anything to sell off what little stock they had. I have not had the Gospel preached to this summer because we had no way of getting a preacher. Almost everything is needed, from clothing for infants up to old men's, half-worn garments, shoes, etc."

A Poor Pastor's Plea for Help. Rev. George W. Brooks, Lemley, McPherson Co., Neb., writes: "We are twenty-five miles from a railroad, North Platte being our nearest point. There are those that are needing almost everything, including clothing and bedding. Clothing and food are the present necessities; later on we will need seed for another year. The only fuel we get are chips gathered or hauled twenty-five miles away and very hard to get at that."

What will the poor souls do before winter? helplessly writes President McGlister of the Relief Corps at Berwyn, Mo. "If you can spare anything, send it quickly." Is the laconic request of Mrs. E. Austin of Burwell, Neb. "Some of our people are in dire need now."

A lady writing from Merna, Custer Co., Neb., gives this affecting picture: "They are hungry, sick, and cold; children with feet and ankles wound with rags to keep them from suffering. I hope and trust as I have in the past caused many to be fed and rejoice, you will help now."

The Suffering in Kansas. Rev. E. E. Gunkel, pastor M. E. Church, Ransom, Kan., writes: "There have been two entire failures in crops here, and if there is not aid sent, there will be still suffering. I have myself seen children going to school this fall, cold and crying, for they had not clothing to keep them warm. The people here are as good as set people as you will find anywhere, but Providence has failed to reward the sower; hence the widespread suffering."

Here is a sample case, one of thousands in Kansas and Nebraska at the present moment. Mrs. J., of Palco, Kans., writes: "We live in what is known as the burned part of Kansas—my husband, daughter fifteen, and my little boy and self. Is there not some one among your friends who would help us by sending some old clothing which I could mend and make over—especially infant or children's clothing."

Mrs. Sell, Chapman, Kan., writes: "My husband is a clergyman. In our pastoral stations we see much poverty. Many have no means move away; others can't be being too poor. Some build flats on wagons, put a cook-stove on the wagon and what they can gather up and start. Some are doing with one meal a day."

Never Saw such Scenes of Suffering.

Benjamin Knott, of Bird City, Kan., writes: "This year there was no harvest of grain in this county, and no feed for cattle, and they must perish if we get a hard winter. Hundreds of people have left the county, and of those that are left, some have means and more have nothing. I am seventy years old and never saw such a time for suffering and want."

Rev. F. S. Altman of St. Francis, Kan., writes: "I can truly say that not a bushel of any grain was raised in this (Cheyenne) county the last two years and the people in consequence are very destitute."

C. A. Yersin, County Clerk and Recorder, Burlington, Colo., writes: "I heard of a family, the other day, who have been living for sometime on wheat ground in a coffee-mill, and one of this family is a man about seventy-five years old! This old man has only an old overcoat for a bed."

A Soldier-Missionary.

Remarkable Career of Sunday School Missionary G. R. G. Fisher—His Field Lies in the Drought-Stricken District.

HERE are probably no men more accurately and thoroughly acquainted with the nature and extent of the present suffering among the agricultural population in the West than the missionaries of the American Sunday School Union. Each is responsible for a large territory frequently embracing several counties, and in his constant rounds for the purpose of organizing or strengthening churches and Sunday Schools, he comes into contact with all phases of frontier life—much of it of the most primitive sort. Mr. George R. G. Fisher, a missionary now visiting in the East, has for over six years been laboring in Minnesota in which latter State and Nebraska, and South Dakota, there are now widespread suffering.

In consequence of the loss of crops through drought in the past two seasons, Mr. Fisher states that the reports contained in letters published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are by no means exaggerated.

A Young Convert's Trials.

Mr. Fisher's life story reads almost like a romance. He was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1862, and went to London in 1876, where he became a member of the Y. M. C. Institute in Long Acre. He was converted in 1878, in Southampton, England. Among others who greatly influenced his spiritual career was Mrs. Quintin Hogg, wife of one of the great merchant princes of England, who was associated in Christian work with Lady Hope and Lady Somerset. In 1879, the young convert went to sea as apprentice on a sailing vessel, but in less than a year he abandoned the idea of a nautical profession. Shortly afterward he decided to seek his fortune in Australia and took his passage, but something occurred to delay him. That vessel was wrecked on the Goodwin Sands on the way out, and many of those on board perished. At the time young Fisher had been drifting here and there, and was in a state of rebellion. When he learned of the vessel's fate and his own providential escape, it came to him like a summons to a new life.

"Then I took my bearings," he explained in telling his story, "and made up my mind that a wandering spirit was an evil thing. I entered the British army, enlisting as a private in the Medical Department, for I had previously studied ambulance work."

After various military experiences, including some very hard trials and temptations, Fisher was sent to Egypt, the company arriving at Alexandria, immediately after the bombardment. Shortly afterward he went under fire in his first engagement. The command on Aug. 24, 1882, marched from Ismailia to Tel-el-Mahouta—believed to be the site of Pithom, the ancient Egyptian treasure city—and there fought a battle against the enemy under the notorious Arabi Pasha, who opposed a force of 24,000 to 1400 English soldiers. The English quickly took the place and dispersed the enemy.

An Infidel Awakened.

Tel-el-Mahouta is practically in the desert and soon thirst began to manifest itself in the British camp with such a degree of violence that hundreds of the men fell exhausted and had to be picked up. The command marched twelve miles back to the sweet water canal, all the men suffering intensely from heat and throwing away every incumbrance. Men's lips cracked and split open with the terrible thirst and some died on the march. On the 28th of the same month, the little army, now reinforced to 1800, again encountered the enemy under Arabi, 36,000 strong, and won a second victory. While the fighting was at its hottest, a very remarkable incident occurred. A soldier, who had openly avowed himself an infidel, lay down alongside of Fisher to avoid the bursting of a shell. It was a time fuse and might explode in an instant, dealing death around. The man regarded the shell with terror and his lips moved involuntarily in prayer:

"Oh, God!" he cried, "have mercy upon me! Have mercy upon me!" He expected the next moment to be in eternity. The explosion did not harm him, however, and he escaped unhurt from the battle: but he was a changed man and never afterward was he heard to blaspheme.

A Christian Highlander.

Mr. Fisher was also present at the battles of Kassassine and Tel-el-Kebir. Connected with the latter, Mr. Fisher relates a touching incident. A Christian Highlander who was very badly wounded and bleeding profusely, crawled up to a wounded rifleman and was speaking to him about his soul. One of the surgeons approached the Highlander, to bandage his wound, but the man would not allow him to do so.

"Na, na!" he said, gently, "Never mind me. See to him (indicating the rifleman). He's no a Christian."

The man persisted and the surgeon gave way. When the latter, having attended to the rifleman, turned to the Highlander again, the hue of death was on his face.

"Never mind now," he said with a smile, upon his dying lips. "It's owre late." And as his voice lowered to a whisper, Mr. Fisher, who stood by, stooped down to him.

"To live is Christ, to die is gain," were the words with which his brave spirit passed from earth.

Mr. Fisher left the army in 1881, purchasing his discharge, and returning to London he engaged in Rescue work, and speaking in Hyde Park Sunday mornings. The lady whom he married has also had an experience in Christian work, having been in missionary work in Bristol.

Shortly afterward, he came to the United States, with his wife, and had some business experience in Texas and the South. In Chicago, he conducted the Market Street Gospel Mission for a year and a half, in a district surrounded by saloons. In 1888, he engaged as a missionary of the American Sunday School Union, his first post being Watertown, S. Dak. His territory comprised fifteen counties in South Dakota and Western Minnesota, and in twelve of these he has done excellent and successful work, his record for the six years being:

Schools organized and re-organized..... 125
Scholars gathered in..... 4,500
Schools visited and aided..... 612

In May 29, 1894, Mr. Fisher was ordained to the Gospel ministry of the Presbyterian Church. Everywhere he finds in his Western work a welcome from the people who have neither church service nor Sunday School. His present station is at Rochester, Olmstead Co., Minnesota, where, with his Christian wife as coadjutor, he continues to labor in the Gospel field.

SPREADING THE KINGDOM.

WHEN my brother went as missionary to China forty years ago, it took him six months to get there. Now, American missionaries reach China in one month. Fifty years ago the secular newspapers gave no attention to sermons, and accounts of dedications and installations occupied only about an inch of a column. Now, the Gospel is preached with wider sweep on Mondays through the printing press than on Sunday through the churches. Now all archaeological discoveries come in to attest the divinity of the Scriptures. Telegraphy on the land and under the sea twice a day puts before us all the great events of the world, so that we may more intelligently study the doings of God among the nations. The Western home missionary, at 9 o'clock Monday morning, comes out of the missionary office in New York with his credentials in his pocket, and takes the 10 o'clock limited express train, and by 10 o'clock on Tuesday morning is in Chicago, and then by the vestibule train to Omaha, and by the middle of the week is on his field of Christian work, whereas it used to be a three months' journey, and the wolves and the savages and the malarious made it uncertain whether he would ever get there at all. Where have you been for the last twenty-five years that you have not seen the advancement of the Lord's kingdom in the flying events, and that you have not realized that Ezekiel was right when he said that the spirit was in the wheels.

Now if one Lord wrote the Bible and another Lord managed the affairs of this world, I would be in trepidation lest their plans might collide, for when two Titans come into war, they throw mountains and pitch stars. But the same Being who made the world made the Book. All that he has promised on the inspired page about the gardenings of this unfortunate planet will be accomplished. The kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our God. The work will be done either with or without us. If we want to share in the great harvest home, we must bring in at least one sheaf. If when Christ, the returned Conqueror, has his heavenly reception, we would like to be invited, we had better do something toward his victories. Let us be somewhere in the holy war now raging, and then we shall have a right to share in the final triumph.

THE DIVINE REMEDY.

THE great want of the world to-day is gospelization on the subject of labor and capital. All the worldly philosophers under the archvolt of heaven cannot settle the controversy between capital and hard work. "Give us more wages," cry the employees. "You shall have less," say the capitalists. "Compel us to do fewer hours of toil in a day." "You shall toil more hours," say the others. "Then on such conditions we will not work at all," say these. "Then you shall starve," say those. That is the way the world talks, but when Christianity gets full swing it will correct all this. Kindness, Christian kindness, that is going to settle this quarrel of centuries.

Christ—Christ alone—will settle this contest between capital and labor, because he represents both sides, himself a King and a Nazarene mechanic. Owner of all things, all the continents of this world and all the islands of light. Capitalist of immensity crossing over from our condition, coming into our world not by gate of a palace, but by door of barn. Spending his first night among the shepherds, afterward gathering around him the fishermen to be his chief associates. With adze and saw and chisel and axe, and in carpenter shop, showing himself brother of all the tradesmen. Owner of all things, and yet on a hillock back of Jerusalem one day resigning everything for others and keeping not so much as a shekel to pay for his obsequies. By charity buried in the suburbs of the city that had cast him out. Before the cross of such a capitalist and such a carpenter, all men may shake hands and worship. Here is the every man's Christ. None so high but he was higher. None so poor but he was poorer. At his feet all hostile extremes are to renounce their animosities, and countenances which have glowered with the prejudices and revenge of centuries shall brighten with the smile of heaven, as he commands: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so unto them."

PRECIPITATE MARRIAGES.

SOME people say parents are to blame for too great rigidity in the control of the destiny of their children. No doubt there are such cases in the attempt to transplant European espionage to America. Parental despotism, like all other styles of despotism, is unbearable; but American society is not much overburdened with such care. In most cases the danger is in the opposite direction and in too little watchfulness on the part of the parents, whom God has appointed to be the guardians of the household. Let parents win so much of the child's confidence that they shall be taken into all counsels pertaining to the affairs of the heart. When the young people of a household come to understand that father and mother are their most sympathetic advisers, the chapter of domestic calamity will end. But whoever may be to blame, in almost all cases there are just four people who will have to suffer for precipitate matrimonial relations—the parents and the runaways. The romance soon vanishes and the twain find out that if they had some evening in early acquaintanceship on the way home from a place of amusement been by a drunken hackman driven off the dock into the river and the policeman had not been able to fish them out, their fate would have been less deplorable. The glamor of elopement gone, refinement is found tied for life to vulgarity, education chained fast to ignorance, and soft hands of luxuriance have to come to the washtub. More appropriate would it have been if the minister officiating had lost his place in the litany and read the service for the burial of the dead rather than the wedding ceremony for the living.

Most of your sympathies go out toward the parents of the daughter who steps from mansion to hovel. The most of my sympathies are for the poor fellow of seven hundred dollars income with a millionaire fool tied fast to him, one who shall forever keep him informed as to how much better she had it before she left home. All my sympathies are with him, for he thought he was making a grand affiancing, and all his life will be a disappointment and a bitterness untold. During the honeymoon he may be exhilarant, but before six months have passed he will wish he had never been born. There have been justifiable cases of wedded life contrary to parental decree and subsequent happiness; but nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of the thousand cases that you see reported have been unmitigated disasters, and will find a terminus either in divorce court or almshouse, or pauper's cabin.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Holidaysburg, Pa. Does Malachi 4:5 mean that Elijah was to be raised from the dead?

No, Christ himself explained it, by saying it was fulfilled in John the Baptist, who in his life and work resembled Elijah. He came in the spirit and power of Elijah (see Matt. 11:14).

Miss Clara Smith, Schroon Lake, writes: "As we are quite a distance from a church, there are several months in the year when we cannot attend services. Then it is a pleasure at the hour when we know our friends are in God's house, listening to his messengers there, to sit down and receive, through the columns of your paper, helpful words from Dr. Talmage and others."

Subscriber, New Berne, N. C. Do you think it a wise movement to place pool tables in a Y. M. C. A., located in a town where many young men resort to bar-rooms to play the game?

It is neither wise nor Christian. The "pool room" is so associated with gambling and everything that is profane and vulgar that it is surprising that any Association should consider its adoption seriously. There are many pleasant recreations that might be introduced to which none of these objections could be urged.

"Desirous," Valdosta, Ga. 1. Which is the best way to win a boy friend over to Christ, when you are separated from him by over 200 miles? 2. Tell me the harm in dancing. 3. What is a good plan for a boy seventeen years of age who wants to live right? 4. If the tableaux of "living pictures" are purely moral, is it any harm for a Christian to take part in them in an entertainment for a charitable purpose?

1. Write to him frequently and pray for him. You may be able occasionally to send him a helpful book, or to advise him by letter to his spiritual benefit. 2. This has already been repeatedly answered. It excites the passions, leads into promiscuous and evil associations, and is the first step in the downward career of thousands. 3. Read your Bible, say your prayers morning and evening, be cheerful and helpful, avoid unwholesome habits and associations, and follow the Golden Rule. 4. Such tableaux may be perfectly pure and even beautiful and instructive. It is only when the line of modesty is overstepped that they are objectionable.

S. P. Zook, —. Geologists tell us that the world was in existence many thousands of years longer than we have Bible record of; which are we to believe?

The Bible was not written to teach science. It contains the instruction necessary to the salvation of the soul. It teaches men how to live so that they may be a blessing to others and fulfill the purposes of God in their being placed here. It does not profess to give a complete history of the world and nowhere does it fix the date of creation. It is therefore open to you to accept the theories of geologists, if they commend themselves to your judgment, and need not surrender your faith in the Bible. The fact of there being no mention of America in the works of historians prior to the fifteenth century does not cause us to discredit their works, although they say that Alexander conquered the whole world.

A. Collins, Breckenridge, Minn. 1. Does Christ mean in John 6:27 that we are not to work for a living? 2. Would the marriage of a Roman Catholic and a Protestant be a case of unequal yoking together in the sense of the Apostle (1 Cor. 6:14)?

1. No, he did not mean that, but that it should not be the chief object of life. He was speaking to the people who had followed him to see a miracle and he said that they had not come for the divine life he was able to give them but because they had been miraculously fed, and as a reproof he said, "Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which shall not be eaten." 2. No the Apostle was writing about the marriages of Christians and Pagans. There is, however, so great a difference between the religious faith of a Protestant and a Roman Catholic that the harmony of feeling that should exist between husband and wife would be impaired. There would be little prospect of happiness.

Subscriber, Kansas City, Mo. We have had an argument in our Sunday School as to the meaning of a verse in the S. S. Lesson for Dec. 2. It was on Luke 7:30. Some said that the rejection of the Baptism there spoken of was opposition to Immersion and others that it was opposition to sprinkling. What is Dr. Talmage's opinion?

That the rejection of the counsel of God did not consist in any objection to the mode of baptism, but in something for more radical and important. John preached repentance and reformation of life, and preparation for the coming Christ. This was what Luke called the "counsel of God." When a man submitted to baptism at John's hands, he thereby intimated his acceptance of John's teaching, and his determination to lead a new life. He also understood that it was a preparatory thing, for, as John said, One was coming who could baptize with the Holy Ghost. (Matt. 3:11.) Those Pharisees to whom Christ was speaking rejected this teaching and therefore had to be submitted to baptism. If they had yielded the truth and repented, they would not have troubled themselves about the quantity of water John thought it proper to use. They would have been just as willing to be plunged head in the Jordan, as to be sprinkled. The difficulty was as to confessing their sin and repenting. They did not see the need of either and so rejected the counsel of God.

Reader, North Henderson, Ill. What was "needle's eye" referred to in Mark 10:35?

There were usually two gates to the walls of Oriental cities, one for foot passengers and one for camels and vehicles. The latter was called, "The needle's eye." The Jews used the proverb as signifying something very difficult. It was especially appropriate Christ used it, because, of the bulky loads the camels carried. A laden camel could get through. Christ was showing how difficult it was for a man possessed of the riches of this world to enter his kingdom.

O. R. B., Danvers Centre, Mass. In what sense is the word, "income," used when speaking of giving a tenth to God?

There are two ways of understanding it and the choice between them is a matter of individual conscience. The first is to regard it as the total product of labor, trading, or investments of the year. In the case of a tradesman, it would be the amount left after deducting from his total receipts the cost of the goods sold and the business expenses. The second way, and that frequently adopted, is to deduct also the bare cost of living, food, clothing, medical attendance and unavoidable expenses. The balance in this case would be the surplus which a tenth would be given. Thus: if a man were receiving a salary of twenty dollars a week, he would, on the principle first mentioned, consecrate two dollars to the Lord. He adopted the second principle, and found it would be possible to get board, etc., for six dollars a week, then he would give one dollar and forty cents as his tithe. If, however, he used to have more expensive food and clothing and so spent twelve dollars a week in that way, he would not be entitled to deduct the twelve dollars, because the extra money spent on himself would not be "unavoidable expenses."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A NOBLE GIFT TO CHINA.

CHINA, despite all obstacles and drawbacks, is the grandest and most inviting foreign mission field in the world to-day. For many years our American Protestant Churches have been actively represented there by a steadily increasing missionary corps, and more recently by some of the most successful medical missions yet established. Last year the project of erecting a hospital at Wuchang, a centre of missionary activity, was taken up and a sum of $50,000 was contributed by Prof. Seth Low of New York, and his brother, Mr. A. Augustus Low of Brooklyn, to be devoted to that purpose. The result is the handsome building known as St. Peter's Hospital, shown in the illustration on this page. It is constructed on the pavilion plan—a group of separate one-story buildings, affording accommodation for the patients, with the usual departments for offices, reception and operating-rooms. The gift was made as a memorial of the late Mr. Abiel A. Low, father of the donors and for many years a leading merchant. The hospital has been placed under the control of the Protestant Episcopal Missionary Society, which is doing a very successful work in China. Medical missionary work in China has been a most valuable aid in opening up the country to Gospel ministrations and has done much to break down the ancient prejudices and opposition of the natives. Christian medical missionaries have penetrated where others would not have been permitted to go, and their skill in healing the sick has secured them a welcome to the homes of the rich and influential and has brought them into favor with all classes, thus affording multiplied opportunities for sowing the spiritual seed. The introduction of medical men, with dispensaries and hospitals, into missionary work is proving throughout the world, an effectual means of reaching the hearts of multitudes not otherwise susceptible. In China this is especially true, for the reason that a vast majority of the native physicians are utterly ignorant of surgery and know little of the principles of medicine. The Gospel is thus commended to the people who know nothing of it by the kindness and beneficence of those who preach it. Perhaps it would have made more progress in all lands if it had always been commended by the good deeds of its professors. That was Christ's plan. He told his disciples to let their light shine that men might, seeing their good works, glorify God. (Matt. 5: 16.)

Astonished Mules.

A singular spectacle that was witnessed near Lacon, Ill. recently, is described by the "Engineering and Mining Journal." It says that for over four years, six mules have been kept in the lower workings of the Sparland mine, near Lacon, where they were used to haul the coal-laden cars. In all that time the mules had seen no light stronger than the flicker of the Davy lamps which the miners carried. They were brought out of the mine the other day. The sun was at its zenith when they reached the surface. The astonished mules closed their eyes to shut out the flood of light, and kept them tightly closed while they were led to the pasture lot a mile distant and turned loose. There they stood trembling, as if afraid something evil was about to befall them. Presently they half opened their eyes and peered around in amazement.

When they had become accustomed to the sunlight they elevated their heads. Then they broke into a chorus of joyous brays. After a quarter of an hour of that music they took to kicking, jumping, whirling around like teetotums, and rolling on the sod as if they had gone mad. The sun and pure air was more to them than food, and they revelled in the light, neglecting the pasture. If men had been in the mine for four years, like the mules, they would have been similarly affected. It is a pity that spiritual light, which is a still greater boon, is not appreciated to the same extent. It is still true that men "love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." (John 3: 19.)

A New Medical Science.

At the recent anniversary meeting of the New York Academy of Medicine, an interesting paper was read by Prof. Charles Loomis Dana, on the new science which, for want of a better name, he called, "Modernized Physiognomy." The science, as described by the Professor, is an effort to understand the character, capacity and clearly read that it would be possible to trace unmistakably the course of mental development. To this we may add that God has given a promise to every one who submits to the Holy Spirit's influence that he shall reflect "as a mirror the glory of the Lord and be transformed into the same image." (II Cor. 3: 18.)

Caught in His Own Trap.

A bar-keeper in New York gave a curious explanation the other day of the illness of a customer. He said that two men entered his saloon just as it was getting dusk. One of them he knew by sight and suspected of being a dishonest man. The other was a stranger, and appeared to have come from some out-of-town district. He was expensively dressed, and wore a heavy gold chain to which a valuable gold watch was attached. The other man's eyes dwelt longingly on the jewelry, and the bar-keeper in his mind hazarded the prediction that it would change hands before the men parted. Two glasses of beer were ordered, and the stranger turned away to the lunch counter. The bar-keeper saw the other man pass his hand casually over the stranger's glass, and something glistened. He believed that it was a phial, and that some drug was being dropped into the stranger's beer. If he had been sure he would have called in a policeman, but it was only suspicion. The suspected man went to the lunch counter and the stranger came back to the bar. He took up his companion's glass instead of his own, and drank its contents. The other ashes and the landlady accepted the pledge. The box was handed over and the money advanced. The widow found herself unable to repay the loan, but she wanted the box back. The lender, however, refused to part with it unless the money was restored. The widow then applied to the Police Justice who, with the spirit of the lawyer, advised the landlady to give up the box and sue the widow for the money. She, however, had not so much faith in that course and declared her intention of retaining the security until the loan was repaid. The prospects of her recovering her money do not seem very bright. As the pledge has no intrinsic value, she cannot find a customer for it, as a pawnbroker does, if the borrower fails to redeem it. It is of no value to anyone but the widow, and its value to her is only measured by her love for her husband. Whether that love is very intense may be doubted. If it had been she would have regarded the relic as too precious to be used as a means of raising money. If that principle were remembered, religious impostors would not make so many dupes as they do. When a man uses his religion to gain the public confidence, so as to enrich himself, it cannot be worth much even to him, otherwise he would not profane it by turning it to such a use. (I. Timothy 6: 5.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The New York City Mission and Tract Society held its annual meeting on Dec. 12. The Secretary reported that the receipts for the year were about ten thousand dollars less than the expenditure.

This was due to the general depression which has affected the treasuries of almost all religious societies.

Rev. Thomas Harrison has promised to hold a series of revival services at Bridgeport N.J., commencing Jan. 3. Preparations are being made for an extensive work.

An Alabaster Box of Perfume was recently discovered amid the ruins of Pompeii. The pomade was extremely fragrant, although it had lain buried for eighteen centuries.

The Lands in which a century ago the people had not the Bible in their own tongue, but where it is now circulated in the native language, have a population of nearly five hundred millions.

Mr. William Noble's many friends in this country will be glad to learn that he is fully restored to health and has been holding successful meetings in Wiltshire at Calne and Marlborough, as well as in Lincoln and London.

A District Convention of the Christian Workers' Association was held at Portland, Me., Dec. 13-18. Among the speakers were Rev. H. W. Pope of New Haven, Conn., Mr. H. B. Gibboud of Syracuse, N. Y.; Rev. David Allen Reed of Springfield, Mass.; Rev. John C. Collins of

of New Haven; and Mr. C. N. Crittenton of New York.

A Widespread Religious Awakening is Reported from Indianapolis. Rev. J. Willbur Chapman and his associates in evangelistic work are laboring in that city, and forty-five churches are heartily co-operating in the services. Special days of prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the entire State were appointed.

The Bethel Evangelization Society of Kansas City, is conducting a Mission, including a Free Reading-room and Library, in the notorious section known as "State Line," where are located the numerous gambling houses and other places of vicious resort. It promises to be very successful in rescuing the victims of dissipation.

An Imperial Edict has been issued in China to the Mayor of Peking and other large cities warning them that "evil disposed vagabonds" are likely to flock to the cities, and many of them being ignorant, may not know that the quarrel with the Japanese has no relation to the great Western nations. The Mayors are enjoined to protect the foreigners, and to "punish with unusual vigor" any men who molest the foreigners. The edict mentions incidentally that the churches of all nations are entitled to protection.

An Attack on Bethesda Mission Church, at Elm and Tarrabee streets, Chicago, was made on Dec. 9. A mob surrounded the mission and demanded that a man who had formerly been a tough, but had recently become a convert of the mission should be given up to them. When their demand was refused they assailed the church with stones and bricks. The church would have been demolished if the police had not responded promptly to a call for assistance and dispersed the mob. The Mission is maintained by the Moody Institute to which our readers have recently contributed.

In Compliance with Many Requests, we again publish the list of topics selected by the Evangelical Alliance for the week of prayer, Jan. 6-13: Sunday, Jan. 6, sermons, Isa. 4: 31; Monday, Jan. 7, "Humiliation and Thanksgiving;" Tuesday, Jan. 8, "The Church Universal;" Wednesday, Jan. 9, "Nations and their Rulers;" Thursday, Jan. 10, "Foreign Missions;" Friday, Jan. 11, "Home Missions;" Saturday, Jan. 12, "Families and Schools;" Sunday, Jan. 13, sermons, I. Cor. 15: 38. A full list of sub-topics may be obtained at fifty cents the hundred copies from Dr. Josiah S. Strong, Secretary of the Alliance, the United Charities Building, Fourth avenue and Twenty-second street, New York.

mental endowments of a man from his physical formation. A young French physician named Morel had done a great deal toward bringing the new science to perfection, and presenting it in such a form as to obtain recognition. Prof. Dana said that the world had been groping toward it for a long time through phrenology, palmistry, physiognomy and pedescopy. In the new science the conformation of the bones, the skull, the features, and in fact every member of the physical organization is considered and classified. A clue had been discovered in the fact that a large number of notorious criminals were found to have what is called, "the twisted skull." Men remarkable for their brutality and ferocity and degrading habits had, in nearly all cases where an examination had been made, the prehensile toe, which in its extreme size and development is seen in the gorilla. It had been found also that while some people had physical characteristics resembling those of their parents, others showed marks of inferiority, with a tendency to degenerate. Others showed superiority and were liable to improve. Thus, there were three types of humanity: the normal, the degenerate, and the progressive. Prof. Dana closed his lecture by remarking that the result of the study was not to make any one despair under the impression that it was useless to resist heredity, but proved that there were endless possibilities of development through the cultivation of good habits of body and mind. He believed that eventually the signs in physical conformation would be so also returned and drank the contents of the other glass. The bar-keeper was interested in the result, and followed the two to the door. His suspicion was confirmed. He saw one of the two reel and fall down unconscious: it was not the well-dressed stranger, but the man who intended to make him his victim. The stranger was concerned about his companion's sickness, but soon withheld his sympathy when he learned its cause. Perhaps he may learn a useful lesson from the incident, as others may. He may see how dangerous is association with evil men (Prov. 1: 15); while the would-be thief and all others may see that in plotting against another, they are liable to incur the doom threatened against such evildoers: "In the net which they hid is their own foot taken." (Ps. 9: 15.)

A Ghastly Pledge.

The assistance of a Police Justice in New York was invoked a few days ago by a widow, who appealed to him in a dispute with her landlady. It appeared that when the widow's husband died, his body was cremated in accordance with a wish he had expressed during his last illness. In due time the widow received from the crematory at Fresh Pond the ashes, which she put in an ornamental box. This she kept as a valued relic in her room. After a time, she was in pressing need of money and applied for help to her landlady, who agreed to lend her twenty-five dollars if she could give security. The widow offered to deposit the box containing her husband's

SHADOWS AND THEIR FLIGHT.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Robert Stuart MacArthur. Text: Solomon's Song 4: 6: "Until the day break and the shadows flee away, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense."

THOSE of you who are accustomed to attend this ministry, know that comparatively seldom are sermons preached in this pulpit from texts taken from the Song of Solomon. It is readily acknowledged that the book is not without its serious difficulties. The scholarship of the past generation will doubtless lead us in the near future to modify some of our former interpretations of this book; but it is not my intention this morning to speak of the book as a whole, nor even of the immediate surroundings of my text. The text itself gives us some interesting and instructive lessons; and to these, without further preliminaries, I desire to call your thought this morning.

You will observe, in the first place, that the text suggests that there are Shadows in every Life.

This melancholy truth we all know; sometimes we think we know it too well, by observation, if not by experience. There is a crook in every lot; there is a "but" in every life. Every heart knows its own sorrow; every life has its own special form of shadow. Permit me, however, to particularize some shadows in illustration of this general truth. There are, in some cases, the shadows of physical infirmities. Many men and women have as their chief inheritance weak bodies. It is astonishing how much work a great soul may get out of a weak body, until they are divorced in death, when the body, so tired and worn, is permitted to rest in the grave, and the spirit goes up in triumph to glory and to God. There are, however, even in such cases marked compensations in this life. It is interesting to observe how one faculty will spring to the relief of another faculty, and how God sometimes gives his richest intellectual and spiritual bestowments to those who suffer from some form of physical infirmity. John Milton would never have filled the world with the music of his poetic genius, had not God closed his eyes. Through his sightless eyeballs, he saw the resplendent glories of heaven; he saw the marshalled hosts of angels; he saw the gates of pearl and the streets of gold. John Milton, sitting in his blindness, was lifted to the third heaven by the glory of poetic genius and religious enthusiasm. Anne Steele would never have written so many noble hymns, more than one hundred of which are found in our recent compilations, were it not for her Physical Infirmities.

She has well been called the "woman poet of the Sanctuary." For sixty-one years, until she was released by death, she was for much of the time an invalid. During many of these years she was confined to her room, and during some of them to her bed. At twenty-one she was to have been married, but the day before the marriage was to take place, her intended husband was drowned while bathing. The most familiar of her hymns is that which begins:

Father! what'er of earthly bliss,
This weakling will despise;
Accepted at thy throne of grace,
Let this petition rise.

She never could have written this hymn but for the deep shadows on her life. Cowper suffered from peculiar sensitiveness of body, and corresponding sensitiveness of mind. At times he lived on the border of insanity; and frequently he contemplated, and more than once attempted suicide. It has often been said that so far did he go in his determination, that he ordered a post-chaise to drive him to the river Ouse, that he might end the agony of his life. The driver could not find the way, although he never lost it before, and Cowper could not tell him. At last the driver turned the carriage homeward, after a few more attempts to find the desired location. After Cowper reached the seclusion of his own room, he composed that beautiful hymn, beginning:

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants His foot-steps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

This has been called the greatest hymn ever written on divine Providence. Our New York sister, Fanny Crosby, whose presence sometimes gladdens our worshipping assembly, never would have seen Christ crucified in the splendor and glory of his divine sacrifice, had not God shut out the light of all besides from her eyes. Truly,

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform.

There are also the shadows of temporal reverses. Many persons just now, in different parts of our country, are under very deep and dark shadows from this cause. All our hearts lately were saddened as seldom in our lives as the result of the deaths caused by great fires in three States in the West. Many others, during the past two years, have known trials and shadows from temporal adversities. Never was any country on the globe swept within a year and a half from marvellous prosperity to almost unexampled adversity, as has this republic of ours. I am not here to speak of the cause; you will have your own views on that point. I am here simply to emphasize the unquestionable fact. Riches thus often take to themselves wings and fly away. This is a world of Strange Mutations.

God's people suffer as much as, apparently more often than, the people of the world. Here is a man who prays seven times a day, and he is unfortunate in the affairs of life; here is a man who does not pray once in seven days, and he apparently prospers in all his business plans. Will we say that these things are merely the result of chance? But what do we mean when we so affirm? Shall we be more learned and say they are the result of the law of general averages? Now we seem to be talking philosophically. But what do we mean by the law of averages? We are simply using a vague term for a plain one; an obscure expression for a simple one. For when we analyze our thought, we find that we simply mean chance. What is chance? Is there any such thing? What is law? A law is only the name we give to the manner in which we observe some force to act. Do we mean to say that a law accounts for results apart from a law-giver? Away with such a doctrine! The heart repudiates atheism; the heart cries out for God, for the living God. The mind sympathizes with the heart; a living man must have a living God. Never can he satisfy either affection or intellect by agnosticism or atheism. A man needs to look into his Father's face and to lie at his feet; he needs to feel the throb of his Father's heart. God does not make up his accounts at the end of each month; God does not balance the books of providence at the end of each year. Be patient, O child of God! The end is not yet. We, like the Psalmist, have looked and we have seen the wicked spreading himself like a green bay tree; we have seen wicked men prosperous, and we looked again and they could not be found; even their memory had practically ceased among men. The memory of the wicked shall rot; but the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.

Bereavement.

There is, also, the shadow of bereavement. Perhaps there is no shadow so broad, so deep, so dark as this shadow often is. It is simply impenetrable and inexplicable darkness, judged from our point of view. During the past week I stood beside the little casket where lay the babe of two months of earthly life. Why was that babe given to our brother and sister, so soon to be taken from their arms and hearts? God knows; God is too wise to err; God is too good to be unkind. In the Alpine regions, we are told, that when the sheep have eaten the grass bare on a given level, the shepherds come and take the lambs in their arms and carry them up higher where the grass is green and abundant, and where the waters are clear and cool; and soon the sheep clamber up the side of the mountain to reach the lambs. So now the Good Shepherd takes our lambs from our homes and hearts up to his own paradise, that parents may be drawn from earth and lifted in love and life toward heaven. He was an excellent Christian man, from whose side his wife had just been taken, who asked me this question a little time ago: "Did God need her more than I needed her?" Did God need her more than the babe needed her? Did God need her more than her mother needed her? She was the only child of her mother, and she was a widow. Ah, what could I say? What could you have said? I only whispered, "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight."

Allow me now to direct your attention, in the second place, to another suggestion in this text. The time is coming when the shadows shall flee away—"Until the day-break and the shadows flee away." Yes, the day will dawn when away. The day of greater trust in God will dawn. The day of doubt shall entirely end; the day of sweeter faith shall begin. The day will come when we shall know that "all things work together for good to them that love God." The day approaches when we shall see good in seeming evil, and light in real darkness. I stood in this pulpit while there sat before me in her pew one of the noblest women to whom I have been permitted to minister for years. Within ten days she had lost her husband and her only child. My heart ached for her as I conducted the services that morning. So soon as the services were over, I went to her. The peace of God was in her heart; the glory of the Lord was on her face; and divine quietude reigned within her soul. She looked into my face when I spoke to her words of pastoral and personal sympathy, and said, "Though he slay me, yet I will trust him." The day had dawned for her. Earth has no shadow for the heart that has such faith. Earth has no storms to disturb the sea of experience when Jesus says, "Peace, be still." The Psalmist knew what it was to pass through trials in the loss of property, of friends, of honor, and of all that he held dear, and yet he was able to assure us that before he was afflicted he went astray; but now he sought the Lord's precepts and walked in the Lord's way. There is, thus an experience of life, joy, peace and blessing even here and now. The moment we can take the hand of Jesus in our hand and kneel by his side and say, "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight," the day of blessedness has begun to dawn, and heaven has already begun on earth. But better still, the day of everlasting light will Dawn Sure and Soon.

Life when longest is short, when darkest is bright, when roughest is peaceful to the child of God. Earth may become a foretaste of heaven; earth may hear now the music of saints and seraphs, and may see the light of God streaming through "the gates ajar." I thank God for this sweet hope, for this blessed assurance, for this unbroken peace. Already the shadows are fleeing away; already the day is dawning.

It is helpful for us to bear in mind that lights and shadows have their uses in every relation in life. Art would be comparatively meaningless, but for its commingling of lights and shades. A picture all light would be without expression, without character, without real worth of any sort. One of the charms of Gothic architecture is the opportunity that it furnishes for the intermingling of lights and shadows. The deep recesses in the ceiling, in the gallery fronts and elsewhere in this church, add much to its pleasing effects, both in natural and in artificial light. The minor chords in music give it no small element of its power over the hearts of men. Every trained ear watches with interest, and every cultivated heart listens with appreciation, to the notes expressive of mingled sorrow and joy. The same truth is illustrated in the highest poetry; its deepest undertone is expressive of the inevitable shadows in life. Elim, with the waving of its palm trees and the gurgling of the waters from its twelve wells, is evermore near Marah, with its bitter waters and its disappointed pilgrims.

The tragedies of life are as certain as its victories; earth is fashioned and controlled so that the shadows give deeper significance to the lights of life. The fall of leaves of autumn are as beautiful as the bursting buds of spring. The deeper shadows of night are often more impressive than the Eastern sky colored with crimson and gold of the rising sun. Lakes of burning lava in the Hawaiian Islands are four besides beds of blooming and fragrant flowers. But for their tragical element the great dramas of the ages had never been written; and, it written, they would not have controlled the heart and excited the imagination of men through the ages.

The Use of Shadow.

The pessimists have their place in life as truly as the optimists. Perhaps, indeed, the shadows lie more thickly than the sunbeams; perhaps the winter is more dominant than the spring. These comminglings of light and shadow are thus seen all through the universe of God. All deep lives have their great joys and their corresponding great griefs. They are shallow-hearted people who live constantly in one light or with a uniform experience. The Son of God was a Man of Sorrow and acquainted with grief on one hand; but he was equal on the other hand, anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows. God has given the earth up to the devil as his portion; this earth of ours rejoices in heaven's visitants with their transfiguring and celestial sunlight; but across its fairest flow and its greenest swards, shadows often fall and sometimes linger. As the landscape beautified by the alternations of mountain and valley, of hill and meadow, of river and island, so is life by its apparent contradictions, by its lights and shadows. The day will dawn when earth's vision will glow in a sunlight without an earthly cloud when the images of the Apocalypse shall become glorious realities, and when in light of golden glory the mists of earth shall vanish, and only blessed glimpses of the celestial land shall be ours.

And will you notice, briefly, in the last place, that there is help for us in the meantime, "Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense." It is supposed that by the mountain of myrrh we are to understand a condition of penitence, and by the hill or frankincense offering of prayer. We know the importance which the Orientals attached to aromatic shrubs, and so I use these words illustrative of the development of these other Christian graces. The reference to myrrh certainly sets forth the development of the grace of penitence. Our hearts are often to be humbled, and our wills broken so that our lives may be to God. The words set forth the blessedness of prayer. Never do we know how to pray as when we have been driven to the Father's bosom by the rod in the Father's hand. I believe that when the rod of chastisement is in the hands of our heavenly Father, and it is laid upon us, the true child goes to God and says, "I shall cling to thee and I shall love thee as never before." The blessed mountain of myrrh! Oh, heaven's hill of frankincense! from whose tops we can see the glory of heaven, and stand on which we can hear the music of angels.

Fully Dedicated

I think, in the meantime, too, we ought to cultivate the grace of patience. Patience should have her perfect work. Charles Haddon Spurgeon would never have been the world's greatest preacher, notwithstanding all his other gifts, but for some of his physical infirmities and racking pains, temptations, trials and even persecutions which he endured in his early ministry. They cultivated in him the grace of patience. He said once to me, that if ever, for a moment, he was uplifted in any way, he would only look over the books of the horrible caricatures of himself which he had preserved, representing him as unworthy the respect of an intelligent community, and was thoroughly humbled. And yet to all the English-speaking world, irrespective of religious creeds, rejoices in his character, great work, honored name and immortal fame.

Oh, beloved, this morning I beseech you walk on the mountain of myrrh, leap on hill-tops of frankincense, trust God with the heart, and wait patiently for him, as the eternal day will dawn, and the earth's shadows will flee away, and the Sun Righteousness will rise with healing in wings for bruised bodies, blighted lives and bereaved hearts.

Missionary Hall has passed to his reward, and Chang Sikey and his faithful band of Christians remain to testify, by their upright lives and heroism for the truth, the value of the work accomplished at Long Yang. It may be that the Gospel sown there by one devoted worker will yet bear fruit a hundred-fold.

Rev. Wm. Murray, a missionary of the school for the blind, at Pekin, China, has made a valuable discovery. Several years ago he became greatly interested in the blind people of China, who are very numerous in that country. In his efforts to find a way to give them the Bible, he discovered that the four thousand and more characters of the Chinese printed language represent only 408 sounds, and he quickly invented a method of representing these sounds by a system of raised dots indicating numbers, so that the blind in China can read the Word of God for themselves. It is now found that by connecting these dots by lines, a method of printing Chinese is invented which is vastly simpler and more easy to learn than by the use of the complicated characters of the established Chinese printing. One must learn 4,000 characters before being able to read the simplest book, and some Chinese literary works require a knowledge of more than 20,000 characters. Such is the difficulty of learning to read Chinese that few women and only five per cent. of the men ever acquire the accomplishment. By Mr. Murray's system all can easily learn to read, and one version of the Bible can be read by all Chinese, no matter how varied the spoken dialects. It would seem as if, by his efforts for the blind. Mr. Murray has incidentally conferred an incalculable benefit upon the whole Chinese people.

AFTER our limbs have been tortured with pain,

After our prayers for relief have been vain,
After the trials that we here sustain,
Death is not loss, but infinite gain.

Gain of sweet rest after long weary days ;
Rest after treading the rough, stony ways.
After long waiting and weary delays,
Gain of a mansion with Jesus always.

Loss of all heart-break and suffering here ;
Gain of a life without sorrow up there.
Vain is the longing on earth to remain.
When death is not loss, but infinite gain.

I'M safe with God, he guides my bark
Over the waters, troubled, dark.
Though frail, no sea shall overwhelm,
With such a Pilot at the helm.

I can ride on serene and calm,
Leaning on his Almighty arm.
Can trust his wisdom all to guide,
And know no evil will betide.

I'm safe beneath his watchful eye ;
 "My God shall all your need supply.
 According to his glorious store,
 Thro' Jesus Christ forevermore."

PROPHETIC CHRONOLOGY.

A Divine Purpose in the Dates and Periods Mentioned in the Prophecies.

BY THE REV. RICHARD CHESTER.

THE instances already cited are not the only ones in which there is an indefiniteness which is perplexing. It would seem that God, with whom a day is as a thousand years did not design that men should be able to lay their finger on a specific day and say, "at such a day and such an hour this thing will happen." It was sufficient that he indicate it approximately. This is very evident again in the prophecy of "the little horn" (Daniel 7: 25), in which it is foretold that "he shall wear out the saints of the Most High; and they shall be given into his hand until a time, times, and the dividing of time." There has ever been an uncertainty as to the exact historical event from which should be dated the proper commencement of his foretold prosecuting power; and consequently as to the exact time at which it would meet with its appointed termination.

So is it also with regard to the duration of the reign of the yet future personal Antichrist, in whom, as we believe, this prophecy and the corresponding prophecies of the book of Revelation will culminate into their final and exhaustive fulfilment. Designedly withheld information as to the exact date of the commencement renders certainty unattainable with regard to that of the end.

As regards the Papal Antichrist, the total fall of the temporal power of the Papacy in 1870, close to the time at which many students of the prophetic Word had long been led to expect it, may enable us now to look back, and to determine the exact period of its predicted commencement.

Accordingly, in the memorable prophecy of Daniel concerning "the little horn" (chap. 7), between the statement of a definite period of "a time, times, and the dividing of time," as that for which "the saints of the Most High should be given into his hand," and the further statement that "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High," we read that "the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion to consume and to destroy it unto the end." This passage seems evidently to point to a period, the duration of which is unrevealed, intervening between the actual termination of the temporal power of the Papacy (a horn is an emblem of temporal or secular power), and its tull and utter destruction, as to spiritual no less than temporal dominion at the advent in judgment of the Son of Man.

Great, however, beyond all present conception will be, we may rest assured, the strength and comfort which these chronological predictions will afford to those "elect" for whose sake "the days are to be shortened," to the "faithful unto death" who shall suffer under the persecutions of the last Antichrist and his myrmidons, assuring them that the time of tribulation is very short, that "the crown of life" is very near at hand. To us, living now, as we beyond all question are, amidst the eventful closing scenes of the present dispensation, the lessons which ought to be most solemnly impressed upon us by these chronological prophecies of Holy Scripture, as most surely and specially applicable to ourselves, are those of Patience, Prayer, and Watchfulness.

Patience; for, interpret them as you may, they teach us emphatically that "the time is short," that at the furthest it is only "yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry."

Prayer: for Daniel's prayer, under circumstances with regard to chronological prophecies very similar to those in which our lot is cast, brought a full flood of light and strength and blessing to his soul, and will bring them equally to us.

Watchfulness: for what impressive force do they give to the solemn words of our Lord, "Watch, ye, therefore, for ye know not when the Master of the House cometh, at even, at midnight, at cock crowing, or in the morning; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you I say unto you all, Watch" (Mark 13: 37.) If we believe them, and receive them, and inquire into them, as Daniel did, their practical application to each of us, as to him, is "Go thou thy way til the end be, for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days."

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Jan. 6, 1895. II. Chron. 6: 18-21; 29-33; 7: 1-13.

ONE conspicuous evidence of the growth of the Christ-like spirit in the soul is the increasing prominence that intercession has in prayer. The man who is becoming more and more like Christ pleads often and much for others. His petitions are not all for himself. His longing for more grace and greater conformity to the Divine pattern, are greater rather than less than they were, but his concern for other people has outgrown all else. He understands what the Apostle Paul meant when he declared that if through his loss his brethren might be saved, he would wish himself accursed for their sakes. So it is that so large a part of the list of topics for the Week of Prayer is taken up with intercession. The Christian pleads for the nations, for their rulers, for families, for missionaries at home and abroad and for the universal church as well as for personal blessings. That such an attitude must be pleasing to God, we may infer from all we know of his character. It is in harmony with his way and will. As we look abroad and learn more of God's character from his dealings, we see that he is set in the highest conceivable manner for the extirpation of evil. He does not proceed in the rough, brutal manner that a giant among men would use, of stamping it out, but in the highest way of leading men to see for themselves how bad a thing evil is, to hate it on their own account and to put it resolutely far from them. Like a father who, dealing with his intelligent child, does not rely on his superior physical strength to coerce the boy into right ways, but appeals to his moral sense and tries to get him to choose the right, so God is leading men to discover and admire his laws, and to voluntarily work with him for the extirpation of evil in themselves and in others. God honors men in so dealing with them. It is the highest of all attainable human honors to be one who is thus working with God. In the early time that honor was enjoyed by the Jews alone. They alone among the peoples of the world perceived that God was a God of righteousness, and God gave them more and more light which they reflected in their writings, and which is our guide now. But the wall of separation was levelled in God's good time, and now all men are invited to enter the kingdom of God. Any man may range himself on God's side and work for the triumph of righteousness. In this week of prayer that situation should be realized. The Christian should realize that he belongs to that kingdom which is as yet small among the nations, but is growing greater year by year, and shall yet, like the stone the prophet saw, fill the whole earth. The questions for the week are: "Am I in the kingdom? Am I enrolled in the army that is striving for the regeneration of the earth? And am I using every power and every opportunity to extend that kingdom?" The magnificent King asked: "Will God in every deed dwell with men on the earth?" We know that he will; and we know, too, that as we pray and work, the time comes nearer when his presence and his rule will be universally acknowledged.

TESTIMONY AND EXAMPLE.

In his weekly talks with the Epworth Leagues in the "Epworth Herald," Dr. Edwin A. Schell, the General Secretary of the League, gives stimulus in two shapes—testimony and example. Under the former he quotes the following from the lips of Dr. K. C. Atkins, Presiding Elder of the Chattanooga District:

"The Epworth League has doubled the number of those who publicly pray and testify in the churches of my district." Dr.

Schell adds as comment: "Were this the statement of some impassioned Epworth League orator the editors would doubtless call him to account, and explain how this could not be so. Fortunately for our organization it is the calm judgment of a presiding elder who has visited every charge on a large district. If anyone is qualified to speak he is. The Epworth League, if true to its high mission, will not only increase the number of those who participate in the devotional meetings, but will double the number of those who every week go on errands of mercy, who read good books, and who systematically make contributions to all the benevolences of the church."

As an example the Secretary quotes the following record of Chapter 916 of the League which hails from Knoxville, Tenn. Out of a membership of 104 no less than thirty-two who are in self-supporting employments tithe their incomes. At the dedication of the new church last June, with Bishop FitzGerald present, many of these young people, working on what would commonly be regarded as a small salary, gave $100 each to wipe out the debt. They sent thirty delegates to the convention at Cleveland, and will send ninety to Chattanooga. They support a deaconess, are pushing the Epworth League orphanage, and took a fine collection for the great mission Thanksgiving Epworth League offering. It is no wonder that when the church put up its new edifice it inscribed on its corner stone the number of the League

THE B. Y. P. U. IN CHICAGO.

The Baptist Young People's Union is at home in Chicago. It has made the city one of its strongholds, and there is plenty of enthusiasm to keep its flag flying there. The "Standard," of that city reports a wonderful day there on the occasion of holding the fourth annual convention. It was held in Immanuel Church, and there was a large attendance. The secretary reported that the past year had been one of progress in many lines, in new local unions, and a new district, the Fox River District of Chicago Association. There has been marked progress in Junior organization, due to the efficiency and zeal of Miss Koch. There has been progress in Educational work and special interest in local organizations in the C. C. courses. There has also been progress in Boys' Brigade work. The missionary work in the various districts has been most satisfactory. At present there are 85 senior local unions and societies, with a membership of 4674 active and 553 associate, and 37 junior organizations reported, with a membership of 1553, making a total of 6580, as compared with 4528 members a year ago.

Three eminent clergymen gave addresses, so that the convention was well supplied with spiritual nourishment. They were Dr. J. S. Kennard, Dr. Gilbert Frederick, and Rev. Donald D. MacLaurin, of Detroit. The officers for the ensuing year are: President, Norman G. Lenington, Covenant Church; Vice-President, Samuel H. Bloom, Second Church; Secretary, J. H. Skaggs, Hyde Park Church.

CANADIAN KING'S DAUGHTERS.

The Triennial Convention of the King's Daughters of Canada, recently held at Montreal, is not likely soon to be forgotten by any of the ladies who were privileged to attend it. Portraits of four of its leaders, for which we are indebted to the "Silver Cross," appear on this page. The portrait of Mrs. Tilley, the General Secretary, we published a short time ago. These, with Mrs. I. C. Davis and Mrs. Bottoms, as representatives of headquarters, made an efficient board of management, and under their superintendence the convention was as orderly and business-like as if conducted by experienced Parliamentarians of the sterner sex. Mrs. Tilley's report showed marked progress in the Order in Canada since the last convention, which was held in Toronto in 1891. There are now 241 circles in Canada, with an aggregate membership of 5468. Secretaries have been appointed for the new organizations in Quebec and British Columbia, and in both these Provinces the Order has been making steady gains. Every branch of the work has received attention. Philanthropy, with personal visits to the sick and needy, has of course had the first place. Hospital and prison visitation, work among the Indians, gifts to Foreign Missionaries, and the special work have

AMONG THE ORDERS.

A novel Christian Endeavor anniversary was celebrated on Dec. 10. It was the anniversary of the society in the Pothouse of Cook County, Ill., at Dunnir which was organized Dec. 10, 1893.

Preparations for the International B. P. U. Convention at Baltimore, Md., Jan. 18-21, are being rapidly pushed forward. An energetic committee has been organized with Rev. L. L. Henson chairman.

Rev. Theodore Monod has been aided a Christian Endeavor Society at B. France, whose work has led to a revival there. Dr. Monod was heartily supported by the Endeavorers and a great work has been done. Some of the converts are from a music hall of unsavory reputation.

The committee of Young Men's Christian Associations in Basle, Switzerland, is arranged to receive the next International Conference at that city in 1898.

The Young Men's Christian Association of the Berlin district are making arrangements to facilitate for their less-favored members a visit to suitable health resorts.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Hussineck, Bohemia, has purchased a barn in which the martyr John Huss was born, and has renovated it and fitted it for use as an Association building.

Encouraging reports are sent from the Young Men's Christian Association in the South of France, which are described by Pastor Tophel, President of the Central International Committee, as "full of life and animated by an excellent spirit."

The Christian Endeavor Societies in Iowa are contributing to provide a library to be placed on board the new cruiser named after their State. Book societies in this object have been held in some places, and the volumes have been forwarded to W. L. Richardson, 138 Eastlake place, Chicago, who has this matter in charge.

The King's Daughters and Christian Endeavorers at the Tabernacle Baptist Church, New York, united their forces to give a dinner on Thanksgiving Day to the poor of the neighborhood. The old lecture room was neatly decorated, a lot of "quiet lamps" were borrowed, and lentils and color to a very attractive spread. Tables were set for 100 to dine at one time.

Impaired Digestion.

The patient is required to diet in building up and maintaining good health, milk is recognized as a valuable factor, but it is important that it be absolutely pure and sterilized. Borden's Peerless Food Evaporated Cream meets all requirements. Early wholesome.

Hospitality in the Orient.

The Khans of Palestine and their Characteristics—Ancient Wayside Inns—The Traditional Site of the Khan of the "Good Samaritan" Episode.

JOURNERS and travelers in the East, who happen to be so fortunate as to stop over night, on their journey, at one of the "khans" or lodging-places for man and beast, which are to be found in many parts of Syria, find them very interesting objects of study. Totally different from the inns established for the accommodation of wayfarers in any other part of the globe, their characteristics have changed but little, if at all, in the last two thousand years. They afford lodging, but rarely food, as the traveler is supposed to carry his own supplies. The smaller "khans," or "menzil," are found in the open country along routes frequented by travelers, while the larger "caravanserais" are usually located near towns. Each "khan" has a courtyard, enclosed by substantially built walls, within whose protection the animals and baggage are safely housed, while a spacious dwelling at the main entrance affords ample accommodation for the guests.

"Khans" are frequently referred to in the Bible and strangely enough, one of the first references to a place of this character is that in Jeremiah 41:17, of "the habitation of Chimham, which is by Bethlehem," which is claimed by tradition to have been the birthplace of the Saviour. This famous "Khan" was doubtless named in honor of Chimham, the son of Barzillai the Gileadite and friend of David, and upon whom the king bestowed as a reward for his loyalty, a possession at Bethlehem. (II. Sam. 19: 37-40.) It was, in olden times, the starting-point for travelers from Jerusalem to Egypt.

Another "Khan," which is well remembered by every reader of the Gospels is the one to which the "good Samaritan" conveyed the stranger who had fallen among thieves and was grievously wounded. Luke tells of this Samaritan's great kindness and hospitality: "And he brought him to an inn and took care of him. And on the morrow, when he departed, he took out two pence and gave them to the host, and said unto him: Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more when I come again I will repay thee." (Luke 10: 34, 35.) Local tradition, preserved through all the centuries, indicates the scene of this beautiful episode (which may have been no mere parable, but an actual occurrence drawn upon for the purpose of illustrating a divine truth), at the Khan-el-Ahmar on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho. Such incidents of violence on the highway were doubtless by no means rare in the time of Christ.

Khan-el-Ahmar, probably repaired many times since then, is in a wild and sterile part of Palestine. The white Jericho road winds in and out at the foot of the low hills like a ribbon, and passes by its hospitable door. Jesus himself, in his journeyings may have lodged there. There are many rocky defiles and ravines bordering on the highway. It is a locality which will continue to hold a peculiar interest for travelers and especially for students of the Bible, who love to wander among the scenes that were familiar to the Saviour while here on earth.

"God will know You."

A very pretty story is told of a child's gratitude. One evening about Christmas, a gentleman was strolling along a street in Toronto, with apparently no object in view but to pass away the time. His attention often, alas! make the letter stand for the spirit. A child can and does apprehend the deep truths of the Bible, if presented in their simplicity, and in connection with his own experience. Nature lends endless illustrations that lead to clearly defined spiritual truth, well within the comprehension of our babies; for example, sowing and reaping teach the certainty of cause and effect, "what a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

"Our Father's care of the little things of earth, shows the surety of his love and care. If he knows when a sparrow falls,—if 'he feeds them,' will he not feed us? If a child is led to see how wonderful are the effects of light in the material world, observing the various phenomena himself, is he not able, in some measure at least, to comprehend that God is the light of the world? The force of it lies in the fact that it came to him as a revelation, not at second-hand."

A Premier's Lowly Friends.

A beautiful incident is related by Dr. Newman Hall of Mr. Gladstone, which shows that distinguished man in a most kindly and Christian aspect. A poor crossing-sweeper was ill. A visitor asked him if any one had been to see him, and the sweeper replied: "Yes, Mr. Gladstone." "Which Mr. Gladstone?" asked the visitor. "Mr. Gladstone," repeated the poor invalid. "But how came he to see you?" enquired the visitor. "Well," answered the crossing-sweeper, "he always had a nice word for me when he passed my crossing, and when I was not there, he missed me. He asked my mate, who has taken my place, where I was, and when he heard I was ill he asked for my address, and when he was told he put it down on paper. So he called to see me."

"And what did he do?" was asked.

LITTLE THINGS.

A GOOD-BY kiss is a little thing,
With your hand on the door to go,
But it takes the venom out of the sting
Of a thoughtless word or a cruel fling
That you made an hour ago.

A kiss of greeting is sweet and rare
After the toil of the day,
And it smoothes the furrows plowed by care,
The lines on the forehead you once called fair
In the years that have flown away.

'Tis a little thing to say, "You are kind;
I love you, my dear," each night,
But it sends a thrill through the heart, I find—
For love is tender, as love is blind—
As we climb life's rugged height.

We starve each other for love's caress.
We take, but we do not give;
It seems so easy some soul to bless,
But we dole the love grudgingly, less and less
Till 'tis bitter and hard to live.

HOUSEKEEPING WOES.

OF all recipes for making an unhappy home, writes J. C. Fernald in "The New Womanhood," few are more effectual than utter ignorance of housekeeping on the part of the wife. It is misery where means are ample, and where they are limited, it is little short of destruction. And the hope of escaping the peril by learning in the process is, at best, a precarious one. It is astonishing how many of the divorces are among those only two, three or four years married. Those early years are the most important. Then, it ever, do the different natures adapt themselves to, and mould each other. If just then, they are plunged into a chaos of "wasting and worrying and manifold non-successes, with dyspepsia waiting in the shadow of the table," which ought to be so inexpressibly bright, happy and dear to the two who have at last the privilege of sitting down apart from all the world, because they are all the world to each other; if, just then, "the bread-winner (who started out with such high hopes), finds a formidable antagonist in the bread-maker," and desolation where he had looked for joy, all the illusions of his young manhood are spoiled, and, if there is anything bad in him, it will come out.

Her temper and judgment will not improve in the miserable process, and the way is paved for that rupture of the marriage tie, which—though some women strangely plead for it—falls ever with most desolating power upon the woman, and sends out into society always one, and oftener two, perverted natures and ruined lives.

The trouble in housekeeping is, that the lite-happiness of the operator ordinarily depends upon the successful treatment of a single patient, or sometimes, perhaps, impatient subject. But the right woman, marrying at the right time, a man whom she has any right to marry at all, can deftly take the impatience and many kinks of character out of him. We admit that it is a great deal to ask her to do, but those who do it best seem to find a wonderful enjoyment in it.

Night-time in a Japanese Town.

"Sleep does not always come to one's bidding in the busy parts of a Japanese town," writes Bishop Ninde. "The people sit up late and rise early. The noises upon the street are various and novel. Blind men who are prepared to give massage treatment go about through the night calling attention by sounding a sort of flute. Venders of eatables startle you at intervals by a weird, musical cry. Other night-hawks make a succession of sharp sounds with a pair of wooden clappers, and the inmates of the building, while they are not boisterous, do not seem to think that ordinary noises are at all disturbing.

KHAN-EL-AHMAR, THE TRADITIONAL SCENE OF THE "GOOD SAMARITAN" INCIDENT.

From a photograph brought from Palestine by the Proprietor of "The Christian Herald."

was attracted by the remark of a little girl to a companion in front of a fruit stand: "I wish I had an orange for ma." The gentleman saw that the children, though poorly dressed, were clean and neat, and calling them into the store, he loaded them with fruits and candies. "What is your name?" asked one of the girls. "Why do you want to know?" queried the gentleman. "I want to pray for you," was the reply. The gentleman turned to leave, scarcely daring to speak, when the little one added: "Well, it don't matter. God will know you."

Children and Bible Truth.

"We ask children to memorize what they do not understand," says a thoughtful writer. "Instead of leading them through natural gradation to a realization of the meaning; we endeavor to inculcate our ideas, in place of awakening to self-thought; we too

"Why, he read some Bible to me and prayed," was the reply.

A somewhat similar story is that of an ex-servant woman whom Dr. Hall met in a railway carriage near Hawarden. She had a fine bouquet of flowers. "Mr. Gladstone gave them to me," said the woman. "Every servant who leaves Hawarden castle with a good character is invited to return to spend a week during the summer. I used to be a servant there, but left because I was going to be married. I have, however, just been staying there a week, and as I was leaving I met Mr. Gladstone in the garden. He asked me if I liked flowers, and when I said that I did, he gave me this bunch, which he had in his hand, saying: 'Pray accept them.'"

The high position of the great ex-Premier did not make him forget the offices of kindness he owed to these humble people.

A NEW FASHIONED WOMAN

Written Specially for
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

BY
MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Spiritually Discerned.

THE letter in which Val told of her sorrow and its alleviation was a pleasure and a grief to Annie—a grief because of the loss of the little darling, and Annie felt that she could truly sympathize with Val in her heavy affliction. Thought would sometimes run back to the melancholy past, and tears would flow. The wound was still there, cicatrized it is true, but it was not perfectly healed. Who can become indifferent to the graves of the past? In these moments of retrospection Annie had learned where to go for strength, had learned that when most childishly weak then she was strongest, since she then trusted alone to the Almighty arm. One of her favorite verses rushed into her mind, “Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee,” and kneeling, she asked for the promised “grace,” for forgetfulness of, or rather resignation to the past, and, ere her head was resting upon her pillow her heart was full of peace.

Next morning she carried the letter to her mother and said:

“Mamma, Val has lost her baby. It was buried nearly two months ago. It is a severe blow to her, but I want you to read her letter and see how a Christian can bear, even be happy under such sorrow. When you have read it please hand it to Roy, as I wish him to enjoy its perusal, too.”

Mrs. St. Clair read with tears Val’s account of her darling one’s sickness and death, but the remainder of the letter was to her an unknown tongue. It was the language taught of heaven and she had never been under such tuition. Val was a marvel to her—Annie, her own child, was a greater marvel. She might explain away, to her own satisfaction at least, Val’s fanaticism, since the world had never held the golden chalice of pleasure to her lips before marriage, and now, since she had married a plain, plodding, hard-working man, she must turn somewhere for comfort, must have some avenue of pleasure, even if imagination must come to the rescue. Then, too, Val was an ideal child and this must be her ideal world in which she was living. But Annie—this was incomprehensible! Annie’s face, her uniform cheerfulness, her sweet patience, gentle forbearance her activity, her heart full of everybody else, but herself, all this was a constant wonder to her mother. She felt that her child lived in a different world from herself, she had hoped each day she would come back, would be her old self again, but as weeks passed by and still Annie was the same, Mrs. St. Clair sighed, and felt that they were parted forever. It would have pleased her better for Annie to lay aside her mourning, enter into life with her old zest, be gay and fashionable as of yore. As it was, she felt far off from her child, was even restrained when in her company, felt at a loss for subjects of mutual interest to converse upon, and was the more uncomfortable since Annie was a silent reproach to her.

Soon after noon, although the hour was warm, Annie turned her steps toward Mrs. Somers to fulfil her engagement. The day was peculiarly beautiful, not a cloud flecked the dazzling blue, but a soft haze rested along the horizon’s rim, and oppressiveness in the air hinted of summer showers. Great trees of gigantic proportions stretched their long green arms across the street, so that it was entirely overshadowed. Although it was drawing toward the close of June, she walked in the dense, grateful shade, and felt her parasol an encumbrance. Every garden she passed was full of flowers, here were long strips of ribbon beds, there coleus gleaming in every device bordered by waxen echeveria, here was a pyramid of ivy geranium in full bloom, there was a beautiful creeper climbing up with insistence a stately oak, a summer-house covered with purple, graceful wisteria, a rockery nearly concealed by a bridal rose. The season of lilac, hyacinth, tulip, and syringa had just passed, now was the season of roses of every hue, while chrysanthemum and dahlia were pushing ahead getting ready for their own “Opening Day.” Annie’s eye took in all these varied beauties and she walked slowly that she might see them all and admire. In her hand she carried a bouquet of the rarest hot-house flowers, and around it was such a mingling breath of heliotrope, orange blossoms, carnations, and daphnes, one might have thought a factory for expressing extracts was near.

“For me, dear?” asked Mrs. Somers, as she presented them to her. “How perfectly lovely! Thank you so much. I never saw finer carnations than these. Do you know, dear, I have sometimes wished that I owned a grand conservatory, and that I were able to gather there every flower that God has ever made, so that I might trace in each my Father’s skill, my Father’s love.”

“It is a sweet thought, Mrs. Somers. If earth is so beautiful, what must heaven be! I feel that I have in Roy’s conservatory a miniature of the one you long for. If we hear of a new flower he orders it, and lately he has collected orchids which have cost him thousands and thousands of dollars. Come up and let me have the exquisite pleasure of a visit from you, and that I may show you our floral beauties, especially this singular family of plants. Come soon and teach me to admire and love more my Father, God.”

“Thank you, dear child, I shall be glad to come.”

“I do not crave anything that wealth can buy, Mrs. Somers, for I have been surfeited, but there is one thing I have longed for lately and prayed to God to give me if it could be his will, and that is a beautiful, attractive face.”

“My child!” and Mrs. Somers spoke with surprise.

“Do not misunderstand me, my dear friend, it is not admiration that I crave, fulsome adulation sickens me. I want a face, made beautiful and attractive by grace, not that I may attract to myself, but to my Saviour: I would be so happy to draw the young to my side, keep them there, win their confidence, show them gently their errors, show them how unsatisfying is wealth and a gay life, how glorious, complete, beyond all comparison is my Saviour. I only want to be attractive, that I may attract to Jesus.”

Mrs. Somers smiled, scanned Annie’s face a moment, and then the smile died away, and she said:

“If from our hearts, dear, we can say ‘for Christ’s sake,’ that prayer will be answered. That prayer cannot fail that has Christ’s glory for its ultimate end. Pray on, the answer will come.”

In Mrs. Somers’ eyes the answer had come already.

It was time to start upon their mission, so they walked in the suburbs till they reached a small two-roomed, unpainted house; then Mrs. Somers opened the gate and they entered.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Christian Work.

“Jessica, Jessica, there are feet coming up the gravel-walk—come!”

It was a man’s sharp voice which rang out with discontent. A child, thin and pale, but very bright-eyed, answered the summons and went to the front door.

“Walk in, Mrs. Somers,” said the child very gently and with great womanly dignity.

“Jessica, how do you do, and how are grandpa and mother?”

“I am well, ma’am, but grandpa’s complaining and mother is out at work. Come this way, please.”

“Jessica, this is my friend, Mrs. Deveraux. She wanted to see some of my afflicted people, so I brought her here first.”

“Do you like to see people suffer?” asked the child as she fixed her bright eyes on Annie with an inquiring look.

“No, I don’t like to see them suffer, but if they must suffer, I like to try and relieve them.”

“You don’t look like you knew what it was.”

“Yes, I know more of it than you think.”

“Well, your face don’t look like it; you haven’t any deep lines about your eyes, nor curves around your mouth that suffering people have; yours is smooth and round and red.”

There was nothing impertinent about the child, indeed her artless manner and keen bright eyes attracted Annie, so that she stopped a moment outside, while Mrs. Somers went within the room. She soon followed.

There sat a man very old and infirm, with large black eyes; but though large, though bright, they were sightless. Not a ray of light ever pierced the dense darkness. His hair was long and floated in white waves upon his shoulders; his dress was a coarse white shirt, very clean, and a pair of homespun pants, while rough, worn shoes were on his feet. Around him were scattered white oak splits, and of these he was making a basket, which was resting on his lap, half done. Now his fingers were nervously twisting the split about, while his eyes, staring on vacancy, were turned in the direction of Mrs. Somers’ voice. As Annie entered she heard her say: “Mr. Kennedy, I have brought a friend to see you—Mrs. Deveraux.”

The old man half arose, held out his hand, bony and hard, and Annie took it in hers, as he said:

“It must be terrible,” exclaimed Annie from a full heart.

But Mrs. Somers interrupted him and tried to divert his thoughts from himself.

“Yes, it is dark, my good friend, but God is good to you yet. The Saviour’s smile will light up the gloom for you if you will only let him.”

“He doesn’t smile much on me. I’m all alone in the dark. I s’pose I oughtn’t to feel so, but it’s human natur’, and I can’t help it. I am old and useless, just in everybody’s way, but I could do somethin’ yet if I had my eyes.”

It was touching to hear his plaint, but Mrs. Somers knew how to check and comfort him.

“My dear friend, she said, “your lot is a hard one—it is sad to live in darkness, and no hope of any light, but it might be so much worse. God has spared you your daughter. Was not that good? Only think what a comfort she is to you, and how cheerfully she works for you, day after day. Then here is little Jessie, always ready to read the Bible to you and wait upon you; bring you a cool drink and sell your baskets for you. Then, too, only suppose your hands were paralyzed, as poor Joe Morton’s are, then you would have to sit and do nothing; make no more baskets and no more mats, and, indeed would have to be depressed and fed.”

“Ah, Mrs. Somers, you’re always p’inting downward. Well, I reckon its best to look that way—does make one feel better to see how much wuss off some folks are than you.”

“Yes, it’s well to look down, but it is better still to look up, far above you, above the earth to heaven, and see Jesus, who loves you and wants to save you, who wants to take you in his loving arms up to that blessed home, where there is no more night, no more darkness; where there is no more suffering, no poverty, and, best of all, where there is no more sin, no more sin! Oh! Can’t you look to him, trust in him, yet?”

The old man shook his grey head. A tear trickled down his cheek and glistened on his yellow hand.

“Shall I pray with you again?”

He assented, dropped his basket and knelt.

What a fervent prayer it was, right among the long oak withes, right among rags and baskets and half-done mats, but angels hushed their harps to listen, for God himself was there.

When they arose, Jessica’s were the only dry eyes in the room.

“Now Jessie,” said Mrs. Somers, grandpa has had his time, now for a little word with you. What are you reading?”

Then turning to Annie, she said: “This is my little book-worm. I am trying to feed her brain with healthy food. Well, now, Jessie, what are you reading?”

“I’m reading just the loveliest book! It’s all about King Arthur and his Knights. You know they called themselves ‘Knights of the Round Table.’ Oh! I think that search for the Holy Grail was just beautiful. Every Knight tried, you know, and Sir Galahad found it and died.”

“I do not object to your reading of King Arthur and of his Knight, but keep in your mind that it is all a fancy sketch. No such people ever lived, and though history may point to a King Arthur, yet this story originated in ignorance, just to please a superstitious people. I have brought you a book which I wish you to read, and which I feel sure you will like. Look me in the eyes, Jessie, and listen. The heroine of this book is called May Garland. She never was on the earth and never will be, so don’t imagine, as you read, that you are another May, for you are not, never will be. Remember, as you read, that this girl lived only in the brain of the author, nowhere else. She has not made her a perfect character. As you read, criticize the girl yourself; see where you could have made yourself better if you had been in her place; admire the beautiful descriptions of the author, for there are many, and then, when you come to some pretty love-making, say to yourself, ‘that is right well done,’ when to a death, look at it from the author’s stand point and say, ‘was it wise or necessary to the story that that person should have died? Couldn’t she have arranged it some other way?’ Don’t shed tears over your heroines; and, whatever you do, don’t imagine yourself one. This is a good story and it is well written. It has a fine moral running through it like a golden thread, and all kinds of beautiful truths are strung upon it. Get all the good you can out of it, Jessie, and make your heart learn the lesson it would teach you, and that lesson is ‘forget yourself and live for others.’ It is a beautiful, healthful study for you, dear child, one you have already begun to learn.”

“Thank you, Mrs. Somers,” said the child seizing the book eagerly. “I will read it carefully and try to do as you tell me.”

“Don’t neglect grandpa for your reading, Jessie.”

“No, ma’am; I never do that.”

After bidding them both good evening and passing out of the yard, Annie said:

“That old man is a pitiable object!”

“He is indeed. He is in the dark both in a temporal and spiritual sense. He has been a hardened sinner. He lost his sight in part from scarlet fever after he was grown, though he could see indistinctly with one eye, just enough to go about by himself and work. In this way he managed to do something for his family; but one day, when he went out to gather brush to burn, for it was winter, in stooping down, a stick that had been set in the ground for some land-mark, ran right into his well eye, put it out, and he has been in total darkness ever since. It was truly sad.”

So sad, and so mysterious!

“Clouds and darkness are round about thy throne, O God! Perhaps this darkness will eventually shut him up to trust in Christ. Through this darkness Providence may lead him to discover the true light. Have been visiting him a long time, trying to pray with and for him; and, though he seems no nearer, I will not despair, will not be weary in well doing.”

“Jessica seems to be a remarkable child.”

“She is remarkable. She grasps readily all brain food, and I am afraid she will see it in an unhealthy channel. She is not satisfied with children’s milk, but she wants strong meat. I do the best my limited means and library will permit, but I wish she could go to school. I cannot see the way to effect this, but I am praying for it.”

“How about her mother?”

“She is a good Christian woman, industrious and one who is constantly counting her blessings; so, though she is poor she is contented. But here we are at another house. This is the only one we will have time to visit this afternoon.”

It was a poor-looking, unpainted house of two rooms. The gate hung on a hinge, the fence was partly gone, the chimney had fallen in, and the steps, which conducted one directly into the room, were almost impassable. A very desolate, neglected, uninviting dwelling it was, but in such places are often found people who have most need of Christian visits.

THE BOOK SHELF

BOYS AND RELIGION.*

ANY men talk to their boys about religion—you know they do—as though they were half ashamed of it, and heave a sigh of relief when the topic is exhausted, or rather dies of inanition, and the conversation, turning into a lighter, frivolous channel, ripples along with all the gaudy of the matter and gossip in the rear carriage on the return from a funeral. This great question of your boy's religious life should be discussed as freely and frequently and frankly as the matter of his selection of a profession or business. And, man, be sure of this: once your boy takes you into the fullest confidence of his religious life, tells you his temptations, his weaknesses, what he is striving for and what he is fighting against, bares his heart and his life to you almost as he opens it to God—you have a hold upon him, a knowledge and power to help him that nothing else in the world can give you. You know him then. How many men know their boys so well as strangers know them? How many things vitally important in his physical and moral life does a boy learn with brutal coarseness from vile men that he should have been taught with tender and careful wisdom by his father? What do you know about your boy? What do you know of the temptations which beset him, the temptations which are far greater and far more seductive than those of your own young days?

If you are going to make him a New Testament man, model yourself on the same lines. It was Elisha, the prophet, a good man, a holy man, and a just man, who in righteous anger laid upon Gehazi the leprosy of Naaman that should "cleave into him and unto his children forever," a punishment for covetousness and lying. But when the Man of Nazareth came into the world he laid his hand upon the leper and cleansed him with perfect healing, and tender words. When you have made up your mind in about ten minutes or ten seconds that your boy needs a good sound whipping, take about three days to think over it—a whipping will keep for a week—and then see if you can take a stick and beat him.

CHRIST IN HISTORY.*

Nearly all that we know of our Lord we learn from the four Gospels and from the other writings included in the New Testament; but the brief mention of him in the pages of the greatest of Roman historians is infinitely pathetic and impressive. Toward the end of the reign of the Emperor Nero, a great part of the city of Rome was consumed by fire. The palace of Nero, innumerable private houses, altars and temples associated with the most sacred events and the most famous names in the history of the Roman people, the riches which had been acquired by Roman victories—treasures of Greek art and precious books and manuscripts which preserved the genuine text of the great works of ancient genius—were destroyed by the flames. There was a widespread belief that the city had been set on fire by the secret orders of Nero himself, who was supposed to desire the glory of founding a new city and calling it by his own name. And Tacitus tells us that to suppress this suspicion Nero "fastened the guilt and inflicted the most exquisite tortures on a class, hated for their abominations, called Christians by the populace. Christus," he goes on to say, "from whom the name had its origin, suffered the extreme penalty during the reign of Tiberius, at the hands of one of our procurators, Pontius Pilate; and a most mischievous superstition, thus checked for the moment, again broke out, not only in Judea, the first source of the evil, but even in Rome, where all things hideous and shameful, from every part of the world, find their centre and become popular."

This is all the Roman historian has to say about our Lord. The Son of God, who became flesh for us sinners and our salvation, has hardly a place among the emperors, statesmen and generals, whose glory and shame, whose virtues and crimes, appeared to Tacitus to constitute the chief part of the history of the world. Tacitus has less to say about Christ than about the men who shared the follies and the debaucheries of Nero, and about the miserable women who were the objects and victims of his lust; and what he says is to our Lord's dishonor. To the great historian, a man of penetrating genius and of profound moral earnestness, our Lord was nothing more than an obscure and fanatical Jew, who had been put to death for his crimes by the Roman Governor of Judea, and who had become infamous by the execrable superstition which he had founded. In the pages of history as well as in the pages of prophecy, "the Servant of the Lord is numbered with the transgressors." But the words which I have quoted remind us that to Tacitus our Lord had a place—though a shameful one—in the actual history of mankind. He was a Jew. There were men in Judea who knew him well. He had stood at the bar of a Roman Governor of the province. There must have been witnesses, true or false, who professed to have heard the words or to have witnessed the deeds for which he was condemned to die. There were officers who had executed the sentence. To Tacitus our Lord was one who had lived a real human life—a man and nothing more—but still a man.

BRAINERD'S METHODS.*

What was Brainerd's chief methods? Two leading features were obvious. The first is the evangelical truths which he inculcated. We listen once more: "I have frequently been enabled to represent the divine glory, the infinite preciousness, and transcendent loveliness of the great Redeemer, the suitableness of his person and purchase to supply the wants and answer the utmost desire of immortal souls; to open the infinite riches of his grace and the wonderful encouragement proposed in the Gospel to unworthy, helpless sinners; to call, invite, and beseech them to come and give up themselves to him and be reconciled to God through him; to expostulate with them respecting their neglect of one so infinitely lovely and freely offered; and this in such a manner, with such freedom, pertinency, pathos, and application to the conscience as I am sure I never could have made myself master of by the most assiduous application of mind." "God was pleased to give these divine truths such a powerful influence upon the minds of these people, and so to bless them for the effectual awakening of numbers of them, that their lives were quickly reformed, without my insisting upon the precepts of morality and spending time in repeated harangues upon external duties."

Such were the Scripture truths enforced by Brainerd—the momentous facts of prime moment to every man, savage and civilized alike—the preaching of which has ever been mighty to the pulling down of strongholds and stirring those depths of the soul which need to be stirred. Like the apostles, he did not wait for the slow processes of school education, but addressed himself first of all and mainly to adults.

The other chief element of Brainerd's power as a missionary was his prayerfulness. That habit characterized him from the earliest period of his religious life. Before entering upon work among the Indians his journal contains memoranda such as these: "God enabled me so to agonize in prayer that I was quite wet with perspiration, though in the shade and cool wind. My soul was drawn out very much from the world for multitudes of souls." Once entered upon labor in behalf of the red men, he says: "My great concern was for the conversion of the heathen to God, and the Lord helped me to speak for them." "Praying incessantly every moment with sweet fervency." "I feel as if my all was lost and I was undone for this world if the poor heathen may not be converted." "In prayer I was exceedingly enlarged." "Spent a great part of the day (December 19, 1744) in prayer to God for the outpouring of his Spirit on my poor people." In journeying from place to place, before preaching and after preaching, and even in his dreams, supplication for individuals and for the people at large was the business of his heart. As a prince he had power with God and with men. Such a wrestler could not but prevail. His faith removed mountains. The student or missionary who receives no impulse to prayer, to self-scrutiny, to heartiest consecration, from a perusal of Brainerd's memoir, must either have made very rare attainments in the divine life or else have very languid aspirations. Given such preaching and praying by all ministers and missionaries, how long before the world would be converted?

*From Christian Doctrine, a series of discourses by R. W. Dale, LL. D. Pp. 329; price $1.75; published by A. C. Armstrong & Son, 51 East Tenth Street, New York. This work is one of many able volumes for which Christians have reason to be grateful to this great philosopher. Its aim, like that of his earlier works, is to show the truth and reasonableness of the Christian religion. Dr. Dale's works have the charm of simplicity, being written for business men rather than theologians. The above extract answers a question often asked as to the notice secular historians take of Christ. Tacitus lived and wrote in the first century. He was praetor of Rome in 88 A. D., about fifty-one years after the Crucifixion.

HYMN FOR THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

WE thank thee for the millions of
The copies of thy Word,
In many tongues and in all lands,
To teach thy law, O Lord!
But what are these if barren of Thy Holy Spirit's power?
A fleeting pleasure, soon forgot—
A fair but fruitless flower.

We thank thee for the sermons preached
Of full salvation, free
To sinful man, bought by the blood Shed on Mount Calvary.
But what are words of eloquence?
These give no lasting peace!
One plants, one waters; but alone
Thou blessest with increase.

We thank thee for the many songs
That bind in unity,
The Christian people of all lands,
In sweetest harmony.
But what are these, if in the heart
No love for Christ be there?
Charmed with the melody of song,
Not lifted up by prayer.

Dear Lord, Thy Zion waits for Thee,
Now condescend to bless;
And may each soul's desire be
For more of holiness.
Give all the power to read and preach,
And pray with hearts aflame
With holy fire, while every voice
Gives praise in Jesus' name.

THE GOSPEL IN GUATEMALA.

C LETTER from Rev. E. M. Haymaker, a Presbyterian missionary in Guatemala, Central America, received by a friend in New York, contains the following interesting information relative to mission work in that country: "The work has prospered this year. I have made two long trips outside the capital—one to Huehuetenango (Way-way-tenango), and one to Salama, San Augustine, San Arate, etc. In the latter trip I found much to encourage. We are getting a fair-sized congregation started in San Augustine. Bro. Penzotti, agent of the American Bible Society, is now making Guatemala City his headquarters and is helping our cause along greatly by the dissemination of the Scriptures, as well as by his earnest and pointed preaching. Our Spanish congregation is more than double the size it was when you were here, besides which we now have work started at three different places in the suburbs at the south end of the city."

When it is considered that the influences, resulting from the various political revolutions which crushed the old Roman Catholic power in the State, have proved most disastrous to religious belief and good morals; it is most gratifying to note the same progress in Christian work in Guatemala, by God's blessing, through the labors of Rev. Mr. Haymaker and his associates during the past six years.

DRIVEN TO THEFT.

The destitution in Nebraska has not, thus far, been fully realized by the public generally. The following extract from a letter written recently by the Presbyterian Pastor at Large in Kearney, Nebraska, will give some idea of the straits to which some of the people are drawn: "How many of my poor people are to live through the coming Nebraska winter, I cannot tell. My heart aches so for them that I find it the most difficult thing of my life to appear cheerful and administer the comfort and consolation I so much desire to. I have received two barrels of good second-hand clothing which I have distributed among the most destitute, but what are they among so many? I hope to receive more in the near future to supply as far as I can the crying needs. I do not ask the people for a cent for myself. I would not dare to raise my voice in prayer to my loving Heavenly Father if I should. "One poor man asked a flour merchant to trust him for fifty pounds, saying to him his family was starving. He refused him."

Wonderful Cures of Catarrh and Consumption by a New Discovery.

Wonderful cures of Lung Diseases, Catarrh of the Bladder, and Consumption, are made by the new treatment known in Europe as the Andral-Broca Discovery. If you are a sufferer, you should write to the New Medical Advance, 67 E. 6th Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, and they will send you this new treatment free for trial. State age and all particulars of your disease.

Ringling noises in the ears, roaring or buzzing sounds are caused by catarrh. Loss of smell or hearing sometimes result from it. Hood's Sarsaparilla purifies the blood and cures catarrh.

The man walked into the store, picked up a fifty pound sack as he walked out, untied his team and started home. The merchant sent an officer of the law to arrest him, and on reaching his house found the sack of flour on his table open, with the children eating it dry, like so many famished beasts. This is only one of many facts I might mention, and this, too, when the townships and counties are exerting themselves to supply the needy."

A BRAVE JAPANESE SOLDIER.

Rev. David S. Spencer, writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Nagoya, Japan, relates the following incident illustrative of Japanese bravery:

"In the recent great naval engagement, a marine on the Itsukushima Kan had been told to stand as guard of the entrance of the powder magazine. During the engagement the Itsukushima was so steered that the shots of the enemy's small arms seemed to concentrate in the vicinity of this vital point, and noticing this, the sentry attempted to cover the whole doorway with his body. In his attempt he was wholly successful. Not a bullet reached the interior of the magazine. When the affair was over, relief was sent to the man, who was found at his post, but with a somewhat troubled expression on his face. He was discovered to be stone-dead, and literally honey-combed with bullets, no less than thirty-six having struck him."

What an example the heroism of this soldier presents to Christians who, in their warfare against sin, are prone to leave the vital part—the soul—open to the assaults of the enemy instead of defending it bravely to the death!

UNFOUNDED FEARS.

A recent proclamation in China reassured some missionaries who had been not unreasonably disquieted by ominous rumors. The trouble was at Pao-ting-fu, where the American Board has a station. Dr. Noble, who is in charge, writing to "The Missionary Herald," says that for some weeks rumors of an approaching attack on all foreigners had been current. They were vague at first, consisting mainly of an intimation that the missionaries were intruders and that with a Japanese army invading the country all foreigners ought to be summarily expelled. Finally more definite reports reached Dr. Noble's ears. These were that the residences, chapels, dispensaries, and lives of all foreigners in Pao-ting-fu were to be destroyed on a certain day; to lend color to these reports the district magistrate two days before that date sent an officer to the dispensary to ascertain the number of places owned or occupied by the missionaries. "No reason was assigned for demanding the information," says Dr. Noble, "but yesterday officials appeared and hung on the wall outside of the gate an imperial proclamation, stating that the war was with Japan, that other nations were in no way involved, and that the lives and property of all foreigners were to be respected, and that failure to heed this would be followed by severe punishment to all offenders. The proclamation also has been posted in each of the four gateways of the city, and yesterday drew large crowds, who read it with varying comments. There can be no doubt that this decided act of the government has already borne good fruit in allaying the excitement of the people; our own anxiety is relieved and the fears of our Christians quieted."

ILLINOIS EPWORTH LEAGUERS.

Rockford, Ill., was the meeting-place of a great Epworth League convention lately. It was in session four days, and over a thousand representatives of the Leagues of Rock River Conference were in attendance. Secretary Schell took part, and among the guests was Dr. S. A. Steel, Secretary of the Epworth League of the M. E. Church South.

COME QUICKLY.

"Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." Rev. 22: 20.

YEA, quickly come, oh, Lord!
According to thy Word;
Oh, quickly come.
Unbarred is every door;
Enter whom I adore;
Enter and leave no more
My heart, thy home.

In me, thy "temple," dwell;
Each tissue, limb, and cell
Thy Spirit's home.
How else my flesh deny,
And joy to hear the cry
Descending from on high
"Sure quick I come."

Grace cuts the cords which bind
To flesh and world the mind,
And keep from thee,
Doubt, fear, ambition's lust,
All meanness and distrust
Now fled, I shall, I must
With joy thee see.

Come, age of holy joy,
Of gold without alloy
Of bliss the sum!
Jesus, our King and Groom,
Thy Bride peers through the gloom.
And prays from noon to noon,
"Come, quickly come."

Among Dead Pharaohs.

Mummy Tomb of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the Oppression.

In her book entitled, "In Cairo and Jerusalem," Mary Thorn Carpenter furnishes this vivid description of a visit to the tombs of the Pharaohs:

"We came back to the vast, almost vacant salon. The pink and gray mummies of a royal era, not one of whom lived after the year 1000 B. C. Ranged in a large circle, the gilded and painted cases gleaming like a suffused corona under the bright central dome, Thothmes II., king of the eighteenth dynasty, Rameses III., founder of the twelfth dynasty, and then the mighty Rameses II., Pharaoh in the flesh, before us in their Assyrian coffins, shaped as nearly as possible to fit the body, and elaborately decorated with golden disks and winged emblems of royalty.

The original coffin of Rameses was destroyed about the twenty-first dynasty, according to an hieratic inscription, which relates that tomb inspectors visited the Rameses as late as the year 1100. Some writings on papyrus lately discovered contain information that the royal tombs were secreted about that time, the gold was stolen, the sacred mummies, amulets, and ornaments taken without hesitation, while the modern sacrilege of body-snatching did not at all enter the plan of the robbers. After that, Pharaoh and his father, Seti I., were buried off and removed for safety to the tomb of Queen Ansera, which was also broken into, and the wandering mummies were bumped and rattled up the steep incline to the Valley of the Kings in the Theban mountains. It must be acknowledged that in stature, at least, Pharaoh was great indeed; his form nearly outlines the mummy case where he lies, bound around with yellow linen bands, a withered warrior, whose life measured six feet three inches in height. There is, however, about the blackened mold of the mighty king a good foundation to reconstruct his peculiarities of face and figure as they appeared in life. Half a chance would reveal the strength and character which lie in the high forehead, the dignity of chin and mouth, and the strange and sinister expression of the beaked nose of the Hebraic type, singularly like unto the aged, hoary expression of the unfeathered beak of a young crow. However, beyond the fact of his gray hairs, and eyebrows like dandelion down, the straight back and powerful shoulders give little hint of an old man who has passed the limit of his three-score years and ten.

CHINA'S GIANT CITY.

"Pekin," writes Pastor Heims, late chaplain of the German navy, "is certainly a grand city as regards dimensions. The few one has from the Imperial Observatory is grand. On all sides a sea of houses, reaching far beyond the horizon, and plentifully interlarded with green. Each house has a well-ordered garden in the rear, and these tens of thousands of trees, although they are not planted very close together, give the city a very pleasing appearance. The Imperial parks and the gardens attached to the temple adds to this. In the heart of the city is the Imperial residence, a city in itself, surrounded by a high, thick, fortress-like wall and a deep ditch. In its centre is a hill about a hundred and fifty feet high, raised artificially of coal, to prevent the Imperial family from suffering for want of fuel in case of a siege—so says tradition. A graceful mansion crowns the summit of this hill, but it is uninhabited. The last Emperor of the Ming dynasty took his own life there when the Manchus entered the city. Decay is the distinguishing mark of the Peking of to-day. The city has broad, well-designed streets, which is very remarkable in this country of narrow lanes and alleys, but these streets are flanked on both sides by small, unimportant houses. Mountains of refuse obstruct our way, in which the small, black, starving pigs gruntingly root for subsistence. The sewers are insufficiently covered or left open altogether, whole districts of the city are depopulated, lifeless; the walls of the city are in a deplorable condition, and look as if they had stood a bombardment—everything speaks of a former period of greatness and prosperity."

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SIOUX.

In an article giving the results of Christianity among the Sioux Indians, Lieutenant Wassell pays a high tribute to missionaries generally. He writes: "From the sorcery and jugglery of a weakened medicine man he has brought the Sioux to confide in the simple teachings of the Bible. From the barbarous self-immolation of the Sun-dance he has led him to the few rites of Christianity. From the gross sensuality and selfishness of the awful mystery, the Takoo Wakan, manifested and worshipped under the form of gods innumerable, he has built up a faith in one Supreme Being. Today Episcopalians, Presbyterians and Congregationalists are all well represented in the Dakotas, and have rendered great assistance to the government in efforts toward civilization. The younger men wear their Y.M.C.A. badges, just as their forefathers wore the dirty medicine charms. The leading men are no longer those who have killed the most Crows or stolen the greatest number of ponies. War songs are replaced by Christian hymns, and 'Jesus Itancan' now bursts forth from the dusky throats that formerly knew nothing but the murderous 'kte.' The churches and religious societies have certainly quenched the fire of barbarism in the Indian children. Marriage, according to Christian rites, has succeeded the annual virgin-feast, where a slandered maiden stood face to face with her accuser by the sacred fire and swore a high-sounding oath to her purity. The disappearance of blanket and breech-cloth, long hair and highly-painted faces, is a sign that the Sioux has succumbed to a stronger civilization, and with his old customs have fallen his old gods."

JUSTIFYING JAPAN'S WAR.

From Miss Albertina J. Peterson, of Kamakura, Japan, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a translation of a most interesting article by a distinguished Japanese author, Kanzo Uchimura, justifying Japan's course in the present war on the ground that it was necessary in the interest of morality and civilization. Uchimura likens it to the war of Gideon against the Amalekites, that of the Greeks against the Persians, and the campaign of Gustavus Adolphus, which resulted in saving Protestantism to the world.

Some fifteen millions of helpless Koreans were kept ignorant and defenceless "to satisfy the jealousy of the world's most backward nation." To redress such a state of things Japan, as a progressive nation, had a right to interfere, and it would have been an offence to the spirit of morality and modern progress had Japan remained totally indifferent to her neighbor's woes. All that Japan asks is a sympathetic neutrality, that she may have an opportunity of effecting the reformation of the East.
